admitted, that a man shall act according to his conscience, and not according to the rules that are prescribed him, I know not who is safe; for how can an innocent man make his defence upon that principle? It is a safe consideration for them that take upon them that way of judging, because they are bound by no rules; but what hath not that done almost within memory! Felton, that killed the duke of Buckingham, what was his justification, but he was persuaded in conscience he did well in so doing? Ravillac, that killed Hen. 4, in France, he justified the same by his conscience, and said he had done a good thing; and I may say this argument of conscience hath acted all the villainy of the last age, and I am afraid hath gone a great way to disturb the happiness of this. For if this be a rule to this house, how is the king bound? I thought he had been bound by law; but if this shall be admitted as an argument, it is enough to say, if this house be arbitrary, the king is. I do not reflect upon this reign; but it will be enough to say, though he act against law, and turn twenty colleges out of doors, his conscience persuades him to it. We see how unbounded liberty the lords take, they are become masters of all our estates; and I would be very loth for my estate to depend upon the feeble tenure of a lord's conscience. If then this be the case, as it is, according to this method, I desire to know into what condition we shall bring ourselves?—You have been told, it is expected from you by your country, that you should exert this authority and power: Sir, I would have been glad that in cases more reasonable we had exerted this authority and power of parliament; I wish it had gone to the preventing the debasing and abusing your coin; I wish it could be exerted, that we might not see ourselves cheated under countenance of an act of parliament; but contrary to that, you are fond of being sprinkled with the blood of sir John Fenwick. As long as the government is not in danger, I believe the country would be glad that their blood might run secure in their veins, and not be tapt upon every occasion to serve a turn; for if you break the laws, what man can promise himself security? We know the consequence, if this bill does not pass; sir J. F. may live in misery all his time.—But what this precedent may make, no man can foresee. This bill is against the law of God; against the law of the land; it does contribute to the subversion of the constitution, and to the subversion of all government; for if there be rules to be observed in all governments, and no government can be without them, if you subvert those rules, you destroy the government; and therefore, for these considerations, nobody will think it strange, if I give my negative to this bill.

Mr. Chanc. of the Excheq. Sir, the gentleman that spake last, hath carried the reason against this bill a little further than some others; for it seems now, we are not to reject the bill for want of one witness that is legal in Westminster ster-hall; but it seems there is no evidence at all; and by capt. Porter's not being pardoned, and yet drudging for his pardon; as to all that have been condemned upon his testimony, he hath arraigned the evidence as not sufficient, and hopes that will be the judgment of the house upon this bill. I think if the house reject this bill upon that argument, it will go further than many mean that oppose it.—Another thing he says, he compares the convictions that I have upon my judgment, and of every body else that speaks from the proofs that are made, that he is guilty, to the whimsey of two or three madmen; whereas we go according to the evidence brought at the bar; we do not go upon the whimsies of Ravillac and Felton, but upon the proofs that have been made here; and though there are not two witnesses, yet upon what appears in proof, I am convinced, that he is guilty; and upon that conviction, I think, according to the duty I owe my country, and the constitution of England, when a bill does come to punish the man whom I think guilty, I think I ought to be for the bill. As to what is said out of Deuteronomy, that the law of God was against it, if you will argue à fortiori, it is literally true in the case of murder; but whether murder or treason, there is the life of a man concerned; and it is not the punishment, whether to be hanged, or hanged, drawn, and quartered, that makes any great difference; and give me leave to say, if you go to make precedents from the Jewish law, then, I say, the law of England is against that law, in case of murder: and by the same reason you may desire leave to bring in a bill to repeal all those laws.—Sir, if this was the eternal law of God and man, where was this eternal law in England before Edward 6th's time? If it be the eternal law, that there must be two witnesses, why does it not hold in England even in some cases of treason to this day; I mean the treason of clipping and coining? So, that if gentlemen will argue the nature of these faults are what the law of every country ordains, and that is the law.—And the way of evidence and proof too differs in every country; and I may affirm, that there never was any government in which there was not a power lodged somewhere to be exerted upon extraordinary occasions, beyond the legal way of prosecution.—I don't care to travel into the several countries to see how their constitution is, but I believe there is not one place in Europe in which it is strictly necessary there should be two witnesses to take away the life of a man; but it is generally so as it is here in all ordinary cases, but in this very law: this last law does not go upon two witnesses, but you have a proviso in it does absolutely exempt proceedings in parliament: I do not infer from thence, that you should not have two witnesses, if you proceed by way of impeachment, I think you ought; and so for having witnesses upon oath, &c. When these proceedings are in parliament, there is a direct proviso, by which the parliament is exempted from these rules. Upon the whole matter, I think this man is guilty; I think the precedent would be more fatal, to say, that a parliament can't proceed in such a case, than that a guilty man should suffer. I think this bill comes before you with more circumstances and reason to justify it, than any that hath been brought here before; here is a bill found against him by his country, the evidence of his friends having tampered with one of the witnesses, confirmed by a jury, &c.—A learned gentleman says, he would come up to make this paper evidence; but can't come up to make such a law, by which every man that is concerned in that deposition would be affected; but here is something particular in this case, a man that hath been abroad, and hath not used the like artifice, I think you ought not to use the like power to punish him, that is not guilty of the like crime. And therefore I shall conclude; but I must take notice of one thing: it was said, that this was the first precedent of this kind begun in this House, but that of the duke of Monmouth: but I believe, if this bill of attainder is not to be begun in this House, it is not to be brought in at all; for I believe there is a statute, that the life of a commoner is never to be meddled with by the lords originally. I will not trouble you any further: I do in my conscience think that sir J. F. is guilty, and therefore I am for this bill.

Mr. Pelham. I did not think to have troubled you this day: I did rather intend to have left it to others that can speak better, or have not spoken upon this subject; but that which hath been mentioned by several, as if they did think that we who mentioned the law of God upon this occasion, did it as if we did think the law of God was binding to you at this day: I never thought any such thing, otherwise than as to the morality of it, so far forth as it is grounded upon reason and justice, and tends to the clearing of an innocent man; and so far we and all mankind are bound by it; and that law having been afterwards confirmed in the New Testament by our Saviour and his apostles, at least approved of by them; and this having been confirmed by the law of England likewise; I do not think this is a fit occasion for you to pass by so fundamental a law as that is: and I conclude with this, that I cannot satisfy myself in my conscience, and should think some misfortune might follow me and my posterity, if I passed sentence upon sir J. F.'s life, upon less evidence than the law of England requires.

Sir H. Crofts. I shall endeavour, as much as I can, to give you little trouble in this matter. But because it hath been hinted and remarked so particularly upon me, I must beg leave to discharge my duty, as well as my conscience, as to what I said here the other day.—Sir, I do very much forget myself, if I did assert, that there was no such place in scripture that required two witnesses: the thing that I said, was this, that if any gentleman could shew me any rule from scripture that requireth two witnesses, more in the case of treason than in the case of murder and felony, I should be glad to see it. I do say, that the scripture shall be a rule to me, as far as the scripture requires; but I do take the Jewish law not to be so absolutely literally binding upon us here. And as to the text out of Numbers, that very text of scripture is particularly and literally applicable to murder; and if that be binding now, we have been very much misguided by our predecessors, and I think we are bound to take it in hand, to repeal all laws that are against it.—Sir, he is pleased to deny us, in some measure, the liberty of being guided by our consciences; truly, I don't know what he would have gentlemen go by; truly, let him go by what rule he pleases, I will go by the rule of my conscience, and will not do any thing against it upon any consideration or consequence whatsoever; nor will I part from the liberty and power of parliaments, for any rule or law of inferior courts whatsoever.—Sir, you are told, you ought to be guided by the rules of law, that is, not the forms of law, but the rules of law. Sir, I say, if these rules were made to bind parliaments, it was reasonable they should be bound by them; but if they were made only to bind inferior courts, they were far enough from being intended to put a cramp upon the proceedings of parliament; and if you shall subject yourselves to them, you give the lawyers such a power, that I do not doubt, but their books will be of greater authority than your journals; therefore, in consideration of that, and because I would leave that which is the right of parliaments to my successors, I shall not submit to that.—Therefore, I say, I come clear to the point, whether sir J. F. be guilty or not; only I must observe a little back, that as to those instances that the worthy member was pleased to make use of, of Ravillac and of Felton; shall those extraordinary cases, that which men did in heat of blood and private malice: shall these be brought to bear a parallel with what is done in parliament for the justice of the nation? I do not doubt but there are men enough, in their consciences, at least with pretence of it, will justify the destruction of your government and religion, and every thing else: all those men that deny the right of your government, have conscience and justice enough to subvert it, if they could; and therefore I do not so much wonder, that many men without doors have argued in that nature.—But I say, my conscience is the rule I must go by; and to me the question is only, whether sir J. F. be guilty or not guilty, and am called to give my judgment in it; and I think I am bound by the law of nature, by the law of the nation, and I see nothing in the law of God that prohibits me, to give my judgment according to the evidence, and the opinion I have in my conscience of the truth of it.—If there be no such rule that requires two witnesses binding upon me: if I may go upon one witness; if I believe he speaks true, and that the person is guilty; then I am bound to act for the preservation of the nation, and all our posterity: they that made this attempt, made it upon you and your posterity for ever: it is not so small a matter as some represent it; it is not, the person, so much as the nature of the fact, we are to consider; and we are not to let men escape punishment according to their greatness or their smallness, but according to the nature of the fact, and their guilt. I think I have that freedom, and I am so little bound by those rules that have been urged, that if both witnesses were here, and gave testimony against him, if I did not believe him to be guilty, I would lose my life rather than vote him so; but on the contrary, if here be sufficient evidence to convince me, though not according to the rules of inferior courts, I will not subject the freedom of parliaments to those rules.—Sir, you have been told formerly, and I think it a matter of that weight, I beg leave to urge it again, because it is a great reason that guides me in this matter; if you lay it down for a doctrine in this house (for a resolution here taken is as much a rule as a law, for it shall be brought as a precedent;) and therefore, if it shall be laid down as a rule here, that you will never attempt any man, or find him guilty, but upon two witnesses, I think the government, and all you have, stands upon a tottering foundation: he must be a very ordinary statesman, that cannot lay his plot so, as you shall not reach him by two witnesses.—Therefore, I say, I think it becomes the wisdom of parliament, not to declare themselves bound in that respect; I would have them bound by justice, but not by the common rule of the law.

Sir Robert Cotton. Sir, I do find that gentlemen do very much insist in this case, that if a gentleman does believe that sir J. F. is guilty, he must give his vote for the passing of this bill: if that be so, I am glad that opinion did not take place in the last reign; if it had, I am of opinion I should not have been here now, and I believe my lord Warrington, who was very instrumental in promoting this revolution, would not have died in his bed. My lord and I were accused of a crime, which, I believe, if proved by two witnesses, had been treason. I have heard some gentlemen say in this house, they did believe my lord Warrington was guilty (though he was not guilty of the fact as it was laid). There was a man sworn, &c. and there was some corroborating evidence; but as to Mr. Fley, and myself, there was none, but this particular person, and they indicted us of misdemeanor; though it would have been treason, if there had been two witnesses. Now if the same fact was treason when proved by two witnesses, and but misdemeanor when proved by one, methinks we are doing an extraordinary thing; we are going, after the fact committed, to make that which is but a misdemeanor, to be treason. And for these and other reasons, I cannot agree to the passing of this bill.

Lord Norreys. Sir, though I had always an apprehension of the ill consequence of this bill, yet never so much as now; for this gentleman hath given arguments that shake me more than all that I have heard before; for he says, there are a great many men, if they may proceed according to their consciences, will subvert this government, and bring in king James and arbitrary power: and he tells you, that every precedent in this house is equal to a law, and will justify the like for the future. I am sure I am very unwilling to make a precedent that shall justify men in such ill actions, in saying their consciences prompted them to it.

[Then a question was put for bringing in caudles; which passed in the affirmative, and they were brought in.]

Mr. Diamond. I do not think the power of parliaments in question in this case; but then, as all other powers, it must be founded upon justice, and never used but upon extraordinary occasions, and when criminals are not to be met with otherwise. The power of parliaments is not lessened, if this bill does not pass: but the question is, Whether this power shall be exerted in this case? What gentlemen say of being guided by conscience, hath no weight with me, further than that is governed by the law of the land: if it be to be admitted in the case of life and blood, why not in meum et tuum? Why was he brought to the bar then, if, according to our private judgment, we are to determine this matter? No man thought but he was guilty.—I beg leave to mention one thing that is come to my knowledge: After the trial and condemnation of Mr. Cook, I had an order sent me, that I might see him; and I went to him by virtue of that order; and the greatest part of the time I spent with him, he took up in declaring against the evidence of Goodman, and that he would receive the sacrament upon it, and give it in writing, as his dying words. I saw also three positive witnesses confront him at his trial; and when I heard him say this, it weighed so much with me, that I have very great ground of suspicion, that Goodman was perjured in the case of Cook.—Here hath been popular expressions of plots, and jacobites, that no man can apply to this particular case, or say, this a case wherein we ought to use this extraordinary power: He was in the hands of the law, and nobody can say, that the government must sink, if he does not die. If we go from the rules of justice, I believe it will give a great blow to the government.

Mr. Vernon. Sir, I rise up only upon what that worthy gentleman hath offered unto you; for I did not think to trouble you with any thing of that nature. But if you will give me leave to acquaint you with what I believe who have been later with him than this gentleman, and much offender. Sir, he does tell me, that he is very far from denying what hath been sworn against sir J. F. and himself, concerning the consultation to bring over the French; for he hath a very particular remembrance of it: And if that gentleman was to speak with him now, he would satisfy him, I believe, in that point.

And since I am up, I think every man that speaks upon this occasion, should likewise give some account of himself, in what manner, and for what reason, he discharges his conscience here: I hope I may use that word, since gentlemen make use of conscience for his acquittal; and a man ought to have a very good conscience for his condemnation.—As to sir J. F.'s innocence, I wish he had given no occasion to have it called in question: And since he did fall under this accusation, I wish he, or his counsel for him, would have taken some pains to have made his innocence appear: But I do not find the question is, whether sir J. F. is guilty? But whether there be any evidence of his guilt? And I shall tell you, in short, my opinion of that: I take the proof of the fact to be, in general, such a demonstration, as the nature of the thing is capable of; and that is sufficient, and capable to convince a reasonable, honest, unprejudiced man, of the truth of what is asserted. And there is no manner of doubt left, whether it is so or no; nor appearance of any possibility, that it could be otherwise. I think there hath been that proof in this case, and nothing attempted to disprove it, and nothing hath been proved on sir J. F.'s behalf, that any wrong hath been done him: And therefore, in short, my sense is, that whereas some gentlemen think him guilty, but the matter not proved, I think him guilty, because it is proved, and there hath been no offer made to disprove it.

Mr. Bromley Warr. Some gentlemen have spoke of the power of parliaments; but I shall say nothing to their power, which I have learned from my lord Coke, is so transcendent and absolute, that it cannot be confined within any bounds: But the more just and honourable it ought to be in its proceedings, to give an example to inferior courts. And though their power cannot be denied, yet the exercise of it hath been often censured and condemned; and acts that have passed in one parliament, have been in the same reign repealed, and sometimes severely branded, 'Id possumus, quod jure possumus.' It is certain, here is a defect of legal evidence: We are not tied here to the forms of Westminster-hall; but certainly with submission, we ought to tie ourselves up to the rules of Westminster-hall, especially when they are founded upon common justice, which is the same, is not mutable, and ought to be universal.—By the law of the land, no person ought to be convicted in cases of treason, but upon two witnesses; the law of God is the same. However, if you will pass this bill, all persons must acquiesce; and there is no disputing of your power afterwards. It hath been an argument used to day, that the security of the government requires the passing of this bill; which I think to be a good one too, if they can make it appear, that unless you proceed in this way, the government is in danger: Though I must observe, it was not that consideration, but the vindication of an honourable person's reputation, that brought this matter first before you.

—It does not appear to me, that sir J. F.'s life or death can endanger the government. You have been told of a design that he hath been engaged in, and is carried on at this time: That an invasion from France seems to threaten us: The former design hath been happily discovered and defeated; and it is not probable that sir J. F. should have any great share in any that is carrying on at present: And, as far as I can learn, he is not so considerable a man in his own person or interest, that we need fear him.

—An honourable person said, if we do not pass this bill, they that sent us here would give us no thanks. It is not a good way of arguing; but, I believe, if those look forward, they will thank us. Sir, in the act for declaring the rights and liberties of the people, you have it said, that the late king James, by the assistance of divers evil counsellors, &c. How comes it to pass, that we never have attained any of them? And if we are for proceeding in this way of attainder, because it pleases them that sent us hither, I daresay, the attainting one of those men would gratify those that sent us hither, more than the attainting twenty such as sir J. F. It was pretty well known what share some gentlemen had in bringing in of popery and arbitrary power; and I will take the liberty to say, that there is never a gentleman in this House, but believes them to be the worst of criminals.

—Upon the whole matter, I do not think you have any occasion to exert a power, that nobody denies: I see no security this will be to the government, and consequently, no necessity of it. I think you are making a most dangerous precedent, and that it will be of ill consequence to you; and therefore I am against this bill.

Mr. Smith. Sir, I will be as short as I can; and if it had not been for something in this day's debate, I should not have troubled you. As to what was said by the gentleman that spake last, of making examples of some that had been criminal in the last reign: how that came to happen, that no such examples were made, I shall not now entertain you; but I believe most of the gentlemen in the House know pretty well. But I take the matter before you is, What evidence you have to prove sir John Fenwick to be guilty? and whether there be not an extraordinary occasion at this time to exert the legislative power? I shall not enter into the matter of precedents, those are out of my province; but I have read some: however, it shall not pass upon me for a rule, because some bills have been reversed, no others shall be brought in; it is possible, that the reversing of them may be worse than the first bringing of them in.—But to apply myself to the evidence; I cannot but observe one thing, that seems this day extraordinary: we are told by some gentlemen they are against our proceeding upon this bill, because it does not quadrate to the rules of Westminster-hall; and at the same time, gentlemen take liberty to make exceptions here against that evidence that Westminster-hall has allowed: that they should take exceptions to that evidence which the law of England allows to be good! For it is notorious, it hath been admitted in Westminster-hall: and gentlemen might as well have told you, that those men that suffered died innocent, as to have denied it. And I think there is a further strengthening of his evidence; for there is not one man, who hath died upon his evidence, but hath acknowledged himself guilty of what he hath charged him with.—As to the matter of the other evidence, sir, I do not say, that it is evidence that will come at Westminster-hall; but at the same time, give me leave to tell you, they seem to lay a little stress upon it, when they tell you, they believe it was false evidence, and instance in what Cook said to a gentleman of this House, after his condemnation; but I think thus far I may say, that when you sent some of your members to examine sir J. Friend, he did own all those persons to be at that place: and that is a much better argument for the validity of Goodman's testimony. But as to the matter before you, some gentlemen have made it a question, whether sir J. Fenwick be so considerable a man, as you should proceed in this extraordinary a manner with? Though they all say, you may do it; yet at the same time, they tell you this was never put in execution, but they were in the wrong that did it.—Now, sir, the question is, whether you should make use of this power at this time? Say some, the plot is over: I wish it was: but when a conspiracy hath been laid so deep and general as this was, it is not the hanging of one or two that will make us safe; when it is apparent to you, here is all the artifice in the world, all the endeavours in the world, by sir J. F.'s friends, to remove Goodman out of the way; it is some argument that he had something to say to him: and when we see prisons broke open daily; we have known persons murdered in the streets for giving evidence. Very notorious is the case of Dods-worth: you have plots all about you; and yet can you think there is no occasion to make use of this extraordinary power?—I would have as great a conviction upon my conscience as I could; but it is very hard a man must throw his conscience aside in the case: it is very hard to believe, that if there be two witnesses produced, though I do not believe the witnesses, yet I am safe if I condemn the man; and if there be but one witness, I am to acquit the man, though I believe him to be guilty.—And though they go to scripture, to tell you there must be two witnesses, yet they do not go so far as to tell you there have been very extraordinary things done, even by God himself, for the preserving a community.—And there is the reason of it, that one witness may take away a man's life in one case, and not in another. There was a thing said, that was one thing that occasioned my standing up: a gentleman said, truly, it seemed to him to be a better way to put an end to the plot to have an act of indemnity, than the conviction of sir J. F. would be.—Sir, there seems very little reason for acts of indemnity, when we have seen an act passed so lately, which has not restrained persons; nor brought them to a sense of their duty; and we have heard persons own at your bar, that the fact was committed just after the act of indemnity. Sir, I do heartily, according to my conscience, vote for this bill.

Mr. Harcourt. Sir, I am sensible it is very difficult to say any thing, and not seem tedious at this time of night; but I take it to be my duty not to be silent in this matter. All the arguments that I remember have been made use of in any former debate, or in this day's, may be reduced, in short, to these two heads; the danger of the government, and gentlemen's private opinion.—Sir, as to the danger of the government, if any body will convince me there is such danger, (I promise him, if it be worth his while so to do) I will be his proselyte, and vote for this bill: but to tell me, the government is in danger, and that the fate of England and Europe depends upon this bill, is certainly rather offered to amuse, than to convince.—It hath been asked, Can the circumstances that sir J. F. is in admit of any danger to the government, which hath power over his liberty every day, and may restrain him of his liberty during his life? A man, by the account I have had of him, of little interest, not worth nimpence. (I have no acquaintance with him, and so I may easily mistake his circumstances.) But, sir, whatever his circumstances are, he is in safe custody, and no doubt there he will be kept; and to say the government is in danger by such a man, sure, that cannot be thought by any man living: and God forbid this should be the case of the government, that it cannot support itself without taking away this unfortunate gentleman's life, contrary to the rules of law!—For the argument of private opinion, it is almost as dangerous as the precedent you are making. I will not argue it from the case of the people, enthusiasts and madmen; but I will urge it in the case of men that sat in judgment. If opinion is to justify the condemning of a man, let us never more call the verdicts against Mr. Cornish, Mr. Sidney, lord Russel, and others, murders. Ask the jury; no doubt none of them are so silly, but in his opinion, they were guilty. But if opinion may condemn a man without proof, why not acquit him as well, where there is proof? Such a practice, I am sure, would never be endured. The properest method, I think, was proposed by the gentleman that began the debate; and I beg leave to follow the same steps, to consider his guilt, how it appears to us, and whether there be any reason for this extraordinary manner of proceeding.—The recital of that bill are the arguments for it; and those we send up to the house of lords for the passing of this bill: and first, it says, that sir J. F. was indicted by the testimony of Porter and Goodman, &c. It says, that several days were appointed for his trial, and at one of those days, the trial had come on, if it had not been for the discovery that he pretended to make; but it does not say it was put off at any other days or times, for that reason: but it goes on, and says, he hath made several reflections, &c. instead of making an ingenuous discovery; and then it recites how that Goodman is withdrawn.—I would beg leave to put gentlemen in mind of what was a great inducement to bring this bill in: it was said, that sir J. F. and his relations had done it; that they would prove that Goodman was withdrawn by his means. Give me leave to say, that there was no proof of it, unless the hearsay of Clancy, and the actions of my lady Fenwick, are to be evidence, contrary to the known laws of England, to affect this unhappy gentleman in the case of his life: I say, if any gentleman had been of another opinion, no doubt, he would have offered that amendment to the committee.—As to the discovery that sir J. F. hath made, it does not appear to me, whether it be true or false: it is one thing to give a vote to clear a gentleman's reputation, and another thing to carry it so far, as to give judgment, that the person that made those reflections shall die, and that before any proof of their falshood.—Here is an indictment found, and here is an evidence withdrawn; that is all I am satisfied in: and supposing the person guilty, it is no manner of inducement from these arguments, to proceed in this extraordinary manner. But I would consider the matter of the amendment made at the committee [‘Of which treasons he the said sir John Fenwick is guilty.’] I can't say that; and therefore I cannot vote for the bill. If he be guilty, it does not appear so by legal evidence; and therefore I am to judge him, as he appears to me, and an innocent man. The law requires two witnesses to convict a man of this crime. It is the greatest crime, and the law is so merciful, that it will not expose a man to such great penalties, without demonstrative evidence.—The first act of parliament that requires two witnesses is, 1 Edw. 6. The next is 5 Edw. 6. And upon that act, give me leave to take notice, that act goes a little further than the first; for the 5 Edw. 6. does not only say there shall be two witnesses, but it goes on, and says,—which two witnesses, (they are there called accusers, but mean the same thing,) shall be produced in person before the party at his arraignment, and shall there, before his face, maintain and avow what they have to say. So the parliament particularly provided, that there should not only be two witnesses, but that they should appear in proper person, in open court.—I beg leave to observe, that after the making of the first act, in the 2nd or 3d year of Edward 6. there was an attainder of sir Tho. Seymour, in parliament, without hearing of him; and that very self-same parliament, within two years afterwards, seems so to have resented that matter, that they made that provision, I have mentioned, in the 5 Edw. 6. and to secure, that that ill precedent should do no harm, they put in that clause. If this act passes, I wish we do not repent it in less time than that parliament did the attainder of sir Tho. Seymour. Let us be guided by the reason, the justice, and the discretion of that act, though we are not bound in our legislative capacity by the power of it. I cannot but observe, that from the making of that act, no person has been attainted in any other manner, till the duke of Monmouth: so great a veneration has that law always had in all reigns, though a multitude of conspiracies have happened in them all. I do not think it so material, that there should be two witnesses, as that these witnesses should be heard face to face, and cross-examined. It hath been told you, that it is natural justice and reason that there should be two witnesses. A gentleman asked you, where that natural justice was before the statute of Ed. 6. ? Sir, the statute of 25 Edw. 3. says, that every person that is attainted, shall be 'provably attainted;' and somewhat may be from thence inferred more than that the crime should be proved, for so must every crime. But as to the proof required by that act, and the acts of Ed. 6, all those acts, by very learned opinions, have been thought declarative of the common law: but that is scarce worth the enquiry, since it is certain how the law stands at this day.—An honourable gentleman took notice, that such evidence as we have had, and such proceedings as these, would not be reasonable in case of impeachment; but, distinguished between that proceeding and this. But certainly the reason is the same. It is true, the same persons that accuse in one case, give their judgment in the other; but in each case, such privileges as are just and reasonable, ought to be allowed to the party accused.—I shall add no more, but that we are making a precedent, which cannot be made without breaking through all the fences of the law; and when it is made, we know not who may suffer by it.

Sir Rd. Temple. As to the evidence you have before you, I appeal to any man, whether at the common law, if there was but one witness against a man, whether he was not at liberty of demanding trial by battle? Those acts that have been made since, are made certainly to provide, that in no case whatsoever, a man should be so much as accused without two witnesses of the treason.—As to what hath been said of the particular evidence before you; what hath been observed here, is a good objection in the courts below. I do not say it does disable a man from being an evidence, because he is not pardoned; but he is not so good an evidence as if he was pardoned; but that I stand upon is this: shall you come here, and make a precedent in this place to condemn a man to the highest penalties, upon less evidence than you will allow any body else to do it? That is what was never done in parliament before. Will you make a precedent in parliament, that at any time they may bring in a bill here, and judge a man to death for treason upon no evidence?—As to this bill itself, consider what a precedent you will make: there is nothing that any bill was condemned for in parliament, that is not in this bill. All mankind must perceive, that you have but one evidence, and such a one as I have told you: and whatever any man's private persuasion is, it is the proof must govern you. Then this is a law ex post facto, and that hath always been condemned; you make that evidence, that was not so before. Sir, this is, besides, making a law in a particular case, against the common law of England, and the right that every subject has: it is making a law to hang a man without a trial; it is making a law here, that was introduced here upon a pretence to make him an evidence. Every one said, that they did not seek his blood; and if that be the secret inducement in this case, it is a dangerous precedent. The earl of Exeter, when he brought the rack into the Tower, every body knows the fate that came upon him afterwards.—Let any body shew me there was any reason for reversing any act of parliament; they are all against this bill.—Then to the necessity of it; I can't imagine any thing that hath been said to you upon that, is a ground for this bill. Pray consider first, how this matter came before you; it was for an honourable person's vindication, and it was not transmitted to you by the king, but by the honourable secretary: he told you, that if you had a mind to see these papers, and required it, he had leave to let you have them; but if it had been a thing of this consequence, that the government had been in the utmost danger, would it have been transmitted only at the request of a private gentleman, and left unto you, whether you would proceed upon it or no?—But it is observed, that the plot may go on still: pray if this gentleman be cut off, does that cure it? You are secure of him now, that he can't act in it; so that I have not heard the least ground to convince me, that the government would be in less danger if this gentleman was cut off.—Sir, we are told here of going according to our consciences; give me leave to say to you what was instanced in the other day: that in the worst of times, when they did not stick at murdering of the king, yet they stuck at this; they would not allow any man to suffer upon one witness; and they did not admit of depositions against my lord Mordaunt; and my lord Mordaunt saved his life by it. You have deposed king James for breaking in upon the law; and did any body believe that Mr. Hampden was not guilty of the treason he was charged with? He owned it before this House; and yet he was tried only for misdemeanor, there being but one witness against him; and they that strained all other laws, stuck at this, and would not violate this law; so that I think there is no necessity for making such a precedent, and I think it would be the worst of precedents.

• Mr. Boscawen. I have observed upon this debate that some persons deny that it is justifiable at any time to proceed upon bills of attainder, and yet they don't dispute the power of parliaments; but at the same time say, they ought to go according to the rules of Westminster-hall.—Another says, it is the same thing whether we proceed by way of impeachment, or bill of attainder: I think him much out of the way; for in that case, the lords only are judges, and you are the prosecutors; and you don't use your legislative power in that. —A worthy friend of mine said, he had often been mistaken in his own conscience, when he thought himself very much in the right. That might be so; and if there was any room rationally to suppose, that sir John Fenwick was not guilty, I should be of opinion to be of the more favourable side; but I take it, there is no room for any man to believe but he is guilty. —Now I would examine what grounds we have to believe him guilty. Upon trials, when they charge a jury with a prisoner, one part of their charge is to enquire, whether he fled for it or no? It is notorious that sir J. F. fled for this, which is no small argument of his guilt. Another is, that he was here at the bar, and did not deny the fact; if he had confessed it, no doubt but you would have concluded him guilty; and when he does not deny it, this is the next door to it. —It hath been told you, many bills of attainder have been reversed as unjust; it hath been as notorious, that the verdicts of twelve men; and when men have been tried by their peers, have been reversed too. I will instance in two or three. The first I begin with, was that of the duke of Somerset; but nobody could say but he was guilty of the fact, for he confessed it; but there was a powerful enemy, the duke of Northumberland. The next is the duke of Norfolk, who was attainted in queen Elizabeth's time; and they were not by parliament, and yet both were reversed. And I think, as this matter stands now, some gentlemen are of opinion, by the evidence they have heard, that he is guilty; but I think nobody hath said, that it appears to him, by the evidence he hath heard, that he is innocent. Now I desire to know, whether every man must not use his conscience, to judge whether there be sufficient evidence? I acknowledge there is no sufficient evidence to convict him in Westminster-hall; but there is more to satisfy my conscience, and the world abroad, than if Goodman was here; besides his not denying it, you have the evidence of the persons that died, who owned the same thing: and I mention that the rather, because they confessed it to persons sent from this house; and did not only confess themselves to be guilty, but acknowledged, that there was such a conspiracy; and sir Wm. Parkyns acknowledged in particular, that he was to raise a troop of horse, and that the French were to be invited over: is this nothing for the legislative power, that is to secure the peace and welfare of the government? —Gentlemen say there is a great deal of danger in this matter: some, if you acquit him, others, if you condemn him. If you are satisfied he is guilty, by this bill you set up a land-mark, that others may take care they do not come into this predicament: on the other hand, if you reject this bill, you will give advantage to your enemies; when they shall see a man that is so notoriously concerned in calling in a French army, the worst of your enemies, to be scot-free. If he be guilty, what danger is there of the precedent? When a person in the like nature, that hath fled for it, that does not deny it; when living persons confess it, and dying persons confirm it, then there will be danger in such a person. —Upon the whole matter, I think there is no man that ever I heard, that does not believe him to be guilty; and it is strange you should want evidence, and yet every one think him guilty; and I think no man must be acquitted or condemned, but according to a man's conscience. —An hon. person said, Porter was no good witness: if Goodman was here, he would not be so much; and yet we must acquit him because Goodman is not here: and therefore, upon the whole, I think you will give your enemies a great advantage, if you acquit him; and if you condemn him, you will do yourselves right.

Mr. Cowper. Sir, being concerned in prosecutions of this nature without doors, I have hitherto declined concerning myself in any debate of this evidence, though unconcerned in the conduct of the evidence against sir John Fenwick; but being to give my opinion and vote as a judge, I shall crave leave to give my sense of this matter. —I would beg leave, in the first place, to make use of a distinction, which, I think, will serve to answer several of the arguments that have been made use of: I think there are two things to be considered; first, his crime, and the proof of that crime; and then the other matters done by him subsequent, &c. —The crime and proof of it that hath been given against him at your bar, is the ground by which, I think, before God and man, I ought to give my affirmative to this bill, by which you judge him to die. What he hath done subsequent, convinces me in my judgment, that we are here in a proper method and course of proceeding against him; therefore let no man say, that you have condemned him because he hath protracted his trial: no, you have condemned him for having been guilty of high treason, manifestly proved against him: then let them not say, on the other hand, will you condemn any man that is at any time guilty of high treason? No; but when a man is guilty of the worst of treasons, and this would have been manifestly proved against him in the ordinary course of proceedings, but that he, undertaking to atone for his crime, and serve his country, hath protracted his trial till one of the evidence is gone; and then, though he pretended to have a reserve, which he would make known to the king's person, yet when he thinks he is out of the ordinary reach of justice, he sets the justice of his country at defiance. These are grounds, not why he is to die, but to justify our proceeding in this manner. —Sir, I would beg leave, in a few words, to take notice of a few things said in this matter: gentlemen are afraid, that this will be made use of by posterity to the disadvantage of honest men; and you have been told, that precedents have begun with the punishment of the guilty, and then have been carried on to the punishment of those that have not been so. It is true, there hath been a very bad use made of very just acts in relation to the public: but what do gentlemen infer from that? Must we have no such things as justice? Must not the guilty be punished, because the same methods may be made use of for the punishing of honest men? I am not afraid of what use posterity will make of it; if there come times of violence when there are no parliaments, they will not want this precedent; there are others that have been cited, that will much more justify those proceedings; nay, this may protect the innocent. If a bill come to be proceeded in against another, he may say, sir J. F. was heard personally, and by his counsel; that the evidence was produced before him, and confronted with him. An innocent man may say, there was that extraordinary in his crime, which is not in mine: he would have introduced a foreign army, and afterwards have aggravated his crime, by endeavouring to abuse the king, and creating a jealousy between the king and his ministers.—Sir, in the next place it is said, that here is not legal evidence; which I think is a mistake: and, say some, though here is an evidence, that really convinces them in their consciences (I am not ashamed to make use of that word), yet they are not for passing this bill, because there is not a legal evidence. With submission, that is a mistake; before 1 Ed. 6, one witness was a good evidence in high-treason; but there was variety of opinions touching treason before that time; but neither the first nor the 5th Ed. 6, in the penning or wording of them, nor in the reason of them, were intended to extend to the high-court of parliament; so that for aught that hath been said, though one witness corroborated by circumstances, as this case is, and the confession of the party, would not be legal evidence below; yet with submission, it is a legal evidence in parliament, even according to the strict rules of law; because no law hath made two witnesses requisite in this case; so that it is a convincing evidence; I think it may be justified to be a legal evidence; and as it convinces me, that I cannot resist the belief of it, I must be for this bill, notwithstanding what some gentlemen have said, by way of endeavouring to explode conscience as a rule not to walk by in this case. One instance given against it was, because a hangman has not a discretionary power to execute a man according to his conscience, and put him to what sort of death he pleases; as if we had not a better, and more legal, and discretionary power in the high court of parliament than the hangman has.—But we are told of several instances, where mad, and hair-brained men have made use of their conscience to palliate their extravagancies. No doubt it hath, and let me tell you, religion hath been made use of as a pretence to the worst of villainies in all ages; and yet I hope they will not argue, that there ought to be no religion neither, for a guide to men's actions. When men come to be judges, I would know what rule they can have better than a se late, well-informed conscience? Below, when a legal evidence is given, yet the jury are not bound to go by that legal evidence; they are when they have heard it, judges of the fact, and are to go by no other rule, than what is ridiculed here, even the rule of their own conscience. It was said early in the debate, by a member of great reputation, that this (except Monmouth's case) is the first precedent of a bill of attainder that began in this house. It seems the ancient way was, for the lords to give the witnesses their oaths, and when they thought fit, they sent down a bill, and the commons were to proceed upon it: but I think, with submission, this is a much better way; and I had much rather give my consent upon hearing convincing evidence, and that the party has nothing to say for himself, than upon any bill transmitted from the lords, and no other evidence than that they thought fit to pass it. Some gentlemen have set a great weight, or rather mistaken the argument; say they, sir John Fenwick is not a man so considerable as to endanger the government. Admit that those that have spoke for the bill, have not made that use of the argument; but this is that I lay my finger upon in particular; it is plain he was to be general, and knew a great many of the officers. I am satisfied he hath not made that atonement to his injured country, that he ought to have done. I am satisfied that unless this bill proceed steadily against him, you will have none of that discovery.—[Here he was interrupted by the noise of some gentlemen, shewing dissatisfaction at that way of arguing.] Mr. Cowper proceeds. Do not let gentlemen pervert this argument, and say, will you hang a man if he do not confess? No: but when I have heard proof, that he is guilty of the worst of treasons, and hath aggravated his crime in that manner which he hath done, he deserves to die; unless he will merit his life by a discovery of what he knows. I think it is of the highest importance to you, that can be, that you should come to the further knowledge of the other branch of the conspiracy; the meeting of the French king's forces in England. I think you are in a proper method, and perhaps may have a better issue of this bill than his death; but if not, he will but pay the debt which he owes to the justice of his country.

Mr. Paget. Sir, I cannot believe but I shall be heard, as to the little I have to say, with some uneasiness, after so long a debate. But, sir, since I did take the liberty to give my opinion, why I was against this bill before: I think it as reasonable to give you my reasons, why I do not stand convinced by the arguments I have yet heard. And that I may the better give you my reasons, I shall, as well as I can remember, repeat some of the arguments that have been urged for the passing of it. If I mistake not, some of the arguments have run upon the power and prerogative of parliament; some upon what was proper evidence in this high court of parliament, other than what would be in other places; others upon the extraordinariness of the occasion. As to the first of these arguments; since gentlemen, much more experienced in rules of parliament, do not think fit to deliver their private opinion, what rules parliaments may in reason be supposed to have, I shall not say any thing to that:—As to the arguments, of what evidence shall be sufficient to adjudge a man to death in this house: I confess, I shall at all times be very careful how I give my opinion in matters of life and death; because I think the greatest caution is to be used in that case; and for this reason, I cannot consent to give my opinion in one case, that I shall think fit to retract in any case afterwards. If I understand the meaning of the house, it is not in favour to sir J. F. himself that gentlemen oppose this bill, but for fear of ushering in a precedent, that may be made use of against a better man. I confess, here is a worthy member that spake last, said something in his argument that hath some weight with me. I did apprehend by the general debate of the house, that the parliament had no rules at all, but what they would fix to themselves: but I have a good regard for his opinion: but if he says true, the evidence before you is not legal evidence in Westminster-hall; but it is legal evidence according to the rules of proceeding in the high court of parliament: but I think, truly, if they may be presumed to have any rules to go by, nothing is so plain to me, as that a rule of their own of so late date, as the act for regulating trials in cases of treason, should be a rule to them: and it is said in that act, that after such a day no person shall be brought to trial in any case of treason, &c. but he shall be condemned upon the evidence of two witnesses; and I must needs say, that act that was passed last sessions, is so much for the liberty of the people of England, that I think it will be very hard to repeal that substantial part of the law so soon after it was made.—As to the extraordinariness of the case, I am sensible what stress hath been laid on that argument, as if the strength of this government did in some measure depend upon your disposal of this matter one way or the other: and since that is the case, I shall speak tenderly of it; for I do as much abhor acts of treason against the government, as any man that hath spoke for this bill: I think as the crime is to be distinguished from all others, as being a more than ordinary crime, so I think the person that is concerned, must be extraordinary: and I think, with submission, there is some difference between principals and seconds in an act of treason. When you cannot come at a man being at the head of a rebellion, it may be reasonable to proceed by bill of attainder; but I think it is not to be used upon all occasions, or when you may come at a person another way; which, I think, is the case of this gentleman. I am of opinion, that there does not depend more upon sir J. F. now, than when he was first taken. Why he was not tried, I shall not examine the reason; I suppose it was because he gave some assurance of his confession; truly, I have heard no other reason for proceeding against him now, but those papers which have been adjudged scandalous, and are so to all intents and purposes, I do think truly; but the liberty of the people of England is very much concerned in the revocation of that act, which was promoted for the liberty of the people; and none of the arguments that have been used can convince me, that I ought to give judgment upon less evidence, than is provided by that act.

Mr. Sloane. Sir, I hardly thought I should have needed to have troubled you with my thoughts in this matter, but that this honourable gentleman that spake last, has gone so far in his reason, as to speak to matter of law: he seems to extenuate the fault of sir J. F.; and gives it as a reason why he should not be attainted by this bill, for that he was none of the principals, but only an accessory; there is no gentleman of the gown but will tell you, that there is no accessories in cases of treason, but they are all principals, and equally guilty; and there is no evidence in this case to make him accessory, but he is either principal or nothing.—When I have made this observation, give me leave to tell you my own thoughts: as every man is to be saved by his own faith, so may my salvation depend upon my opinion, according to my conscience in this matter, which is for passing this bill.—The last time, I gave you my reasons why I was for this bill; and yet I have not heard them answered, though a gentleman said I answered myself; but I will state the case, and desire him to reply to me. I did say then, sir, and do so again, that I do not think those scandalous papers any reason to provoke you to pass this bill; and I do think, if he should be threatened, it would be a blemish upon his confession. Another thing I put out of the case, that he is a man so dangerous to the government, that if he escape, we are all undone. I do take him, that in his person, interest and friends, he is not so; and would not have that be a motive for the passing of this bill; but take it upon the evidence that is before us, and the nature of our proceedings; then I will say, we have great reason to proceed upon this bill, for the preservation of the government, and for this reason; whereas it is insisted on one side, that here are the laws and liberties of England at stake, and nobody knows whose case may be next. Sir, if we do not go upon good grounds and reasons, that we do not fear any body's following, God forbid we should make this a precedent! But pray turn the tables on the other side, and see what the case will be; that here is a gentleman that every body of the house does believe guilty; that he hath been in a conspiracy to bring in the French, and depose the king ; and the man came before us, and we had no power to reach him ; what will be the precedent on the other side ? It will be easy to take off one of the witnesses by men of great estates, and then there is no coming at them, even by the parliament themselves : this parliament was of opinion, that they could not come at sir J. F. though they were of opinion that he was guilty.—But now, Sir, to that which is the question : it is allowed by every body, you may do what you please ; but without straining your legislative power, I shall offer my thoughts and reasons for it, upon these three points : that the fact is treason ; that he is plainly guilty ; and that we have a plain jurisdiction in this case, in the ordinary methods and proceedings of parliament.—Sir, the fact is treason, the meeting at several times, and conspiring and consulting to bring in a French power to depose the king. You have been told by several persons, and the counsel at the bar, that such meetings without some other overt-act, is not treason ; but I affirm the contrary, for that is an overt-act of compassing the death of the king : and sir Barth. Shower, who did insist upon it at the bar, did otherwise act his part upon it at the trial of Mr. Cook ; for he offered it at first, but afterwards he deserted it, as a thing he could not stand upon ; for it is the opinion of all the judges, upon a late resolution.—Then, Sir, the fact being treason, is no act ex post facto. We are not making that treason which was not so, but we are only judging of the fact that was treason before ; though if it was a doubt whether it was treason or no, the parliament hath a power by 25 Edw. 3, to judge that treason, that the courts below have no power of. The next thing is, whether there be sufficient evidence of his treason before us ? I will put it out of the case as no conclusive evidence at all, what Goodman hath said upon his oath (further than that there was such a witness that did and could swear such a thing, and that he was examined before the jury ;) and this I will take upon me to say (and I will give my reason for my opinion), that the parliament is not obliged to two witnesses by any law now in being. It hath been told you, that from the time of Edw. 3, one witness was sufficient till the statute of Edw. 6. Now I will prove to you, from the statute of Phil. and Mary, that, by the common law, and all the time between the reign of Edw. 3. and Edw. 6. one witness was sufficient for this treason. For that statute of Phil. and Mary does say, that any person that shall bring from beyond sea any false and counterfeit coin, or be accused or impeached of any offence concerning the impairing, counterfeiting, or forging of any coin current within this realm, shall, and may be indicted, arraigned, convicted, or attainted by such-like evidence, and in such-like manner as was accustomed before the first year of king Edw. 6. Now, what was the reason of that statute before the statute of Edw. 6 ? Those counterfeits were to be tried by one witness ; and therefore at this day all the counterfeiters and utterers of false coin have been attainted by one witness. It is said again, that there is the law of nations, and the law of God, to the contrary. Gentlemen have said several times already, that in murder and felony one witness is sufficient ; which, saving some little parts of the judgment as to the forfeiture and attainting of the blood, is the same penalties. We are not in the land where that law was in force, for by that law, as to common felons, there was a restitution only : But I would put a gentleman that sits by the bar this case ; by the same law of Deuteronomy and Numbers, that he hath quoted, adultery is death : will you be contented that that should be so here ? They are either all of them in force, or none of them in force. I do say, that by the statute of Edw. 3. and ever after, till the statute of Edw. 6, one witness was sufficient to convict any man of treason. And I do say, that the statutes of Edw. 6 do not preclude the parliament from any method of proceedings. The statute says, that no man shall be indicted, &c. nor shall they proceed upon such indictment. From which words in the statute, I do plainly make it appear to any gentleman that will read it, it is confined only to the courts of Westminster-hall : For certainly, you cannot call a bill of attainder to be a proceeding upon an indictment. What I say, is only to discharge my own conscience, and to salve the tender consciences of them that hear me ; and therefore, I desire them never to say, that there ought to be two witnesses, before they answer what I have said upon that statute. Then, Sir, you have need but of one witness, and you have had captain Porter before you ; who, I think, notwithstanding all that hath been said, is a credible witness. A gentleman made some objections to his credit, and told you, he was not to be believed, because he was in the same conspiracy, and had been in such a villainous action : But, Sir, the same gentleman hath often confined you to the rules of Westminster-hall ; and he hath told you, it is a wrong place here, and that a man has not so good a trial here as in Westminster-hall. Why ? the thing that was spoke of, of his being concerned in the assassination, and of his being a fellow-conspirator with them, which is now urged as an objection before you, is no objection in Westminster-hall. I would only take notice of another objection this gentleman made to the witness, which he said he had from the bar ; which was, that captain Porter was not pardoned, and he was now drudging for his pardon : But that is so far from what ought to be quoted, that he that said it ought to be reprimanded for it. He made another objection against his being a good witness, and compared it to the case of an hundredor : but he did not remember, that the man that was robbed is a good witness ; and the reason is, because of the necessity of the thing, and that no others can be ; and the defendant in an hundred cannot be a witness because there may be others ; and that is the reason of this case. And for the precedents in R. 3rd's and Hen. 4th's time, no gentlemen can insist upon them, considering the differences of the crown, and the one attained the other: and they were not reversed upon the point of jurisdiction, but because of the different rights of the kings; and nobody had pretended to answer the case of the Regicides; they were not left to the law, I mean such as were actually tried before the parliament; but the parliament passed different judgment on them; and some of them were in custody. What was told you of Cromwell's case and others, they go upon the same reason, that they were not heard, though they were in custody.

Col. Wharton. A gentleman lately told you, we had lately passed an act for trials in cases of treason, and now we are in this proceeding, about doing something that is contrary to it: That is a thing that would stick with me, if I could not answer it; but I appeal to every gentleman in this house, whether that act hath any sort of relation to trials in parliament; for that is only to direct the courts in Westminster-hall. I have only this to say; I think the evidence very full before you. I think you have had one very good witness, and the counsel for the prisoner had liberty to confront him: If he had not been guilty, the prisoner at the bar would have denied it: I am convinced of the truth of it, and my conscience is to make a judgment upon it, and that is all we can go by.

Mr. Jeffreys. A worthy gentleman of the long robe hath taken pains to find out precedents to justify our proceedings; and another says, there is no act to circumscribe our proceedings. But since gentlemen differ so much, it gives me a great deal of caution. This I know, there is a law of the land by which persons ought to be governed: I take this to be an extraordinary method of proceeding, and I hope the lords will take more care of the matter than the commons.

Mr. Ed. Harley. Sir, I cannot satisfy myself to be for this bill; and in a few words, I shall give my reason for it. It hath been said, that the parliament is unlimited. I do agree, that we are not tied to the rules of Westminster-hall. I shall only mention the reason why two witnesses are required in cases of high-treason. If any will look into the history of England, they will find it hath been often the design of the crown to trump up plots upon the subject; and therefore these acts took particular care there should be two witnesses to prove the fact: This is the reason of the law, and, I think, upon it the liberty of the subject is founded; and therefore I cannot be for this bill.

Then the question for passing this Bill was put, and the House divided. Ayes, 189; Noes, 156.

Being thus carried in the affirmative, the Bill was sent up to the Lords for their concurrence.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Lords took a very extraordinary method to force their absent members to come to town. They sent messengers for them to bring them up; which seemed to be a great breach on their dignity; for the privilege of making a proxy was an undoubted right belonging to that peerage; but those, who intended to throw out the bill, resolved to have a full House. The bill met with great opposition; and the debates were the warmest, and lasted the longest, of any that had ever been.

The substance of the arguments in the House of Lords, brought against this way of proceeding by bill of attainder, was, that the law was all men's security, as well as it ought to be their rule: If this was once broke through, no man was safe: men would be presumed guilty without legal proofs, and be run down, and destroyed by a torrent: two witnesses seemed necessary, by an indisputable law of justice, to prove a man guilty: the law of God given to Moses, as well as the law of England, made this necessary: And, besides all former ones, the law lately made for trials in cases of treason was such a sacred one, that it was to be hoped, that even a parliament would not make a breach upon it. A written deposition was no evidence, because the person accused could not have the benefit of cross interrogating the witness, by which much false swearing was often detected: Nor could the evidence given in one trial be brought against a man, who was not a party in that trial: the evidence, that was offered to a grand jury, was to be examined all over again, at the trial; till that was done, it was not evidence. It did not appear, that Fenwick himself was concerned in the practice upon Porter: What his lady did, could not be charged on him. No evidence was brought, that Goodman was practised on; so his withdrawing himself could not be charged on Fenwick. Some very black things were proved against Goodman, which would be strong enough to set aside his testimony, though he were present; and that proof, which had been brought in Cook's trial, against Porter's evidence, was again made use of, to prove, that, as he was the single witness, so he was a doubtful and suspected one: nor was it proper, that a bill of this nature should begin in the House of Commons, which could not take examinations upon oath. These were the arguments used by the Lords, as well as the Commons, against the bill.

On the other side, bishop Burnet being convinced, that Fenwick was guilty, and that the method of proceeding by way of attainder was not only lawful, but, in some cases, necessary, and having, moreover, by his search into parliamentary proceedings, on such occasions, when he wrote the History of the Reformation, seen further into those matters than otherwise he should ever have done, he thought it incumbent upon him, when his opinion determined him to the severer side, to open his reasons in justification of his vote ; which he did, to this effect :

“ The nature of government required, that the legislature should be recurred to, in extraordinary cases, for which effectual provision could not be made by fixed and standing laws. Our common law grew up out of the proceedings of the courts of law : afterwards this, in cases of treason, was thought too loose ; so the law, in this point, was limited, first, by the famous statute in Edw. 3d's time ; and then, by the statute of Ed. 4th's time, the two witnesses were to be brought face to face with the person accused ; and the law, lately made, had brought the method of treason to a yet further certainty. Yet, in that, as well as in the statute of Edw. 3, parliamentary proceedings were still excepted. And, indeed, though no such provision had been expressly made in the acts themselves, the nature of government puts always an exception in favour of the legislative authority. The legislature was, indeed, bound to observe justice and equity, as much if not more, than the inferior courts ; because the supreme court ought to set an example to all others. But they might see cause to pass over forms, as occasion should require. This was the more reasonable among us, because there was no nation in the world, besides England, that had not recourse to torture, when the evidence was probable, but defective. That was a mighty restraint, and struck a terror into all people : and the freest government, both ancient and modern, thought they could not subsist without it. At present, the Venetians have their civil jurisdictions, and the Grisons have their high courts of justice, which act without the forms of law, by the absolute trust that is reposed in them ; such as the Romans reposed in dictators, in the time of their liberty. England had neither torture, nor any unlimited magistrate in its constitution ; and therefore upon great emergencies, recourse must be had to the supreme legislature. Forms are necessary in subordinate cases ; but there is no reason to tie up the supreme one by them. This method of attainder had been practised among us at all times. It is true, what was done in this way at one time, was often reversed at another ; but that was the effect of the violence of the times, and was occasioned often by the injustice of those attainers. The attainers of inferior courts were, upon the like account, often reversed : But, when parliamentary attainers went upon good grounds, though without observing the forms of law, they were never blamed, nor to say condemned. When poisoning was first practised in England, and put in a pot of porridge in the bishop of Rochester's house, this, which was only felony, was, by a special law, made to be high treason ; and a new punishment was appointed by act of parliament. The poisoner was boiled alive. When the nun of Kent pretended to visions, to oppose Henry 8's divorce, and his second marriage ; and said, if he married again, he should not live long after it, but should die a villain's death ; this was judged in parliament to be high treason ; and she and her accomplices suffered accordingly. After that, there passed many attainders in that reign, only upon depositions, that were read in both houses of parliament. It is true, these were much blamed ; and there was great cause for it : There were too many of them ; for this extreme way of proceeding is to be put in practice but seldom, and upon great occasions ; whereas many of these went upon slight grounds, such as the suffering some passionate and indecent words, or the using some embroidery in garments and coats of arms with an ill intent. But that, which was indeed execrable, was, that persons in prison were attainted, without being heard in their defence. This was so contrary to natural justice, that it could not be enough condemned. In Edward 6's time, the lord Seymour was attainted in the same manner, only with this difference, that the witnesses were brought to the bar, and there examined ; whereas formerly they proceeded upon some depositions, that were read to them. At the duke of Somerset's trial, which was both for high treason and for felony, in which he was acquitted of the treason, but found guilty of the felony, depositions were only read against him ; but the witnesses were not brought face to face, as he pressed they might be. Upon which it was, that the following parliament enacted, that the accusers (that is, the witnesses) should be examined face to face, if they were alive. In Elizabeth's time, the parliament went out of the method of law, in all the steps of their proceedings against the queen of Scots. It is true, there were no parliamentary attainers in England during that long and glorious reign, upon which these, who opposed the bill, had insisted much ; yet that was only, because there then was no occasion here in England for any such bill. But in Ireland, where some things were notoriously true, which yet could not be legally proved, that government was forced to have, on many different occasions, recourse to this method. In James 1's time, those, who were concerned in the Gunpowder Plot, and chose to be killed, rather than taken, were by act of parliament attainted after their death ; which the courts of law could not do, since, by our law a man's crimes die with himself ; for this reason, because he cannot make his own defence, nor can his children do it for him. The famous attainer of the earl of Strafford, in king Charles 1's time, has been much and justly censured, not so much because it passed by bill, as because of the injustice of it. He was accused for having said, upon the house of commons refusing to grant the subsidies, which the king had asked, ‘ That the king was absolved from all the rules of government, and might make use of force to subdue this kingdom.’ These words were proved only by one witness, all the rest of the council who were present, deposing, that they remembered no such words, and were positive, that the debate ran only upon the war with

Scotland: so that though 'this kingdom,' singly taken, must be meant of England, yet it might well be meant of 'that kingdom,' which was the subject then of the debate. Since then the words were capable of that favourable sense, and that both he, who spoke them, and they, who heard them, affirmed, that they were meant and understood in that sense, it was a most pernicious precedent, first to take them in the most odious sense possible, and then to destroy him, who said them, upon the testimony of one single exceptionable witness. Whereas if, upon the commons refusing to grant the king's demand, he had plainly advised the king to subdue his people by force, it is hard to tell, what the parliament might not justly have done, or would not do again in the like case. In Charles 2's time some of the most eminent of the regicides were attainted, after they were dead in king James's time the duke of Monmouth was attainted by bill. These last attainders had their first beginning in the house of commons. Thus it appeared, that, these last two hundred years, not to mention much antienter precedents, the nation had upon extraordinary occasions proceeded in this parliamentary way by bill. There were also many precedents of this method. And whereas it was said, that an ill parliament might carry these too far, it is certain, that the nation, and every person in it, must be safe, when they are in their own hands, or in those of a representative chosen by themselves. As, on the other hand, if that be ill chosen, there is no help for it; the nation must perish, for it is by their own fault. They have already too many precedents for this way of proceeding, if they intend to make an ill use of them. But a precedent is only a ground or warrant for the like proceeding upon the like occasion. Two rules were laid down for all bills of this nature; first, that the matter be of a very extraordinary nature. Lesser crimes had better be passed over than punished by the legislature. Of all the crimes, that can be contrived against the nation, certainly the most heinous one is, that of bringing in a foreign force to conquer us. This ruins both us and our posterity for ever. Distractions at home, how fatal soever, even though they should end ever so tragically, as ours once did in the murder of the king and in a military usurpation, yet were capable of a crisis and a cure. In the year 1660, we came again to our wits, and all was set right again. Whereas there is no prospect, after a foreign conquest, but of slavery and misery. And, how black soever the assassinating a king must need appear, yet a foreign conquest is worse; it is assassinating the kingdom; and therefore the inviting and contriving that must be the blackest of crimes. But, as the importance of the matter ought to be equal to such an unusual way of proceeding, so the certainty of the facts ought to be such, that, if the defects in legal proof are to be supplied, yet this ought to be done upon such grounds, as make the fact charged appear so evidently true, that though a court of law could not proceed upon it, yet no man could raise in himself a doubt concerning it. Antiently treason was judged as a felony still is, upon such presumptions, as satisfied the jury. The law has now limited this to two witnesses brought face to face. But the parliament may still take that liberty, which is denied to inferior courts, of judging this matter, as an ordinary jury does in a case of felony. In the present case there was one witness viva voce, upon whose testimony several persons had been condemned, and had suffered; and these neither at their trial, nor at their death, disproved or denied any circumstance of his depositions. If he had been too much a libertine in the course of his life, that did not destroy his credit as a witness. In the first trial this might have made him a doubtful witness; but what had happened since had destroyed the possibility even of suspecting his evidence. A party had been in interest concerned to inquire into his whole life, and in the present case had full time for it; and every circumstance of his deposition had been examined; and yet nothing had been discovered, that could so much as create a doubt. All was still untouched, sound, and true. The only circumstance, in which the dying speeches of those, who suffered on his evidence, seemed to contradict him, was concerning king James's commission; yet none of them denied really what Porter had deposed, which was, that Charnock told him, that there was a commission come from king James for attacking the prince of Orange's guards. They only denied, that there was a commission for assassinating him. Sir John Friend and sir Wm. Perkins were condemned for the consultation now given in evidence against sir John Fenwick. They died not denying it. On the contrary they justified all they had done. It could not be supposed, that, if there had been a tittle in the evidence that was false, they should both have been so far wanting to themselves and to their friends, who were to be tried upon the same evidence, as not to have declared it in the solemnest manner. These things were more undeniably certain than the evidence of ten witnesses could possibly be. Witnesses might conspire to swear a falsehood; but, in this case, the circumstances took away the possibility of a doubt. And therefore the parliament, without taking any notice of Goodman's evidence, might well judge Fenwick guilty; for no man could doubt of it in his own mind. The antient Romans were very jealous of their liberty; but, how exact soever they might be in ordinary cases, yet, when any of their citizens seemed to have a design of making himself king, they either created a dictator, to suppress or destroy him, or else the people proceeded against him in a summary way. By the Porcian law, no citizen could be put to death for any crime whatsoever; yet such regard did the Romans pay to justice, even above law, that, when the Campanian legion had perfidiously broke in upon Rhegium, and pilaged it, they put them all to death for it. In the famous case of Catiline's conspiracy, as the evidence was clear, and the danger extreme, the accomplices in it were executed, notwithstanding the Porcian law. And this was done by the order of the senate, without either hearing them make their own defence, or admitting them to claim the right, which the Valerian law gave them, of an appeal to the people, yet that whole proceeding was chiefly directed by the two greatest asserters of public liberty, that ever lived, Cato and Cicero. And Cæsar, who opposed it on pretence of its being against the Porcian law, was for that reason suspected of being in the confederacy. It appeared afterwards, how little regard he had, either to law or liberty, though, upon this occasion, he had made use of the one to protect those, who were in a plot against the other."

This last expression was much resented by those, who were against the bill, as carrying a severe reflection upon them for opposing it; and indeed the bishop, though he only offered what reasons occurred to him to justify his voting for the bill, fell under a great load of censure on this occasion. In conclusion, the bill passed by a small majority of seven voices only, there being 66 for it, and 60 against it.

A List of the Lords for and against the Bill.

Bishops for the Bill.—Canterbury, Litchfield, Sarum, Chester, Ely, Oron, Norwich, Peterborough, Gloucester, Bristol, Lincoln, Chichester^a.

Lords Temporal for the Bill.—Prince George, Norfolk, Southampton, Richmond, St. Albans, Bolton, Schomberg, Newcastle, Oxford, Derby, Suffolk, Bridgewater, Bolingbroke, Manchester, Rivers, Sumford, Sunderland, Sandwich, Essex, Macclesfield, Radnor, Portland, Mounmouth, Montague, Marlborough, Scarborough, Warrington, Bradford, Romney, Tankerville, Abergavenny, Delaware, Berkley, Morley, Ewre, Wharton, Sidney, Lovelace, Howard, Raby, Vaughan, Ward, Culpeper, Lucas, Rockingham, Berkley, Cornwallis, Osborn, Ossulston, Chohnondley, Ashburnham, Weston, Reibert, Taversham. In all 66.

Bishops against the Bill.—London, Durham, Winton, Rochester, Exeter, St. David, Hereford, Bath and Wells.

Lords Temporal against the Bill.—Leeds, Pembroke, Somerset, Ormsby, Northumberland, Devonshire, Halifax, Norwiche, Lindsey, Derby, Kent, Huntington, Northampton, Bristol, Wicheley, Kingston, Camelford, Thame, Scarsdale, Bath, Chace, Dudley, Reversham, Sussex, Berkley, Nottingham, Manchester, Alington, Carlisle, Torrington, Macc-

Protest thereon.—The Lords who were for the negative entered the following Protest:

"Because bills of attainder against persons in prison, and who are therefore liable to be tried by law, are of dangerous consequence to the lives of the subject, and, as we conceive, may tend to the subversion of the laws of this kingdom.—Because the evidence of grand jurymen, of what was sworn before them against sir J. F. as also the evidence of the petty jurymen, of what was sworn at the trial of other men, were admitted here; both which are against the rules of law; besides that they disagreed in their testimony.—Because the information of Goodman in writing was received, which is not by law to be admitted; and the prisoner for want of his appearing face to face, as is required by law, could not have the advantage of cross-examining him.—And it did not appear by any evidence, that sir J. F., or any other person employed by him, had any way persuaded Goodman to withdraw himself; and it would be of very dangerous consequence, that any person so accused should be condemned; for by this means a witness, who shall be found insufficient to convict a man, shall have more power to hurt him by his absence, than he could have if he were produced viva voce against him.—And if Goodman had appeared against him, yet he was so infamous in the whole course of his life, and particularly for the most horrid blasphemy which was proved against him, that no evidence for him could or ought to have any credit, especially in the case of blood. So that in this case, there was but one witness, viz. Porter; and he, as we conceive, a very doubtful one.—Lastly, because sir J. F. is so inconsiderable a man, as to the endangering the peace of the government, that there needs no necessity of proceeding against him in this extraordinary manner. (Signed) Hambleton, Thet, N. All the Punishment being remitted but Beheading, on the 23th of January 1697, sir John Fenwick was brought to a Scaffold erected on Tower Hill, where he delivered this PAPER to the Sheriffs.

"Speaking nor writing was never my talent: I shall therefore give a very short, but faithful account, first, of my religion, and next, what I suffer most innocently for, to avoid the calumnies I may reasonably expect my enemies will cast upon me when dead; since they have most falsely and maliciously aspersed me, whilst under my misfortunes.

"As for my religion, I was brought up in the church of England, as it is established by law, and have ever professed it; though I confess I have been an unworthy member of it, in not living up to the strict and excellent rules thereof; for which I take shame to myself, and humbly ask forgiveness of God. I come now to die in that Communion, trusting, as an humble and hearty penitent, to be received by the mercy of God, through the merits of Jesus Christ my Saviour.

"My religion taught me my loyalty, which I bless God is unfainted; and I have ever endeavoured in the station wherein I have been placed, to the utmost of my power, to support the crown of England in the true and lineal course of descent, without interruption.

"As for what I am now to die, I call God to witness, I went not, to that meeting in Leadenhall street with any such intention as to invite king James by force to invade this nation; nor was I myself provided with either horse or arms, or engaged for any number of men, or gave particular consent for any such invasion, as is most falsely sworn against me.

"I do also declare, in the presence of God, that I knew nothing of king James's coming to Calais, nor of any invasion intended from thence, till it was publicly known: And the only notion I had, that something might be attempted, was from the Toulon fleet coming to Brest.

"I also call God to witness that I received the knowledge of what is contained in those papers that I gave to a great man, that came to me in the Tower, both from letters and messages that came from France; and he told me, when I read them to him, that the prince of Orange had been acquainted with most of those things before.

"I might have expected mercy from that prince, because I was instrumental in saving his life: For when, about April 1695, an attempt formed against him came to my knowledge, I did, partly by dissuasions, and partly by delays, prevent that design; which, I suppose, was the reason that the last villainous project was concealed from me.

"If there be any persons whom I have injured in word or deed, I heartily pray their pardon, and beg of God to pardon those who have injured me; particularly those who with great zeal have sought my life, and brought the guilt of my innocent blood upon this nation, no treason being proved upon me.

"I return my most hearty thanks to those noble and worthy persons who gave me their assistance by opposing this bill of attainder, without which, it had been impossible I could have fallen under the sentence of death. God bless them and their posterity; though I am fully satisfied they pleaded their own cause, while they defended mine.

"I pray God to bless my true and lawful sovereign King James, the queen, and the prince of Wales, and restore him and his posterity to this throne again, for the peace and prosperity of this nation; which is impossible to prosper, till the government is settled upon a right foot.

"And now, O God! I do with all humble devotion commend my soul into thy hands, the great Maker and Preserver of men, and lover of souls; beseeching thee that it may be always dear and precious in thy sight, through the merits of my Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen."

"JOHN FENWICK."

Then he submitted to the block, and the executioner severed his head from his body.

395. The Case, with the Proceedings against Major JOHN BERNARDI,* Mr. COUNTER, Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. CASSELS, Mr. CHAMBERS, and Mr. MELDRUM, on Account of the Assassination-Plot: 8 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1696. [Written by Major John Bernardi, in Newgate, after he had been there near thirty-three Years a Prisoner; (though in the Historical Part abridged) without any Allowance from the Government, and who could never be admitted to Bail, or take his Trial.†]

MAJOR John Bernardi was the son of Francis Bernardi, descended of an ancient noble family, counts of the holy empire, &c. This Francis was sent to England by the serene republic of Genoa, with credentials from the duke and governors of that state, in the character of agent, and afterwards of that of resident, from 1651, until after the happy restoration of king Charles 2. We find, that on Tuesday, Sept. 16, 1651, on a Report from the Speaker, "It was resolved by the parliament to receive Francis Bernardi, agent from the commonwealth of Genoa, according to the rule for receiving agents." And on the 22d of June, 1660, signior Francis Bernardi was appointed resident from the said commonwealth to England, to congratulate his majesty on his happy return to his kingdoms. But about two years afterwards the republic sent over another person to succeed the said signior Francis Bernardi; and as he was born in England, at the time when his father count Philip de Bernardi was here also in embassy, and loving the country as the place of his nativity, he lived and died in this kingdom, having spent near thirty thousand pounds in hospitality, and in indulging a particular taste in gardening, being the most famous gentleman in the kingdom of his time for fine gardens. He lived some time near Windsor, when first out of his ministry; but removed afterwards into Worcestershire, to be more remote and unknown. Here, his son

John began to entertain thoughts of getting from under his father's discipline, who used him with great severity; sometimes confining him like a criminal in a little dark room for trifles, allowing him only bread and small beer; and whilst so confined, nobody durst relieve him, or let him out. Thus this John Bernardi was unhappily destined to confinement in his youth by an unkind father, and in his old age to undergo the like rigid fate by unpremeditated acts of parliament, without ever being heard, or proved criminal by any court in the kingdom.

Accordingly John Bernardi escaped from his father in the year 1670, leaving him asleep in his bed; and going out of his gate, he knelt down on the ground, protesting and praying, that he might never return whilst his father lived. He began his journey towards Coventry, and, though pursued, had the good luck to escape, and got to sir Clement Fisher's seat at Packington, near that city, whose lady was the heroic Mrs. Jane Lane, who protected and conducted king Charles 2, after the battle of Worcester, (so often mentioned in the history of those times) and who was very intimate with young Bernardi's father: But sir Clement and his lady were gone to London two days before, whither young Bernardi followed them. On hearing his case, they did not persuade him to return; but recommended him by letter to captain Littleton Clent, a relation of her ladyship's, then in garrison at Portsmouth, and equipped him with necessaries and money for his journey. On his arrival at Portsmouth the captain received him very obligingly, and entered him in his own company, and taught him all the duty and exercise of a soldier. This little young Bernardi was very fond of, and passed through various posts (in Holland) in the army; for he had seven commissions in all, five of which were conferred on him by his highness the prince of Orange, the sixth by the States-General and the prince of Orange, and the seventh by king James 2, before the revolution. He attained the rank of a captain at 27 years of age. At the siege of Maestricht he lost an eye, and was shot through one of his arms, the bones of which were dashed to splinters; after wrapping his arm in the flap

* Johnson, in his Life of Pope, has gratified his dislike of king William by mention of "the poor conspirator who died lately" [nearly half a century before the time when Johnson was writing] "in prison, after a confinement of more than 40 years without any crime proved against him." Bernardi has an article in the Biographia, and an account is given of him in the Gentleman's Magazine for the year 1780.

† "As many people are unacquainted with the reasons why those persons, suspected of being concerned in the assassination-plot, lay so long in Newgate, without being either bailed, tried, or discharged; this account, wrote by major Bernardi, (one of those taken up and confined) will explain the cause of it." of his coat, he crowded back to the breach, and fell down to the bottom amongst the dead, (the ground being covered with them;) when a soldier under his command seeing him fall, jumped after him, took him up in his arms, and ran to the trenches with him, where surgeons are always waiting on those occasions: and thus saved his ensign from bleeding to death. The prince of Orange hearing of it, immediately promoted Bernardi, and ordered him, with the other wounded officers, to be conducted to Bois-le-duc: but Bernardi not being able to endure the jolting of the carriage, was laid on the ground, till his servant went to get men to carry him back to the hospital. When he was pretty well recovered, he went with his arm in a sling to Utrecht: but not being able to do duty for some time in his regiment, he made his addresses to a maiden lady, well born and bred, but near twice as old as himself, he being then about 20; but her fortune being considerable for one in so low a post, he married her in April 1677, and lived with her 11 years. In 1687, when king James 2 demanded the six regiments he had lent the Dutch, and they refused to return them, about sixty officers quitted that service; amongst whom was captain Bernardi, who thinking it his duty to obey the commands of his prince, came to England. In 1688, when the prince of Orange landed in England, and succeeding in his enterprize, king James 2, after many difficulties and dangers risked by him, got privately away from Rochester over into France; when major-general Kirk was sent by the prince of Orange to all the regiments then in England, with an association to be signed by all the officers, the contents of which were to bind them under their hands to stand by and defend the prince against all persons whatsoever, and all the officers that refused to sign it, were ordered to quit their commands. Captain Bernardi refused to sign such association, and quitted his employ, went to London, and solicited for the prince of Orange's pass for himself and family, being six in number, to go out of the kingdom, the only favour he desired, which was granted him; those persons that went without a pass being in danger of their lives, or being plundered by the mob. Captain Bernardi got safe to Calais, and found many English gentlemen arrived there before him, some of whom were his acquaintance, and in great distress for want of money to bear their charges to Paris, having been stripped of all they had by the tumults in England. Bernardi having got to the value of above 100*l.* in cloaths, linen, tent and field equipage, pawned them all to a broker for less than half their value, to assist some of those gentlemen; whereby he lost his goods, not having an opportunity of redeeming them in time. Captain Bernardi arriving at St. Germain, king James 2 told him, that he was just going to Ireland, and had then about 2,300 of his subjects arrived at St. Germain's. The French king granted orders for them to march to Brest, where the late earl of Dover was ordered to meet and receive them: In the mean time king James went to Brest, where the French king had ordered a large fleet, of about thirty-five sail, to receive him and his soldiers, and land them in Ireland; and in getting thither was the famous battle with admiral Herbert in Bantry-Bay. But king James's affairs growing bad in Ireland, he sent major Bernardi (made a major in Ireland) to Scotland, to accompany the earl of Seaforth, then going to raise men for king James: but receiving the news of king James's being defeated at the battle of the Boyne, the earl of Seaforth dismissed his forces, and sent them to their places of abode, without consulting his uncle, his officers, &c. who were greatly exasperated: whereupon major Bernardi desired to go to England, which major-general Bouchan approved of, and sent for the laird of Glencoe* to come with forty of his vassals to receive Bernardi at Invergarry, and to conduct him to the braes of Monteth, which was performed in the night-time, for fear of the garrisons that lay in the way.

Bernardi proceeded on his journey from the braes of Monteth, under the conduct of a guide appointed him by colonel Graham, and arrived at Edinburgh in the month of November 1691. The rulers of that city having heard that some gentlemen were come from the highlands, ordered their gates to be shut, and a general search to be made for them. Bernardi's landlord getting notice of it, conducted him out of town, but half an hour before that order was put in execution; otherwise his journey at that time had terminated in the Tolbooth, or some other prison in Edinburgh; but escaping that and other dangers, he travelled on from thence to London, meeting with no more difficulties at that time, than those of a long winter journey. But misfortunes may be compared with evil habits, it being no easy task to get out of either, when once unhappily fallen into the road of them. And this proved to be Bernardi's case: for, having finished his affairs in London, by disposing of some effects he had left with a friend when he went out of England, and by selling his Scotch horses, he purposed to go over into Flanders; and meeting with two gentlemen of his acquaintance ready to go out of town, in order to make the same voyage, he went with them to Colchester, where they were recommended to a master of a ship, who was in a short time to carry over a lady of great quality to Ostend; but the wind happening to be fixed in the east, the lady ordered her trunks to be put on shipboard, and then went to a gentleman's house about five miles off, charging the master to send for her as soon as the wind came fair. Bernardi and his two friends met with two other gentlemen, who were strangers to them, and also unknown in the town, who were come thither to get a passage over in the same ship. They joined company, and lodged all together for some nights at Mr. Cook's, then postmaster in Colchester; but having notice of some busy people's inquisitiveness about them, Bernardi and his two friends went to a gentleman's house, about a mile out of the town, and the other two gentlemen went to the master of the ship's house. The second night after Bernardi and his two friends went into the country, intimation was given to them, that sir Isaac Rebow, a justice of the peace, had issued out his warrant to apprehend them, and bring them before him; and the wind coming fair the same night, they went directly to the master of the ship's house, in order to go on board. The master of the ship told them, that he had sent a messenger for the lady two hours before, and expected her in an hour more; and sent one of his men to conduct them on ship-board, and said he would follow them, with the other two gentlemen at his house, as soon as the lady came. A message came from the lady, that she could not possibly come before the next day in the afternoon. Bernardi and his two friends continued on ship-board to avoid the justice's warrant. The next day towards the evening, came a company of train-bands, with five hundred mob, to the quay, where the ship lay dry, at low water, about two miles from the town. This captain of the train-bands commanded his men to go on board, and to bring all the persons they found in the ship to him. These orders were obeyed; and Bernardi, and the two gentlemen with him, were seized and carried directly to Colchester gaol, where the other two gentlemen and the master of the ship had before been made prisoners. The lady had set out in order to go on board, but being told what had happened, she returned back, and never appeared; upon which six justices assembled to break open and search her trunks, exposing even her foul linen to the view of hundreds of people; but their workshops could not discover who she was, neither had Bernardi or any of the other four gentlemen the least knowledge of her, but by name and title, which was the countess of Errol; having never seen her. When the six wise men had finished their search of the lady's goods, they strictly examined and searched their five prisoners separately, and charged them with having treasonable papers and pamphlets, though no such were found about them, neither had they any; but some such things were found amongst the lady's goods. These justices sent an account of their proceedings to the earl of Nottingham, then secretary of state, and thereby represented major Bernardi and the other four gentlemen to be accomplices with the said lady, and committed them to the county gaol at Chelmsford, from hence they writ to their friends, and got themselves removed by Habas Corpus to London, and gave bail before a judge, to appear in the court of King's-Bench the then next term. Before the term two of the five went off, either by composition or bailing their bail; but Bernardi and his two friends appeared, in hopes and expectation of being discharged by the court: but the Attorney General opposed their being discharged, having instructions from the Secretary of State so to do, alledging that they were guilty of treason. The court ordered them into custody of a messenger, where they remained confined near seven months. Bernardi having for many years been well known to my lord Romney, who was the other principal Secretary of State, writ a letter to his lordship: and, by his favour, they all three were admitted to bail again upon the first day of Michaelmas term, to appear on the last day of the same term. They appeared accordingly; but the Attorney General still went on with his charge against them, and affirmed to the court, that the treasonable papers found in the lady's trunk, together with such other evidence as would be produced in Essex, was sufficient to bring them to their trial; and therefore he moved the court to bind them over to Chelmsford assizes, and they were bound over accordingly, twelve of their friends giving 500*l.* security each for their appearance; and in order to their defence, they applied themselves to four eminent counsel in London, and gave them breviate and large fees to plead their cause, and provided coaches to carry them down, and to attend and bring them back again. The day before the assizes began, they went down with their counsel, sir Creswell Levinz, sir Bartholomew Shower, counsellor Dolben, and another whose name the author hath forgot. The six prosecuting justices were got there before them, with their subpoenaed witnesses, who were all heard by the grand jury the next day, upon an indictment preferred against them; but for want of sufficient evidence to find the bill, the grand jury rejected it, and gave in their verdict Ignoramus; whereupon they were discharged in court by proclamation; and the six justices galloped home to Colchester in all haste, as soon as they heard that the grand jury had thrown out the bill of indictment. This prosecution, under close confinement sometimes, and under bail at other times, continued about a year and a half, which put major Bernardi to the expence of some hundreds of pounds, and his two fellow sufferers to as much.

Major Bernardi, soon after he was discharged, went over to Holland with the earl of Nottingham's pass, and returned again within the time limited by the pass, and appeared at the secretary's office as he was enjoined, that my lord might know he had not exceeded the time prescribed him to return in; and by so doing he obtained some favours from his lordship afterwards. Not long after his return from Flanders, he judged it to suit best with his circumstances at that time to retire into the country, to be out of harm's way, and less liable to company and expence; for his five hundred miles journey from the highlands of Scotland to London, with the undeserved imprisonment and prosecution which he suffered by the officious justices, had very much impaired his substance. And although nothing less than his life was aimed at by the Essex justices, yet his sufferings then were but flea-bites, in comparison to the unprecedented hardships laid upon him soon after. He returned from a pleasant country-house near Brentford, where he had resided about a year and a half, and where he employed much of his time, and some expence, in improving and beautifying the gardens there; but the premises being made over to doctor Ward, prebend of Salisbury, in part of his lady's portion, Bernardi was obliged to quit the house on that account, and came to London at Christmas 1695: a fatal remove from a quiet country-abode to a sea of troubles, which in great measure is to be imputed to his misfortune in meeting with one captain Rookwood by accident at a tavern! Captain Rookwood was then lately come from France, and had been an acquaintance of Bernardi's of about seven years standing, though they had not seen each other for some years then last past. Rookwood frankly told Bernardi, that he was quite tired out in foreign service, that his brother had a good estate, and interest enough to obtain leave for him to come home; and that he was come over to that end, but kept himself a little private, until his brother had gained him a licence to appear; it being then made criminal by a law, for any subject to come from France without leave from the government. Within two months or thereabouts after Bernardi's arrival in town, a horrid conspiracy to assassinate and murder his late majesty king William was discovered, and many proclamations came forth offering 1,000*l.* reward for securing each man inserted in those proclamations. Several were taken up on the first, and more were apprehended daily upon the repeated proclamations. Captain Rookwood came to Bernardi on a Saturday, soon after the horrid plot broke out, and his countenance and behaviour seemed to discover him to be under some disturbance of mind. Bernardi thereupon asked him, if any evil had happened to him? To which he answered, No; but said, that if any body should be so malicious as to give information of his being come over at that time, he should certainly be taken up. But it seems his name was in a proclamation, which came out upon that very day, to seize him as one of those who were concerned in the said assassination-plot, though Bernardi had not then heard any thing of the matter, and Rookwood concealed it from him, intending, as appeared by his behaviour afterwards, to spend that evening with Bernardi; but Bernardi told him, that he was under a promise and engagement to sup that night at a tavern on Tower-hill. Captain Rookwood thereupon earnestly replied, that if the meeting there was not upon private business, he desired he might be one of the company; with which Bernardi readily complied, and he and Rookwood, with other company, supped there accordingly; and making it too late to go home to their lodgings, Rookwood and Bernardi stayed all night at the tavern, and went to bed together there. The next morning, being Sunday, some constables and other armed men came into the house, and entered the room where Bernardi and Rookwood were in bed, and producing their warrant to search for and seize them, they demanded submission thereto. Bernardi and Rookwood readily yielded to their authority, not making the least resistance, and got up and dressed themselves as soon as possibly they could; but the constables' orders being to carry them, and all the people belonging to the tavern before the recorder of London, who was then gone to church, they were obliged to remain in the tavern until noon, guarded by twenty men. This delay gave Bernardi time and opportunity to make some inquiry into the cause of all that hurly-burly. The senior constable told him, that a neighbour's servant-maid came to the tavern the night before, and seeing some gentlemen at supper, she asked a drawer who they were? And he making her a surly answer, she went with her brother, a journeyman shoemaker, directly to the recorder, and gave information, that some evil-minded men were at the tavern, and that the people of the house refused to discover who they were; and therefore it was reasonable to believe, that they might be such persons as the government then sought for, by divers proclamations. It was then near the latter end of February, and the before-mentioned horrid conspiracy was discovered about the middle of the same month. The constables having notice of the recorder's being at home, they carried Bernardi and Rookwood, with all the tavern family, before him, who examined them very strictly and separately, and told them that he could do no less than commit them at that disturbed time, though he found no other cause than suspicion for so doing; and therefore, as a favour, would send them to the two Compters, and not to Newgate, that they might with less difficulty and expence obtain their liberty, when the storm was blown over. He ordered the tavern family to give bail the next day. Bernardi and Rookwood remained quiet under their respective and different confinements near a month, without any communication with each other, either by letter or message, in all that time. Captain Charnock, King, and Keys, were taken up on the first proclamation, which came forth on or about the 22d day of February; and were tried and convicted of high-treason March 11, 1695-6, and were all three executed on the 18th.

Upon the 23d of March came forth another proclamation, in which Bernardi's name was inserted, and a reward of 1,000*l.* was thereby offered to apprehend him. Captain Rookwood reposing an entire confidence in the friendship of one Mr. George Harris, intrusted him with the knowledge of his and Bernardi's being prisoners in the compters, as before related,

And here it is to be observed, that although captain Rookwood was in a proclamation, which came forth but the day before he and Bernardi went together to the tavern on Tower-hill, and of which, without doubt, he had been apprised at the time of his first coming to Bernardi, who then knew nothing of the matter; yet captain Rookwood thought fit to conceal the same from the knowledge of Bernardi as long as he could, and judging it conducive to his safety, he changed his name, and prevailed on Bernardi, by earnest intreaty, to do the like; but without acquainting him with the proclamation, as a reason for his so doing. Captain Rookwood was often visited in the compter by his minion the said Mr. Harris, to whom he had communicated these particulars: And as soon as the proclamation of the 23d of March came forth, which was the last that was published to apprehend conspirators, and was published at some weeks distance from the rest, Harris went and discovered captain Rookwood and Bernardi for the reward, and they were taken out of the compters by a detachment of the guards, in the night of the 24th of the same month of March, and were carried to the Tilt-yard guard, and examined by the lords of the council the next day, and committed March 25, 1696, close prisoners to Newgate, loaded with heavy irons, and put into separate, dismal, dark and stinking apartments, not being allowed to speak to each other from the time of their being taken out of the two compters. Bernardi did never see Rookwood afterwards, who was soon after tried and condemned, and was executed at Tyburn with Cranburne and Lowick, on the 29th day of April following.

It may be here demanded, how came Bernardi not to undergo the like fate with Rookwood? To which he answers, that it was not by favour, but for want of evidence to hang Bernardi; though to have taken away his life at that time without proof, had been tender mercy, compared to the cruelty of the severe and long confinement he has since endured. None of the discoverers of the said horrid plot, who were about ten or twelve in number, ever so much as mentioned Bernardi's name, unless Harris might make some mention of him, who had no other knowledge of him, but by seeing him and his friend Rookwood sometimes together; in which case he might speak truth with respect to Bernardi, but no farther. Harris's view was the 2,000*l.* reward, which he received, and which must no doubt with him have been a consideration highly preferable to captain Rookwood's friendship, though the captain had been a true friend to Harris for many years, and according to all accounts, as kind to him as a good father could possibly be to a beloved son. Captain Rookwood was proved, by one of the chief discoverers of the conspiracy, to have been one night in their assembly and councils, and then unhappily to have given his consent to the designed bloody act against king William, which cost him his life. Had or could Bernardi at that time have been drawn into their vile and pernicious councils, with respect to that horrid and most dishonourable design, his rank and long service must necessarily have rendered him a welcome guest amongst the conspirators, and consequently he must have shared captain Rookwood's fate, without any possible means of escaping it. Those who suffered death upon the account of the assassination-conspiracy, were eight in number, namely, captain Charnock, King and Keys, major Lowick, captain Rookwood, and Cranburne; and sir William Perkins and sir John Friend. Sir John Fenwick suffered for another species of treason, as shall hereinafter be particularly related and explained. The nine before-mentioned being executed, there still remained many close prisoners in Newgate upon that account; but evidence being wanted to convict any more of them, the Habeas Corpus act was suspended for nine months, to prevent them from gaining their liberty by law; and this was done with a view of finding out evidence against them within that time. The suspension of the act expiring, several of them entered their prayer at the then next sessions and term, to be tried and admitted to bail. The first who entered such their prayer were three gentlemen who were brothers, and related to the earl of Bath, captain Stow, captain Walbank, and Mr. Blackburn, and some others, and they were all bailed out and discharged, though they were taken by proclamation, and a thousand pounds reward was paid for each of the first five persons. The remaining number in confinement then, were only Bernardi, captain Counter, Mr. Cassels, Mr. Meldrum, and Chambers; and they being locked up close in separate dismal parts of the gaol, and most of them unknown to each other, could neither communicate or do any thing for themselves in order to their liberty, nor could know what had been done for others: But the good success of those before mentioned caused their friends abroad officiously to enter prayers for them at the second sessions after the Habeas Corpus act came in force; whereupon they were all of them taken out of their close holes, and were carried to the Old-Bailey, in order to be tried or bailed. Mr. Constantine Phipps, (who was afterwards lord chancellor of Ireland) was appointed their counsel to move for them, and asked Bernardi, if any application had been made to the solicitor of the treasury? Bernardi answered, no; alledging, that as there was no law to keep them any longer confined, their friends judged it needless to apply to any body for favour; little dreaming that an act of parliament would be obtained to secure and continue their further confinement, a practice never known or heard of before. As soon as they were produced in court in order to be tried or bailed, the solicitor of the treasury stood up and whispered the judges upon the bench: and though that sessions, being a sessions of gaol-delivery, could not lawfully be determined without either trying or bailing these state-prisoners, the judges being obliged by law to deliver the gaol; yet upon the whispering me-tion of the solicitor of the treasury, the judges adjourned the court for a fortnight, and immediately after a bill was brought into parliament, and an act passed within that time to confine them for a twelvemonth, on a supposed probability still of finding out some evidence against them in that time.* But how came it that the same prudent pretation for the safety of the state, and to bring vile conspirators to condign punishment, was not made use of against those that prayed their trial at the sessions before, and thereby obtained their discharge, and some of whom were committed upon the oath of one witness? It will not sure be difficult to solve this question. Mr. Solicitor of the treasury neither spoke aloud nor softly against them; and why he was so good-natured may be easily understood, having no doubt, been properly talked with by them; which was a very unfortunate omission in the conduct of Bernardi and his fellow sufferers, in not properly bespeaking Mr. Solicitor's favour for them. And here a very singular and deplorable passage happened, relating to Mr. Blackburn, who being bailed out and discharged, with those who had first entered their prayers to be tried, was taken up again upon the same account, and, without any fresh charge or information against him, put into the custody of a messenger, at the time when the House of Commons were passing the bill for continuing the confinement of the five last-mentioned state-prisoners; and the bill being carried up to the House of Lords for their concurrence thereto, Mr. Blackburn was added to the said fatal number in the lords house, by way of amendment to the bill, and sent again to Newgate. Mr. Chambers, another of the last-mentioned state-prisoners, who had also entered his prayer at the term with the first to be

* By an act 8 W. 3. "to attain such of the persons concerned in the late horrid conspiracy to assassinate his majesty's royal person who are fled from justice, unless they render themselves to justice, and for continuing several others of the said conspirators in custody;" in the last clause of which are these words: "And whereas the persons hereafter named, viz.—Counter, John Bernardi, Robert Camels, Robert Meldrum, James Chambers, and Robert Blackburn, have been committed, and are still in custody in Newgate, for the said conspiracy and treason: He it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the said — Counter, John Bernardi, Robert Camels, Robert Meldrum, James Chambers, and Robert Blackburn, and such other persons who shall hereafter render themselves; or shall be apprehended, and against whom there shall be evidence upon oath of their being concerned in the said barbarous and bloody conspiracy of assassinating the person of his sacred majesty, shall be detained and kept in custody, without bail or amercize, until the Monday of January 1697, unless they shall be sooner bailed by order of council, signed by six of his majesty's most honourable privy-council."

tried or bailed, was brought up to the court of King's-bench by Habeas Corpus, in order to his bail; but one of his bail refusing to swear himself worth 500*l.*, Chambers was remanded back to Newgate, where he remained with the rest, under the parliament's confinement, till released by death. The first act expiring, a second (9 W. 3. c. 4.) was soon passed to continue them in prison another year; unless, as in the former act, they should sooner be bailed or discharged by order of council, signed by six privy-counsellors. And at the end thereof, all prospect of finding out any evidence against them seeming to be entirely vanished, a third act (10 and 11 W. 3. c. 13.) was passed, confining them during the pleasure of his late majesty king William. And even some of the members of that parliament afterwards told Bernardi, and others of the number so miserably confined, that the very intention of that act was purely to lay them under dutiful obligations to king William for their liberty, and thereby also at the same time to pay his majesty a compliment; and that the members did not in the least doubt of his majesty's clemency to them, but that in a little time he would set them free. King William was afterwards accordingly applied to in their favour, not long before his death, by the late earl of Burlington; and his majesty was graciously pleased to promise his lordship, that he would deliver them in a short time. But the king's illness and death following soon afterwards, and before any order was given for their discharge, the good and gracious design of his majesty for the deliverance of these unhappy men (if he really intended it) was most unfortunately frustrated and prevented. The act for their confinement, by the demise of king William, being determined, (as they were advised) they entered their prayer at the next sessions to be tried or bailed, but were opposed by the attorney-general, and neither was granted. Afterwards another act of parliament (1 Ann. st. 1. c. 29.) was procured to be passed, confining them during the pleasure of queen Anne. Her majesty was graciously pleased to release captain Counter, the first named in the said acts of confinement. Major Bernardi thereupon petitioned the queen for his liberty, and prevailed upon his grace the late duke of Buckingham, then lord president of the council, to deliver his petition to her majesty; which was so done at the intercession of her grace the duchess of Buckingham his consort, and her lady mother the late countess of Dorchester, both of them being so very good as strenuously to move his grace to undertake it, urging that such acts of compassion and charity were generous and excellent in persons of quality, and well becoming a good and great man in high station. The queen was graciously pleased, upon the duke's motion, to consent to Bernardi's liberty; but his grace afterwards cautiously laying the petition before the privy-council, it was by them referred to sir Edward Northey, the then attorney-general, which might give him an opportunity to obstruct the queen's intended clemency, for politic or other reasons. Upon this reference, it took up some time and expence to attend and solicit the dispatch of Mr. Attorney's report, which, when made, nevertheless appeared to be in Bernardi's favour. The lord president called for the report, in order to have the sentiments of all the lords in council, how and in what manner Bernardi should be delivered and discharged: but the late earl of Oxford, then lord treasurer, at the same time took the opportunity to move that Mr. Blackburn might have his liberty as well as Bernardi; and thereupon his grace the president, and his lordship the treasurer, differed in council about the respective discharges of Bernardi and Blackburn, whereby both their pretensions to their liberty, though so near succeeding (to all appearance) dropped, and never could be revived again to the queen's death. How far those two great statesmen were sincere in attempting the liberty of Bernardi and Blackburn, or either of them, or played booty, God alone knows: the windings, turnings, and labyrinths of politicians not being easily traced and found out by a well-meaning, honest man. The earl of Oxford afterwards was often applied to in their behalf, and, sometimes by persons of greater honour and quality than himself; and his lordship made more promises than he had buttons upon his coat, waistcoat, and cloak, and some of them upon his honour, that these prisoners should soon be set at liberty, if they would but have a little more patience; but all his lordship's promises were by him either forgot, or, through his most refined policy, neglected to be performed.

By the demise of the queen they had again liberty, by virtue of the Habeas Corpus act, to pray for their trial or to be bailed; and in order thereunto they entered their prayer accordingly, at the first Old Bailey sessions, and were by that court referred to Michaelmas term following. They retained three or four eminent counsel at law, and fees them to move and plead for them. Seven or eight motions were made that term, at different times, in their behalf, and several rules of court were obtained at great expence, before they could bring the then attorney-general, sir Edward Northey, to appear and defend their motions. At last the then lord chief justice Parker told serjeant Webb, (one of the counsel for the prisoners) that the court consented to their being brought to the bar by Habeas Corpus on the Monday following, being the last day of the term, in order to admit them to bail, bidding the serjeant in the mean time to direct his clients to give in the names of such substantial men as they intended to bring into court to bail them. This glimmering favour proved only as a little enlightening before death, as will appear by the sequel. The prisoners were accordingly brought up by their keepers from Newgate to the court of King's-bench, the last day of the term, when the chief justice before-named, having notice of their being there, was pleased to ask serjeant Webb, their counsel, if they had bail ready in court? And being answered in the affirmative, his lordship was pleased to reply; that wonders were to be done presently; wonders indeed, and such as were never heard of before! The prisoners were called and brought into court, and thereupon the same gentleman made an harangue against them of above an hour long: and although towards the end of his very bitter and invective speech against those helpless wretches, who were obliged to receive all his fire and huffs, he was so ingenuous as to declare, that he had never heard of any evidence charging them with the crime they were committed for; yet he was pleased also to declare, that he was very well satisfied of their guilt, by the proceeding of the first parliament against them, and would therefore remand them back to Newgate, which accordingly he did. At the meeting of the next parliament matters were so ordered, that another act (1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 7,) was prepared and procured to pass both houses very expeditiously, to continue them in prison during his late majesty king George's pleasure. If it was intended still to debar these unhappy men from the benefit of the law, it would have been charity to have told them so, when they entered their prayer to take their trial or be bailed at the demise of queen Anne, and not to have drilled them on with hopes of relief all that long term, when none was intended them; impoverishing them at the same time by great expence of counsel's fees, and otherwise, in attempting it, to the reducing and bringing them into a starving condition in gaol. Several petitions were afterwards delivered to his late majesty king George in the name and behalf of these wretches, imploring his sovereign compassion, and setting forth, as an instance of his great mercy, upon another occasion, his pardoning many condemned for actual treason against his majesty's person; whereas these had been long miserably confined as prisoners of state, purely upon bare suspicion only of being concerned in a conspiracy against a deceased monarch, of which the least proof could never be made out against them; yet their petitions were not minded. The court of England hath the least regard to petitions of any court in Europe, and so it hath been for many reigns past; which neglect is chiefly to be imputed to the prime ministers and other great men: his majesty having a petition put into his hand, generally gives it to one of the lords near him, where it is too often thrown aside, and never heard of more. In most other courts particular days are appointed to read petitions, inserting in the margin of each petition, to the effect following, viz. Consented to, or not consented to; and an office is settled wherein to lodge petitions, where the deliverers take them out, and by that means all petitioners soon know how far they are, or are not, to prevail upon such their submissive and most humble application.

By the demise of his late majesty king George the first, which happened at Hanover, on or about the 11th day of June, 1727, Bernardi and his two fellow-sufferers, being all the survivors of the said miserable state-monuments, had again liberty by law to pray for a trial or to be admitted to bail; whereupon Bernardi, on the 16th day of June, 1727, moved the court of King's-bench by his counsel for an Habeas Corpus to bring him up, in order to be tried, bailed, or discharged, according to law; such counsel at the same time apprising the court, that Bernardi had, so long ago as the 25th day of March, 1696, been committed to Newgate by the late duke of Shrewsbury, then secretary of state, on suspicion of being concerned in a horrid conspiracy to assassinate his late majesty king William 3, but without any proof, there not being so much as the oath of one single witness made against him, nor was it specified in his commitment that he was charged upon oath; and no proof at any time afterwards ever appearing against him, to induce the bringing him to a trial, several acts of parliament had been made to keep him in prison, and by the last of them he was confined during the pleasure of his said late majesty king George 1, by whose decease Bernardi was become intitled to his liberty, there being no law then in force to detain him in prison; and the court then made a rule for such Habeas Corpus accordingly; though the motion was strongly opposed by the attorney-general sir Philip Yorke, who, though a young man, had sprung up quickly to that great post in the law, through the early favour and countenance of the before-mentioned chief justice, and his own shining merit, built upon so nursing and advantageous a foundation. Mr. Attorney-General (but sure he was only in jest) objected in particular to the motion as not proper or regular, without producing the original commitment, which, for want of due care in keeping and preserving the records of Newgate, after upwards of 31 years, and the change of the several keepers within that time, was not then to be had; but that weighty objection was over-ruled by the court. Afterwards sir John Fortescue Aland, then one of the judges of the court of King's-bench, and now one of the judges of his majesty's court of Common-pleas, declared in court, that the same matter had been moved upon the demise of queen Anne, when the chief justice Parker before-mentioned declared his opinion, that the court had a discretionary power either to bail or discharge the prisoners, then brought up to the court of King's-bench by Habeas Corpus in the like case; yet nevertheless, at the same time, he remanded them back to Newgate. Bernardi's counsel thereupon waved the Habeas Corpus, and desired to take nothing by his motion, as conceiving the expence only certain, (which Bernardi was ill able to bear) and the success doubtful; and besides the judges commissions were not then renewed, who of themselves could not subsist longer than six months from his present majeaty's accession to the crown. It was therefore thought expedient and more adviseable for Bernardi to seek relief by petitioning the king for his royal favour and clemency, than to make any farther trial to be discharged or bailed by the court of King's-bench. A bill was soon after brought into parliament, and speedily passed into an act (1 Geo. 2, st. 1, c. 4,) to continue his imprisonment, with his other two fellow-sufferers, Blackburn and Cassels, during his present majesty's pleasure. A printed Case was delivered to all the lords and commons against the bill, while the same was under the consideration of the two houses, as is hereinafter set forth. And Bernardi preferred several Petitions to the king and queen, both before and after the said last-mentioned act passed; the tenor or purport of which Case and Petitions are as followeth, viz.

The most sad and deplorable Case of ROBERT BLACKBURN, JOHN BERNARDI, and ROBERT CASSELS, humbly offered against the Bill now depending in Parliament for continuing their Imprisonment, after a Confinement worse than Death by them already undergone, of upwards of one-and-thirty Years in Newgate.

"In March and April 1696, they were committed: the crime they were charged with in their respective commitments was high-treason, in conspiring the murder and assassination of his late majesty king William 3, but without proof, there being not so much as the oath of one single witness made against any of them, nor is it specified in their commitments, that they were charged upon oath: that no proof appearing against them whereby to bring them to a trial, several acts of parliament had been made to keep them in prison, the last of which left them to his late majesty's pleasure, and then by the demise of the king they were become intitled to their liberty: that the persons charged with this most horrid and detestable crime were originally six, namely, James Counter, Rob. Meldrum, James Chambers, Robert Blackburn, John Bernardi, and Robert Cassels: Counter was set at liberty by queen Anne, and Meldrum and Chambers died in prison; so that there were then remaining only the last three of these miserable, wretched and most unfortunate prisoners, who solemnly disclaim, and from their hearts ever did and do abhor and detest, the said villainous crime so laid to their charge as aforesaid: and although their number was then reduced to three as before-mentioned, yet nevertheless by that bill they were intended to be further confined: that they were reduced to extreme miseries by their said tedious confinement of one-and-thirty years and upwards, in a melancholy, dismal, and loathsome gaol, and by their great age, infirmity, and poverty; and though they had been confined close prisoners of state in Newgate for upwards of one-and-thirty years as aforesaid, yet they had never had one penny allowance from the government,

"Wherefore, and in regard to the unprecedented and unparalleled hardships of their case, it was humbly hoped the said bill should not pass. (Subscribed) ROBERT BLACKBURN.

"Newgate, JOHN BERNARDI.
July 5, 1797." ROBERT CASSELS."

Copies of commitments follow, whereby it plainly appears that none of the said three prisoners were committed upon oath.

"These are, in his majesty's name, to authorise and require you to receive into your custody the body of — Bernardi, herewith sent you for high treason, in conspiring the assassination and murder of the king; and you are to keep him safe until he shall be delivered by due course of law; and for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at the court at Whitehall, the 25th of March, 1696.

"SHREWSBURY."

"To the Keeper of Newgate, or his Deputy."

N. B. The commitments of Mr. Blackburn and Cassels are to the same effect with Bernardi's.

None of the said six prisoners were committed upon any oath, except Counter, who was charged upon the oath of one witness, as may appear by the following true copy of his commitment:

"Middlesex.

"Receive into your custody the body of John alias James Gunter, alias Counter, alias Rumsey, herewith sent you, charged before me, upon the oath of George Harris, gent. for high treason, in conspiring to assassinate his majesty, and to procure an invasion of this kingdom by the French, being the person mentioned in his majesty's proclamation, and there called Counter, alias Rumsey; and in order to a further examination, you are him safely to keep, until he shall be discharged by due course of law; and for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given under my hand and seal, this 29th day of May, 1696.

"S. LOVELL, Recorder."

A Copy of the Keeper's CERTIFICATE, setting forth that none of the said three prisoners were committed upon oath; which Certificate was annexed to one of Bernardi's Petitions to the king:

"Whereas James Gunter, alias Counter, alias Rumsey, James Chambers, Robert Meldrum, Robert Blackburn, Robert Cassels, and John Bernardi, were committed to Newgate in 1696, for conspiring to assassinate his late majesty king William the 3d, as appears by copies of their several commitments, signed by James Fell, the keeper of Newgate, and by his head turnkey Bodenham Rouse, which I have seen and examined: I hereby certify, that none of the before-named persons are charged upon any oath specified in the said copies of their respective commitments, except the above-said Counter, who stands charged in his commitment for the said crime, upon the oath of one George Harris, gent. Given under my hand this 15th day of August, 1727.

True Copies of Petitions to the King and Queen, and of an Affidavit of two eminent surgeons, are hereinafter set forth as followeth:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

The most humble PETITION of Major JOHN BERNARDI,

"Sheweth,

"That your petitioner now is, and for upwards of one-and-thirty years last past has been a state prisoner in Newgate, committed the 25th of March, 1696, by the then earl of Shrewsbury's warrant, as secretary of state, and therein charged with high-treason, in conspiring the murder and assassination of his late majesty king William; but without any proof, or so much as any information upon the oath of one single witness, that your petitioner could ever hear of: neither hath, in all the said time of thirty-one years and upwards, any prosecution been had against your petitioner for the said horrid supposed crime, which your petitioner doth disclaim, and from his heart ever did and doth abhor and detest.

"That by two acts of indemnity, the one in the third, and the other in the seventh year of the reign of his late majesty your most gracious father king George the first, the crime alledged against your petitioner in his commitment is pardoned; but by the said acts the imprisonment of your petitioner was continued during his late majesty's pleasure.

"That your petitioner is advised, that by the demise of his said late majesty, your petitioner became intitled to his liberty, and ought not to be detained in prison by any law now in being; and has very lately applied to your majesty's judges of the court of King's-Bench to be discharged from his confinement, but without success.

"That your petitioner, by his so long imprisonment, is reduced to great straits and want, and great infirmity of body; and his life is in danger by his close confinement in Newgate, as by affidavit of two eminent surgeons, herewith produced, and sworn before one of your majesty's judges of the King's-bench, and filed in the said court, may appear. And your petitioner is now upwards of seventy years of age, great and the best part of which time has been very uncomfortably worn out by your petitioner, in a melancholy, dismal, and leathsome gaol, where it has cost your petitioner above 700*l.* for his lodging.

"That in regard to all such your petitioner's sad and deplorable circumstances, and advanced old age, your petitioner most humbly hopes he may be deemed a fit object of your majesty's charity and clemency, and more especially at this juncture of your majesty's accession to the throne.

"Wherefore your petitioner doth most humbly bly beseech your majesty, that he may, for the present, for the benefit of his health, and to save expence, be removed from Newgate to the King's-bench prison, till such time as your majesty shall graciously see cause to order your petitioner's absolute discharge.

"And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c."

"John Wheeler the elder, and John Wheeler the younger, his son, both of the city of London, surgeons, jointly and severally make oath, that major John Bernardi, who now is, and for upwards of one-and-thirty years last past, as these deponents have been informed, and verily believe, hath been a state-prisoner in Newgate, hath frequently had very ill fits, occasioned by a miserable lameness and swelling in his arm, by humours flowing to an old wound. And these deponents further say, that they have attended him many times in such illness, for about twelve years last past, as his surgeons, laying his arm often open to the bone by large incisions, which have continued open and running wounds for several months after every such operation; and his torments occasioned thereby have frequently brought fevers upon him, to the endangering his life. And these deponents further say, that in these deponents' judgment, the cause of contracting such sharp and gross humours hath proceeded, and doth proceed from the length and closeness of his confinement; which, if continued, will still endanger his life, in these deponents' judgment; and the rather by reason of his advanced old age, he being now, as these deponents have been informed, and do believe, upwards of seventy years of age.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty :

The humble PETITION of Major JOHN BERNARDI,

"Sheweth ;

"That your petitioner, by an act of parliament lately made, being entirely left to your majesty's most gracious pleasure, after having suffered near thirty-two years close imprisonment in Newgate, on suspicion of being concerned in a most horrid conspiracy against his late majesty king William.

"That your petitioner hath always prayed and petitioned to be tried, as often as he could do it by law, to be acquitted or condemned; yet he could never be heard or brought before any court, to have his guilt or innocence proved.

"That your petitioner was not charged upon any oath, of his being a conspirator in that horrid plot, which is evident by his commitment: no man ever being taken up for high treason, and so charged, but the same was at-ways specified and expressed in his commitment (as your petitioner is advised). For instance, Mr. Counter is only charged upon the oath of one evidence; the distinction sufficiently appeareth by the copy of his commitment, and that of your petitioner, hereunto annexed.

"That your petitioner hath humbly set forth his great age, infirmity and poverty, by a former petition delivered into your majesty's most gracious hand; your petitioner being above seventy years old, suffering insupportable miseries by frequent ulcerations in his limbs, occasioned by his long and close confinement, attested upon the oath of two eminent surgeons, and annexed to his former petition to your majesty.

"Your petitioner therefore most humbly implores and supplicates your majesty, in your sovereign compassion and great goodness, to grant that your petitioner may be removed from Newgate to your majesty's Bench prison for the present, for the benefit of more air, and less expence, until your majesty may be graciously pleased to grant your petitioner entire liberty.

"And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c."

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty :

The humble PETITION of Major JOHN BERNARDI,

"Sheweth ;

"That your petitioner hath been a close prisoner of state in Newgate near thirty-two years, and is now destined to a longer confinement, by an act of parliament lately made to that end, leaving your petitioner to his majesty's most gracious pleasure.

"That your petitioner was not committed upon the oath of any evidence, as appeareth by the copy of his commitment annexed to his petition, delivered also to his majesty's most gracious hand this day.

"That your petitioner and the rest had their Case delivered to the members of both Houses of parliament, whilst the act for their longer imprisonment was under their consideration; a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

"That your petitioner is one of the oldest commission-officers in the kingdom, having served the states of Holland fifteen years by the king of England's consent and approbation; your petitioner bearing five of his then highness the prince of Orange's commissions in several stations of honour, the first of which bears date above fifty-four years ago; and your petitioner hath been much wounded in the said service.

"That your petitioner's grandfather and father were both counts of the empire, &c. though his said father and your petitioner were both born subjects of this kingdom.

"That your petitioner hath his beforementioned commissions, and the imperial patent, to produce in testimony of the truth thereof.

"That your petitioner hath already suffered a punishment a thousand-fold worse than a present or violent death, and never could obtain the favour to be brought before any court of justice, to have his guilt or innocence proved; kept in prison near thirty-two years, by methods never heard of before; and is now high worn out with old age, decrepitness, and poverty.

"Your petitioner therefore most humbly implores and beseeches your majesty, in your sovereign compassion and pity, to move the king to grant the prayer of your most miserable petitioner, which is but one prison for another, until the King of Kings, in his divine providence, shall deliver your petitioner out of this changeable world, or that his majesty may be graciously pleased to grant him more liberty in it.

"And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c."*

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

The humble PETITION of ABIGAIL BERNARDI, Wife to the most unfortunate Major John Bernardi, who hath for upwards of one-and-thirty years last past been confined a State-Prisoner in Newgate.

"Sheweth;

"That your petitioner on the 25th of June last, did deliver to the king's most excellent majesty an humble petition on the behalf of the

* To Blackburn's Petition, to the same effect, was added the following certificate:

"Middlesex, ss. These are to certify, That upon search made amongst the records of the sessions of gaol-delivery of Newgate, held for the county of Middlesex, it appears by the said records, that on the 2nd day of April, 1696, Robert Blackburn was committed to the said gaol of Newgate, by the right honourable the duke of Shrewsbury, principal secretary of state, for high treason, in conspiring the assassination of the late king. And I do further certify, that at the sessions of gaol-delivery of Newgate, held for the said county, at Justice-hall in the Old-Bailey, in the suburbs of the city of London, on the 9th day of September, 1696, the said Robert Blackburn was delivered to bail by the court, for his personal appearance at the next sessions of gaol-delivery, to be held for the said county, to answer to all such matters, as on his said late majesty's behalf should be objected against him; and not to depart the court without licence; and in the mean time, to be of his good behaviour; that then, &c. At which said next sessions of gaol-delivery, to wit, at the sessions of gaol-delivery of Newgate, held for the said county, at Justice-hall aforesaid, on the 14th day of October, 1696, the said Robert Blackburn personally appeared in open court; and was by the said court discharged of his recognizance. And I do hereby further certify, that it appears by the said records, that on the 7th day of January, 1696-7, the said Robert Blackburn was committed to the said gaol of Newgate, by sir William Trumball, knight, one of his late majesty's said unfortunate prisoner, thereby praying, for the reasons therein contained, that he might for the present, for the benefit of his health, and to save expence, be removed from Newgate to the King's-bench prison, till such time as his majesty should graciously see cause to order his absolute discharge, as by the said petition, reference being thereunto had, more fully may appear. That in the reign of his late majesty, in the time of the Preston rebellion, many prisoners under condemnation and sentence of death for high treason, (but relieved) for the sake of their health obtained an indulgence of a removal from one prison to another, where the closeness of their confinement endangered their lives, as is now the case of the said unfortunate Bernardi, who, although he hath already undergone a confinement worse than death, was committed only upon suspicion of a very horrid and most detestable crime, in conspiring the murder and assassination of his late majesty king William, but without any proof, or as much as the oath of one single witness against him; neither hath any proof been found against him, or he brought to any trial, in upwards of one-and-thirty years time; and as he hath been always ready and desirous to take his trial, he hath, from time to time, regularly entered his prayer to be tried.

"Your petitioner therefore doth most hum-most honourable privy-council, principal secretary of state, for high treason, in conspiring the murder and assassination of the said king. Dated this 10th day of August, 1708, in the 7th year of our sovereign lady Anne, by the grace of God queen of Great Britain, &c.

"S. HARCOURT, clerk of the peace, and gaol-delivery of Newgate, for the county of Middlesex."

It appears, by the foregoing Certificate, that Robert Blackburn was committed the 2nd of April, 1696. That on the 9th of September following, he was admitted to bail. That the 14th of October, 1696, he was discharged. The 7th of January committed again for the same fact; though taken up at the Buoy and Nore, by one captain Nash, for attempting to go to Flanders without a pass. By captain Nash left in custody of a messenger nine weeks. Then committed by sir William Trumball, knight, to Newgate, and never examined, or any oath against him, that ever he heard of; and then detained till an act passed to imprison Counter, Meldrum, Chambers, Bernardi and Cassels, who were all strangers to, and never seen by Blackburn, till in Newgate; and then he was inserted in the amended bill, which came down from the Lords to the Commons. He has been now almost thirty-three years in prison, and no allowance from the government, though a state-prisoner. He was not one of those, for whom the thousand pounds was offered. These several allegations have been reported true, by sir Edward Northey, and sir Robert Raymond; therefore he hopes to have his majesty's relief.

bly beseech and supplicate your majesty, in your sovereign compassion and great goodness, to intercede with the king's most excellent majesty for the removal of your petitioner's unfortunate husband, the said major John Bernardi, from Newgate to the King's-beach prison.

To conclude this point, it is manifest by the before-recited copies of petitions, cases and certificates, and distinct allegations of the said major John Bernardi, that he was not guilty even of as much as misprision of treason, having never had, directly or indirectly, any knowledge of the said horrid conspiracy.

Here are two passages to be curiously enquired into; the first of which is, how Bernardi came to be put into a proclamation? The answer to this is not at all difficult. Undoubtedly it was by reason of George Harris's information of his being then in the Compter with captain Rookwood; which Rookwood was accused upon oath, though Bernardi never was. And this seems to be more unquestionably evident, in regard the proclamation, wherein Bernardi is named, did not come out until the very morning before Bernardi and Rookwood were taken out of the Compter by the Guards at midnight, upon Harris's information, which was five weeks after the discovery of the Plot, and Bernardi's name was never inserted in any former proclamation.

The next and second question is, On what grounds he was first confined by act of parliament? To which Bernardi answers, that the duke of Shrewsbury having inserted in his commitment the following positive words, viz. for being concerned in the horrid conspiracy, &c. though not a syllable of any charge upon oath, his grace's word under his hand was not to be called in question by the parliament, in favour of a poor, inferior, supposed enemy to the government: and how Bernardi, or any other man, could have the confidence to set forth so positively, by petitions to the king, and a case to the parliament, that he was never charged upon oath, if he had ever known or heard of any evidence against him, and in which (if the contrary had been fact) he might easily have been contradicted, is not to be accounted for. He affirms, and with great truth, that he never lay under the odium of being guilty of any base or dishonourable act in the whole course of his life, until the commencement of his present deplorable sufferings; which may gain some credit from his several promotions in commission from time to time, both abroad and at home: and laying aside all true notions of honour, no man in his senses, having capacity or common sense enough to judge of his own interest, could sure be so insatuated as to engage in so horrid an action; because no prince upon earth, being a Christian, could or would ever countenance such a man afterwards, though what he did might turn to such prince's service. We have an instance of it at home, of one sir Paul Whitford, who murdered Dorislaus, Oliver Cromwell's ambassador at the Hague. This base and wicked act might tend to the service of king Charles 2, when in exile; however the king, after the restoration, never suffered Whitford to appear in his presence, though he had been a favourite before; and if his majesty allowed him any thing, it was done so privately, that nobody knew it, and he lived and died in a remote part of the kingdom.

Bernardi quitted to the amount of about 500*l*. a-year, which he had coming in by employes, and by his wife's fortune, upon king James's demanding his subjects home from the Dutch service; and it may be therefore reasonable to believe, that Bernardi was in some esteem with the king as long as his majesty lived; and nothing but a fool or a madman could be so stupid as to forfeit such an advantage, by engaging in a vile, wicked, and most dishonourable action, which neither king nor subject could justify.

It may not be improper here, for manifesting and clearing up Bernardi's innocence beyond all contradiction, to give a particular relation of what passed before the lord chief justice Holt, upon the evidence given before his lordship, upon Bernardi's being suspected to be concerned in the said horrid and detestable conspiracy, the witnesses and discoverers of which were captain George Porter,* Mr. Le Rue,

* This George Porter, the principal evidence in the Assassination Plot, and against sir John Fenwick and the rest, was tried for the murder of sir James Hacket; and his Trial is here inserted.

The TRIAL of George Porter, esq. for the murder of sir James Hacket, of Scotland, knt. at the sessions of the peace, Oyer and Terminer, held at Justice-hall in the Old-Bailey, London, on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th days of December, 1684, before the honourable sir James Smith, Lord-Mayor of the City of London, sir Thomas Jennes, knt. one of his Majesty's Serjeants at Law, and Recorder of the aforesaid City; together with other Justices of London and Middlesex.

Jury.—Ralph Box, William Moyer, Walter Coventry, Jacob David, John Palmer, Ralph Izzard, John Easton, John Fauster, Roger Attley, Thomas Harrison, Francis Smith, William Drinkwater.

George Porter, of London, esq. was indicted for killing sir James Hacket, in the parish of St. Bride's, London, on the 11th of October, 1684, in the 36th year of his majesty's reign. The case and circumstances appearing on the Trial were, that the deceased and the prisoner, being at the Duke's theatre in Salisbury Court, after the play ended, a great crowd happening upon their coming out, and sir James

Captain Blair, captain Fisher, Mr. Clerk of Raybank, Mr. Bartrum, captain Boyce, and some others, whose names have escaped the author's memory; they were all ordered to assemble at the said lord chief justice's chambers in Serjeants-inn in Chancery-lane, which they did, and were there examined upon oath by his lordship, in order to the trials of major Lowick, major Bernardi, captain Knightly, and captain Rookwood, which four were designed to be tried next after the condemnation and execution of captain Charnock, Mr. King, Mr. Keys, sir William Perkins, and sir John Freind, for being concerned in the said vile and villainous plot. Captain Boyce deposed upon his examination, that he had known major Bernardi a captain in the Dutch service, where he bore a very good character, but that he had not seen him in five years then last past. Mr. Le Rue deposed, that he also knew major Bernardi, but could lay nothing to his charge; and that the last time he was in his company, to the best of his remembrance, was at least two years before the assassination-plot was discovered. Captain Porter and the rest declared, endeavouring to make way for his children with his cane, gently moving it, happened to push Mr. Porter on the back; who asked, What the meaning of it was? But sir James, as he designed him no affront, took no notice of what he said; and still pressing for more room, accidentally hit Mr. Porter on the nose or mouth, and made it bleed; upon which the prisoner supposing himself to be affronted, and jostled or brushed by the deceased, (who had the cane still in his hand) drew his sword, and, without further consideration, run the deceased into the thigh, so that the weapon appeared both ways, cutting likewise his fingers, whilst he struggled to draw it forth; whereupon the prisoner recovered his sword, (the deceased at that time sinking down) but had no farther opportunity to push at sir James, here it was seized by a gentleman present; whereat the prisoner expressed much indignation, and getting it once more at liberty, stood upon his guard, saying, he had served one already as he had deserved, or to that effect; yet the deceased, after the wound received, went home in a coach, and lived till the 26th following, and then died in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields. — The defence the prisoner made, was, that he had received a push in the mouth, as he verily believed, from the deceased, and by that means became so rashly unfortunate, as to run him through the thigh; adding, that he knew not the person that fell through this occasion, and therefore could have no pre-meditated malice against him, &c. whereupon the jury returning their verdict, found him guilty of manslaughter only; by which means he was not found guilty upon the statute of stabbing; upon which statute he was charged with a second indictment: but the next heir brought an appeal. At the next sessions, held the 10th and 17th of January, 1684, Mr.

that they never had any knowledge of major Bernardi. Thereupon major Bernardi was struck out of the number or list of the four designed for trial, and Mr. Cranburne was appointed to be tried in his room, to-morrow upon number four. They were all four tried accordingly, and condemned. Three of them, viz. Major Lowick, captain Rookwood, and Mr. Cranburne, were executed soon after. Captain Knightly, who pleaded guilty, was by great intercession relieved, and some time after pardoned upon the terms of banishment. Now followeth a remark upon a mistaken notion frequently broached and argued abroad, to the great prejudice and wrong of major Bernardi and his two remaining fellow-sufferers, Blackburn and Cassels, viz. That there was one evidence against them, and only one to be come at, they having artfully spirited away and decoyed out of the kingdom one other evidence, who could have proved them concerned in the fact, which was the ground and foundation of the parliament's passing the first act for their confinement. Major Bernardi takes upon him positively to deny that fact, and to Porter prayed the court, that he might be admitted to his clergy; but was answered, that an appeal being already brought and allowed, it could not be granted. Then he desired he might have his prayer recorded; but that not being practicable in such cases, he was only admitted to bail, himself entering into a recognizance of 1,000*l.* and his sureties 500*l.* each; and ordered to move it by his counsel the succeeding term, at the King's-bench bar. Though at the next sessions held at the Old-Bailey, the 25th of February following, Mr. Porter pleaded his majesty's most gracious pardon for killing sir James Hacket, which was read and allowed, and he discharged.*

This captain Porter, as a reward for giving evidence against Charnock, King, and Keys (his servant), sir John Freind, sir William Perkins, Brigadier Rookwood, Mr. Cranburne, sir John Fenwick, &c. had a pension settled on him of 260*l.* per annum, which he enjoyed till about June 1728: for the probate of the will of this George Porter, late of the parish of St. James's, Westminster, esq. was granted in the prerogative-court of Canterbury, July 4, 1728, unto Elizabeth Porter, his widow and executrix; so entered in the Pension-office books, and in auditor Harley's and auditor Foley's office, July 1728. Captain Fisher had likewise a pension of 260*l.* per annum for being an evidence in that Plot, as had others, but less sums.

affirm that nothing can be more false and untrue: for no one evidence or discoverer of that abominable conspiracy was ever prevailed on to abscond or quit the land, or ever absented himself, while the government had any use or occasion for him. Mr. Goodman indeed, the stage-player, had been a copartner evidence with captain George Porter against sir John Fenwick, who was charged by them with being concerned in a different species of treason, with other persons of quality, by endeavouring to procure an invasion from France, two years before the assassination-plot broke out, though sir John Fenwick was not accused by Goodman and Porter till that time. True it is, that the said Goodman was soon after influenced by a bribe and fair promises (as is supposed) to quit the kingdom, thereby to prevent sir John Fenwick's being convicted of high treason by the common law; which occasioned the parliament's passing a bill of attainder against him, which took away his life. But that was not the case, in any respect, of Bernardi, Counter, Meldrum, Chambers, Blackburn, and Cassels, or any of them: neither was Goodman ever so much as mentioned or charged with the knowledge of, or of being in any manner concerned in the assassination-plot; so that he neither was, nor could be an evidence against any one upon that account.

Providence was so gracious, merciful and indulgent to major Bernardi, in the midst of his miseries and afflictions in Newgate, as to provide him a second virtuous, kind and loving wife, in the year of our Lord 1712, who hath proved to him a true helpmeet, having by her good management and industry, and great and kind care of him, contributed much to his support and comfort, and to the keeping of his heart from breaking, under the worst of his hardships, difficulties and distress. And by her he hath had, during his confinement in Newgate, ten children, who in respect of charge and expence under his strait and narrow circumstances, and under his immurement, or being buried alive, have been no small burthen to him; yet he esteems them great blessings bestowed upon him by Almighty God, at whose tribunal, after this miserable and wretched life ended, he knows he shall appear innocent of the heinous and monstrous crime laid to his charge; and for the bare mistaken suspicion of which he hath in three reigns (and for near a year and three quarters in a fourth) been so severely treated: and then he shall, if not sooner delivered by any king upon earth, God Almighty's vicegerent here below, be delivered from the English bastile (vulgarly called Newgate) by the great and merciful God himself above, the king of kings, and only ruler of princes. It may not be improper here to distinguish our said English bastile from that in France, and to shew in what circumstances they materially differ. To which end, know, candid reader, that a state-prisoner in the Bastile in France pays not, nor is squeezed out of any thing for his lodging, meat, drink, or ease, nor is loaded with irons, nor put in dungeons, or otherwise ill used in prison; but he is always handsomely provided for, and allowed a liberal subsistence by the government according to his rank and degree: But in our said English Bastile no state-prisoner has any allowance made him from the government, and in case he hath not of his own, he must live upon charity, if he can be so happy as to meet with it, or starve: and in case he hath any known substance, he must expect to be squeezed out of a great part of it, or he shall have much worse lodging than many a tolerable dog-kennel of a kind good-natured country esquire would make, be loaded with irons, and used worse than a dog. And all this is permitted or connived at, under a government, the voice of whose people is almost perpetually boasting of liberty and property, the words liberty and property being ever uppermost, and at their tongues end, and they constantly exclaiming against arbitrary power: But God alone knows the sincerity and soundness, or the hollowness and deceitfulness of men's hearts. Can it be accounted for, that so much oppression should be suffered to be practised in a free and Christian nation (as England is); and, on the contrary, that so much humanity and relief should be shewn and used to state-prisoners in distress in France, under an absolute and arbitrary government? Sure it cannot proceed from the French being more honest, more polite, more humane, less malicious and revengeful, or of a more generous and Christian temper, than the English. For my part, I am so far from asserting it, that I will not so much as think it. But this I will affirm, that what I have before observed with respect to the different usage of prisoners, in the two several bastiles of the different nations, is not more strange than true. And now I have nothing more to add hereunto, but my hope and earnest desire, that such as, out of curiosity or otherwise, shall give themselves the trouble to read this small tract, will be pleased to judge favourably of me; to which intent I was chiefly moved and induced to the pains of writing it in my old age, and to prevent an infamous and odious character of me from being wrongfully and injuriously handed down and transmitted to posterity; the very thoughts of which have been more grievous to my mind, and more piercing and wounding to my spirit, than all the rest of my hardships and sufferings, which will ever be the case of a man well born, having an honest heart, a soldier, and a man of honour. Such a man can ill bear reproach and disgrace, not having deserved it, and to whom his good name and fama must be ever dearer, and by him held in much greater esteem, than any other thing in life, nay, even than life itself, and the author being old, as before mentioned, and (as he doth hereby frankly own) unlearned, and not skilled in letters, having chiefly been trained up in war, and not much in scholarship, he humbly hopes the same may in some measure plead his excuse for such defective words as may be found in this his short narrative, and for the plainness and uncorruptness of its style. Untruths or misrepresentations there are none in it, to the best of his knowledge and memory; nor hath he intentionally, or at all, to the best of his judgment, herein reflected upon any person, whomsoever in any wise, or upon the power, justice, or wisdom of the several parliaments, by whose repeated acts, from time to time, his confinement in prison hath been spun out to so great a length; nor upon the courts of justice and learned judges presiding therein, who have had the several opportunities before-mentioned of discharging or bailing him according to law, further or otherwise than as any reflection upon any of them, from the particular facts by him herein plainly, truly, and impartially stated, may naturally and unavoidably arise and result.

One very great misfortune it hath been to the author, and the last that he will trouble his reader withal; and which would scarce, in the case of another, be deemed a misfortune, but rather on the contrary be esteemed a very great blessing, viz. That he hath lived to so great an advanced old age, which most people would naturally desire to do, life generally speaking, being sweet, and the very thoughts of death abhorrent and shocking to nature; though death, when all other friends fail, is most certainly a kind and sure friend and deliverer in time of need, from chains and gaols, an hell upon earth: But to explain and make out, that the author's having lived so long hath been a misfortune to him, the same is verified, in this, that he hath thereby survived almost all his contemporaries, friends, and acquaintance, who have contributed to his support. And it is now too late in the day, and under confinement for him to hope or expect to make any new acquaintance or friends, whereby he may reap any advantage or assistance under his present difficult circumstances, unless this his little tract may perchance make him some friends among the good-natured, generous, and charitable part of mankind, who shall not be void of all sense, notion, and fellow-feeling of another's suffering; nor be perfect strangers to all humanity, pity, commiseration and compassion; nor profane that sacred petition in the Lord's prayer, viz. Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us; as it is to be feared many do, by having it in their mouths, when they themselves, with hardened hearts, cannot forgive even the innocent and guiltless, who have not trespassed against them. And so the author concludes with bidding his reader heartily farewell; and in attestation of the truth of what he has writ, he takes the freedom to subscribe his name.

Newgate,
March 1, 1728.

JOHN BERNARDI,

He died at his chambers in the Press-yard in Newgate, the latter end of September, 1736, in the 82d year of his age, having been a state-prisoner about 40 years in that gaol, without trial or any allowance from the government.

Ita, said day anent our sovereigne Lord's criminall letters raised, used, and execut at

* Oct. 12, 1685. Sir Duncan Campbell, of Auchinbreck; Mr. Alexander Campbell, Advocate, and many others of that surname, are cited on 60 days for joining with Argyle. And being cited at Criminal Court on the 14th of the instance off sir George M'Kenzie, of Rosehaugh, his majestie's advocate, for his highnes entreat against sir Duncan Campbell, of Auchinbreck; Archibald Campbell, sone to the lord Neill Campbell; Donald Campbell, elder, of Barbreck; John Campbell, younger, off Melfort; Archibald Campbell, off Dana (prisoner); John Campbell, of Knap; maister Alexander Campbell, advocat; Dougal Campbell, off Kelherrie, younger; the decessat Alexander M'c Millan, of Drumore, Donald M'c Neill, of Crier; Collen and Duncan Campbells elder and younger, of Blairintiber; Duncan Campbell, of Carridell; elder; Alexander Campbell, of Mart; major ——— Henderson; captain John Foulertoun; &c.

December, to be forfeited an probation, were continued to the 5th of January, 1686.

Jan. 5th, 1686. At Criminal Court, sir Duncan Campbell, of Auchinbreck, and thirte-two more, Argyleshire heritors, mentioned 22b

Forrester, minister, Mr. George Wishart, preacher; Mr. Alexander Hastie; John Guthrie; John Rodger, son-in-law in Borroustounes, Guner; Walter

Browne; Robert Elphinstone, of Lapness; captain — captain John Hendry, in Borroustounes; Patrick Campbell called Black Patrick, son to Mr. John Camp-

October, 1685, are forfeited for joining with Argyle in his rebellion. The witnesses against them were the laird of Ellangreig, &c. though under process of treason themselves. Among others, was Campbell, of Otter, whose estate the king has gifted to commissar M'Lean, son to the bishop of Argyle. There were sundry apparent heirs among the forfeited, whose second brothers were on the king's side with Athole. It were but charity to encourage them, to make them donators to their brothers forfeiture.

"January 11th, 1686. Campbell, of Ellangreig, is forfeited for being with Argyle; but he relies on a promise of the marquis of Athole's to get him a remission." Fountainhall.

"Jan. 4, 1686. The Advocate produced an indictment upon the score of rebellion against Campbell and others. There are a vast many persons put together in this indictment, upward, I think, of four score, most part are gentlemen of the name of Campbell. I name but some of them of most note: Sir Duncan Campbell, of Auchinbreck; — Campbell, of Barbreck; Mr. Arch. Campbell, son to lord Neil Campbell, whom we had forfeited before, and how he comes in again here I know not; Campbell, younger, of Melfort; Campbell, of Knap; Mr. Alexander Campbell, Advocate; Campbell, of Kilberry, younger; Alexander Macmillan, of Drummore; David M'Neil, of Crer; Duncan Campbell, of Carridel; Alexander Campbell, of Otter; major Henryson; captain John Fullerton; Mr. Geo. Wishart, (I fancy it ought to be Barclay) preacher; Mr. Alexander Hastie, preacher; Robert Elphinstone, of Lapness; captain John Henry; Patrick Campbell, commonly called Black Patrick; Patrick M'Kater, of Inchrennie; Archibald M'Levernock, of Oab; Iver M'Iver alias Campbell, of Aishness; — Campbell, of Earnathen; — Campbell, of Kildaven; — Ker, of Kersland, younger; John Campbell, of Dargachie; Rt. Campbell, his brother; Dugal Mactavish, of Dunardrie; Alex. Macarter, captain of the late Argyle.

"There is nothing of probation against those persons in the Registers; but they are remitted to the assize, who bring them in as being guilty in the rebellion with the earl of Argyle, and the Lords sentenced them to be executed and demeaned as traitors when apprehended in common form.

"Jan. 18th. Duncan Campbell, of Allengreig, younger, confesseth his accession to the late earl of Argyle's rebellion, casts himself upon the king's mercy. He, with his father Colin Campbell, of Allengreig, are sentenced to be executed July 9, at the Cross of Edinburgh, but remissions were got by that time. And December 7, Campbell, of Balavrie; Campbell, of Duns; Campbell, of Balgadro; Macclachlan, of Barnheid; Macclachlan, of Dunad; Campbell, of Blairfin-tibbert, were sentenced to be executed and demeaned, &c. in common form. This is all I meet with as to the gentlemen concerned with Argyle this year: we shall meet with some more next year; it was their estates now they were seeking for more than their blood." 2 Wodrow, 587.

I have not observed that these proceedings are mentioned by Burnet (who, indeed, was upon the continent of Europe when they occurred) or by Mr. Laing: yet several particulars in these proceedings, highly illustrate the character as to state prosecutions, of king James the 7th's government in Scotland; and of the panels included in the ditty of this first case, some were absent, and some were dead; of some the abodes, of some the Christian names, and of some the surnames are omitted. And the proceedings against the Campbells, of Allangreig, exhibit a most remarkable spectacle, a prosecution to conviction, on the part of the crown, of two persons charged with rebellion, who were tried within a fortnight after the crown had had the benefit of their testimony for the conviction of others who were charged to be their associates, and who it should seem were their neighbours, their friends, and their relatives.

In the first act of the second session of the first (and only) parliament of king James the 7th, 1686, (Act of Dissolution of the Lands of Cesnock and Duchal); and also in the ninth act of the same session (Act of Annexation of the Baronies of Muirhall and Melfort to the crown) it appears that James had (March 19th, 1686) granted to Melfort the lands of sir Duncan Campbell and other panels named in this first ditty; and also of Colin Campbell, elder, of Allengreig, and Duncan Campbell, younger, thereof, "which fell in his majesty's hands by the forfeiture of the forenamed persons." The unsparing rapacity of the court devoured at once the jackall and his prey.

See, also, Act 18, of the second session of the first (and only) parliament of king William and queen Mary, A. D. 1690: 'Act rescinding the Forfeitures and Fines past since 1665.'

Patrick Campbell, who was produced as a witness on the part of the crown, upon the trial of Campbell, of Oab, and others, was, it appears, at that time himself under sentence of death. In the act rescinding the forfeiture of Fletcher of Saltoun (chap. 16, of king William and queen Mary's first parliament) one of the grounds of reversing the judgment of Mr. Fletcher is stated to be, that the witness against him was under the terror of death, and temptation of a remission as standing charged with and prisoner for the same alleged crimes, and not pardoned till he had deposed in court.

After reading and adducing off the q'lk propositions, the lords ordaines the assyae to inclose, and returne ther verdict to morrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Lords having considered the severall acts of councill produced in favours of Collin Campbell, off Blairnithbert; Duncan Campbell, his son; Archibald Campbell, off Dana; Archibald Campbell, off Auchtimoir; Archibald Campbell brother to Dargashie, designed in the act of councill in Auchinbreck; Donald Campbell, also brother to Dargashie, designed in the act off councill in Stroudavin; with ane act off the Leivtenant court of Argyll and Tarbat, relating to ane act off councill in favours off Hugh Campbell, ane other brother off Dargashies, designed in the foresaid act in Airdtarish, upon the clearing off q'lk designatione ther wes witness sworne; they for the caus and considerations mentioned in the said acts, with consent off his majesties advocat excuses ther absence, and continew the dyet against Hugh Campbell till the twelt instant, and against the haill other persons till the first day of February nixt to come. And also, with consent off his majesties advocat, continew the dyett against Donald Campbell, off Balnabie, who is an islaman, and was not citted either personallie or at his dwelling house, and against whom ther is no sufficient probatione, till the said first day of February nixt to come, and excuses his absence.

The Lords continewes thed yet as to the faultsures off Mr. Thomas Forrester, minister; John Guthrie; Alexander Campbell, off Sonachan; John Nisbett and Donald M'Ivernock, off Ardmabreck; and the decest Dugall Campbell, off Auchterharle, till Munday nixt, and lykways Alexander Forrester, off Knockreochbeg; till the said dyet.

The said day anent the criminal proces off treasone persawed at the instance off sir Gorg M'Kenzie, off Rosehaugh, his majestie's advocat, against the decest Dugall Campbell; designed off Aughterharlie, and his nearest of kine, for his interest, for his being accessorie to or engaged in the late rebellione with Archibald sometyme earle of Argyle, in manner mentioned in the dittay, compeirand his majestie's [advocate] for his interest as persewer on the one pairt, and on the other pairt compeired Iver M'Iver alias Campbell, brother and nearest off kine off the said defunct, with Mr. Collin M'Kenzie, advocat, his procurator, and gave in a petitione to the saids lords, representing and declareing that his eldest brother, John Campbell, was the uncontraverted heritor and proprietor off the lands off Auchterharlie, extending to a merk land holden off the late Argyle, and haveing laity dyed immediately before the rebellione, without aires off his owne body, his second brother, who is now lykeways dead, is indyted to this dyet, and the petitioner is as nearest of kine cited for his interest, and since the said Dugall his second brother was nether infelt, seait, nor in possessione of the said estaite, and that the rebellions followed imediatly efter his eldest brothers decease, and that he himself, who by lawe is uncontravertedlie to succeed to his eldest brother who dyed last, vest and seased, is a loyal and honest subject, and was actualie in his majestie's service, as by a certificate, under the hand off Patrick Stewart, off Balachan, comander off the marquis off Atholl first regiment, and dated the fyth day off December last was instructed, therfor he graved that since ths his said brother were guiltie, yet that his forfeiture could produce nothing to his majestie, he having nothing in his persone but might tend to the prejudice off the petitioner ane honest and loyall subject. That ther lo'ps would ordaine ther name to be delete out off the sumonds and sist all farder procedur against him.

The lords justice generall and justice clerk, and commissioners off justiciarie, having considered the said petitione and disyre therof, delay to give answer therto, but remitt the civil interest to the judge ordinar as accords.

Rugh Campbell, brother to John Campbell, off Dargashie, indicted and accused for rysing and joyneing in arms and open rebellion with Archbald sometyme earle off Argyll, and other rebels and traitors, in the moneth off May and June last, in maner mentioned in his dittay.

Persewer.—His Majestie's Advocat.

Procurator in Defence.—Mr. John Stewart.

The said defender and his procurator declared, that he was so far from being accessory or joyneing with said laite rebellione, that upon the contrair he was most eminentlie serviceable to his majestie's interest, in so far as he was employed be John M'Arture, chamberlaine to the marquis of Montrose, in Cowal, as ane intelligencer for his majestie's service against his rebells, the q'ks intelligencers, are by an act of councill, daited the twentie nyth off July last, declared free of all pursuit, civil or criminall, for their conversing with the laite rebells, the same being done upon public faith and securitie, and under secrecy as the said act bears.

And for farther instructing that the said Hugh Campbell was one of the said intelligencers produced ane act off the leivtenant and sheriff court off Argyle and Tarbat, daited, the vynteenth of October last, wherein the said Hugh Campbell (who is therein designed of Airdtarish) is condescendit upon as one of the eight persons employed by the said John M'Arture, for giving and carryening intelligence against the saids rebells, as the said act at length bears; and for clearing that the said Hugh Campbell, who in the act of the said leivtenant court of Argyle and Tarbat above specified, is designed in Ardtarish, is the same person who in the criminal letters and dittay above mentioned is designed brother to Dargashie, he produced the said John M'Arthure and Mr. Duncan M'Arthure, minister at Killmodan, who being solemnly sworne in face of judgement made faith thereupon; And also the said John M'Arthure did lykways solemnlie depone and swear that the said Hugh Campbell was one of the eight persons, whom he employed as intelligencers for his majestie's service. The lords justice general, justice clerk, and commissioners off justiciarie, having considered the said Hugh Campbell in Ardtarish, brother to John Campbell, off Dargashie, his defences above-mentioned, verifications and instructions thereof, and witnesses depositions taken thereant, they therfor with consent off his majestie's advocat desirted and be thir presents desirts the dyet simpliciter.

Efter opening and reading of the q'lk verdict off Assyse the lords justice clerk, and commissioners off justiciary, therfor be the mouth off John Leslie dempster off court, decerned and adjudged the said Duncan Campbell, yonger, off Allangreig, and lykwayes Collin Campbell, elder, off Allangreig, his father, who was found guiltie by an assyse on the twelt instant off the treasonable crymes above specified, to be taken to the Mercat Croce of Edinburgh, upon Friday, the ninth off July nixt, to come betwixt two and four a clock in the efternoon, and ther to have ther heads severed from ther bodies, and ther name, fame, memory and honours, to be extinct, ther blood to be tainted, and ther arms to be riven furth and delate out of the books off armes, so that ther posteritie may never have place, nor be able heirefter to bruike or joyse any lands, heretages, titles, or offices within this realme in tyme coneing, and to have forfaiture omitted and tint all and sundrie ther lands, heretages, goods, and gear, whatsoever pertaining to them to our soveraine lord, to remaine perpetuallie with his highnes in propertie, which was pronounce flor doome.

February 1, 1686.

The diet deserted against Alexander Forrester, in respect it was made appear to the privy counsil that he had not voluntarily joined the rebels, but had been made prisoner by them, and forced into their service.

The diet continued against the remaining pannalls from time to time till the 6th of December 1686, when the following proceedings appear upon record:

The said day anent our sovereign lords criminal letters off treason, raised and execute at the instance off sir Robert Colt and Mr. George Bannerman his majesties solicitors, by warrant off his majestie's privie counceill, against Donald Campbell, of Oab; Archibald Campbell, of Danna; Collin Campbell, off Blairintibert; Duncan Campbell, off Culgatro; Donald Campbell, off Belnabie; Duncan Campbell, of Drumfunie; the deceast Donald Campbell, his sone; Angus Campbell, of Daltout; John Campbell, of Ulva; Angus M'Lauchlan, off Barnagad; and Allard M'Lauchlan, off Danna; and nakand mentione, That wher, notwithstanding be the common lawe, lawes and acts of parliament off this kingdome, and constant practiq theroff, particulariie be the third act off the first parliament and the threttie seventh act of the second parliament off king James the first, and be the fourteenth act of the sixt parliament, and fourtie nyuth act off the twelt parliament of king James the second, and nyntie seventh act off the seventh parliament off king James the 1yth, and hundredth flouretie flouath act off the twelt parliament off king James the sixt, and first act off the first session off the first parliament off king Charles the second, the ryseing off his majestie's subjects, or any number off them, the joyneing and assembling together in armes without or contrary to his majestie's command, warrant or authoritie, and the abaitteing, assisting, receipting, intercomoneing, or keeping correspondence with such rebels, supplying of them with help, red or counsell, or giving them meatt or drink, or any releife or comfort, or the not searching for or apprehending off them, or not expelling off them furth off the country, or not giving tymeous intelligence off them for that effect, ar most detestable, horrid, hynous, and abominable crymes of rebellione, treason, and lese majestie, and ar punishable by forfaiture off lyfe, land and goods; and be the eleventh act first session off the second parliament of King Charles the second, it is statute and ordained, that in tyme coming, in all cases of treasonable ryseing in armes and open and manifest rebellione against the king's majestie, his advocat flor the tyme may and ought to inst against and present such persons as he shall be ordered be his majestie or his privie counsell to persew, and if they be cited and doe not compear, his majesties justices, notwithstanding off ther absence, may and ought to proceed to consider and give their interloquitor upon the lybell, and iff it be found relevant to admitt the same to the knowledge off the assyse, and upon the verdict of the inquest finding the same to be proveine, the doome and sentence off forfaiture ought to proceed, and be given and pronounced in the same manner as iff the persons accused had compeared and were present. Nevertheless, it is offteriffe, that the saids Donald, Archibald, Collin, and Duncan Campbells and the other persons above compeained upon, shacking off all fear of God, respect and regard to his majestie's authority and lawes, have presumed to commit, and be guilty off the saids crymes, in sua farr as ther being in the year 1683, ane helish and damnable plott and conspiracie, entered into be the late earles off Shafteburie, Essex, Argyle and others, rebels and traitors, subjects off this kingdome and off England, flor killing and murdering, at least seized upon his sacred majestie's person and his royall brother, ther late gracious souveraine King Charles the second, and for raisinge open warr and rebellion in both kingdoms, and for furnishing men, money, ships and armes, to the late earle off Argyle for that effect; and accordingly, the said laite earle off Argyle and severall others, rebels and traitors, with him, did most treasonable invade this his majestie's auncient kingdome, with men, ships, armes, and amonitione, and landed with them in the west highlands off Scotland, upon the day off May, 1685 years; and no sooner had they landit, then the saids Donald, Archibald, Colline, and Duncan Campbells, and the haill remanent persons above compeained upon, rose and joyned in open armes and rebellione, and did convocat and gather together his majestie's ledges to the number off ffour or ffyve thousand men, within the myres off Argyle, Tarbat, highlands, and isles therabout, in open rebellion against his majestie and his authority, and did issue furth treasonable declarations and proclamations, and did take in and maintaine forts, strenghts, and garrisons, against his majestie and his forces, did robb and plunder the goods and hooss off his majestie's good subjects, randevouzed and exercised themselves, did seinit furth, kill and murder severall off his majestie's good subjects and souldiours, and did continue, in open and avowed rebellione against his majestie and his authority, counteing all acts off hostilitie and high treason, until they were disparte and defeat; and the saids haill fornamed persons, did treasonable harbour, rectept, intercomon, converse and correspond with, did abate, assist, supplie, give help, redd, counsell, meatt, drink, releife, and comfort, to the said laite earle off Argyle, sir John Cochran, sometyme off Cehdritie; sir Patrick Hume, off Pollwort; William Denholme, off West shells; and others, fornamed and declared traitors, in company with him in the saids moneths off May and June, 1685 yeares, within the saids Western highlands and isles, did not exact diligence in searching and apprehending off them, and expelling off them furth off the countrey, nor gave not tymeous notice nor intelligence to our commanders or officers flor that effect, throne the doing and committing wheroff one or other off the saids deeds, the saids Donald, Archibald, Collin, and Duncan Campbells, and the other persons above compeained upon, have committed the crymes and incurred the paines of high treason, rebellion, and lese majestie, and ar actor and part theroff, which being found be ane assyse, they ought to be punished with lyfe, lands, and goods, to the terror and example off others to comit the lyke herefter; Compeared the saids sir Robert Colt and Mr. George Baumerman, his majestie's solicitors, as persewers, and produced the forsaid criminal letters dewlie execute and indorsit against the said persons offenders, and against the nearest off line to the said deceast Donald Campbell, younger, off Drumnac, by a pursavant and trumpet, with his majestie's coat off armes displayed, sound off trumpet, open proclamation, and using other solemnities necessary. Compeared lykwayes Patrick Wilson, Carriek pursavant, executor off the saids letters, Neil McNeill, writer, in Edinburgh; John Douglas and James Kelle, residents there; James McLarran and James Fergusone, servitors to Patrick Stewart, off Balachan, witness therto, and being soleimnlie sworne in presence off the justices and assysers sittand in judgment made faith upon the truth and veritie off the samen in all points. His majestie's [solicitors] produced ane act of privie counsell, ordering them to persew a proces off forfaitur against the persons above named, wheroff the tenor follows:

The Lords off his majestie's privie counsell being informed that the persons under written, viz. Donald Campbell, of Oab; Archibald Campbell, off Dana; Collin Campbell, off Blairintibert; Duncan Campbell, off Culgratock; Donald Campbell, off Belinabie; Duncan Campbell, off Drumfue; and Donald Campbell, his sone; Angus Campbell, of Daltout; John Campbell, off Ulva; Angus M'Lauchlan, off Barnagad; and Alland M'Lauchlan, off Dunade, were actually in, or accessorie to, or airt or part off the late Argyll's rebellione, doe therfor hereby give order and warrant to his majestie's sollicitors, with all diligence to persewe a proces off forfealture against the saiks persons before the lords commissioners of his majestie's justiciary for the crumes foresaid, and that at the publick charge, and take recognitions if the witnesses be therein. Extracted by me, WILLIAM PATTERSON, Clk. Sci. Cl.

Compeared the said Duncan Campbell, of Galtatro, and Donald Campbell, of Baluabie; Angus M'Lauchlan, of Barnagado; Allan M'Lauchlane, off Dunade, defenders, and entered themselves in pannel and humble and ingenuouslie confess their guiltines of the crumes above specified in manner afore mentioned; and the said Archibald Campbell, of Dana; Colline Campbell, off Blairintibert; Duncan Campbell, off Drumfue; Angus Campbell, of Daltout; John Campbell, off Ulva; being oft tymes called to have compared before the saids Lords, this day and place, in the hour of cause to have underlyen the law for the crumes above specified, and the saids defenders and the nearest of kine of the deceased Donald Campbell, off Drumfue, to have given in their defence's against the lybell, and objections against the witnesses and assysers, if they any had, lawfull tyme of day bidden, and come of them comparand, the said Lords therefore, be the mouth of John M'Kenzie, master of court, decreed and adjudged the said Archibald, Colline, Angus, and John Campbells, to be denounced our sovereigne Lord's rebels, and put to the horn, and all their moveables, goods, and gear, to be escheat and inbrought to his majestie's use, for their being outlaws and fugitives from the laws for the crumes above specified; thereafter the saids Lords did proceed to consider and give their interlocutor upon the lybell, whereof the tenor follows:

The lords justice general, justice clerk, and commissioners off justiciary, having considered the lybell perscued be his majesties sollicitors against Donald Campbell, of Baluabie; Archibald Campbell, of Dana; Duncan Campbell, of Culgratock; the deceased Donald Campbell, of Drumfue; Angus M'Lauchlane off Barnagad; Allan M'Lauchlane, off Dunade; Collin Campbell off Blairintibert; (against whom his majesties sollicitors did insist in the first place) they find the said lybell relevant, and remitts the same to the knowledge of an assize.

The Lords ordained the Assize to inclose and returne their verdict to morrow at twelve o'clock.

The Lords having ordained the pannels to be carryed prisoners to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, Mr. John Stewart advocate as procurator for them, produced an act of privy council, whereof the tenor follows:

EDINBURGH, December 6, 1686.

The Lords of his majestie's privie council being informed that there are several persons this day indicted before the lords commissiouners off his majestie's justiciary for the crymes off treason, as having been in the late rebellion with the late earle of Argyle, and considering that Duncan Campbell, sometyme of Culgatro; Angus M'Lauchlan, some tyme of Barnagad; Allan M'Lauchlane, some tyme of Dunnado; and Donald Campbell, sometyme feuar of Belnabie; have saiffe conducts for sometyme not yet expyred, doe therefore recomend to the lords commissiouners of justiciary that in case the saids persons, or any of them, be found guilty of the saids crymes by the verdict of Assize, that in respect of the saids saiffe conducts yet depending, they be not committed to prison; but permitted to go from the bar to enjoy the benefit of the said saiffe conducts, for the tyme remaining; in respect the lords of counceill is to recomend them to his sacred majestie for his royal remission to them for their lives only. Extracted be me.

Verdict of Assize.

The said day the persons who passed upon the assyse off Archibald Campbell, of Danna, and others, returned their verdict in presence of the saids lords, whereof the tenor follows: the assyse having elected and chosen Patrick Smith, of Bracco, their chancellor, they all in one voice finds the lybell sufficiently proven against Archibald Campbell, of Danna; Collin Campbell, of Blairintibert; Duncan Campbell, of Culgatro; Donald Campbell, of Belnabie; the deceased Donald Campbell, sone to Duncan Campbell, of Drumfunie; Angus M'Lauchlane, off Barnagad; and Allan M'Lauchlane, off Dunnado; and that for their being in rebellion with the late earl of Argyle, and the other rebels, with him in the highlands, in May and June, 1685 years, and being in armes with them, the which verdict is subscribed be the foresaid chancellor in name of the inquest, and written by Henry Jossie clerk elected.

The Lords having considered the verdict of assize returned against the persons above named, they, in respect thereof, decern and adjudge the said Donald Campbell, off Belnabie; Archibald Campbell, of Dana; Duncan Campbell, of Culgatro; Angus M'Lauchlane, of Barnagad; Allan M'Lauchlane, of Dunnado; and Colin Campbell, of Blairintibert; to be execut to the death, demeaned as traitors, and to undergo the paines of treason and utter punishment appoynted by the laws off this realm, at such tymes and places and in such manner, as our sovereign lord the king's most sacred majestie shall appoynt; and ordaines their names, fames, memory, and honours, off the decessat Donald Campbell, off Drum, to be extinct, ther blood to be tainted, and thur armes to be riven furth and delete out of the books off armes, so that their posteritie may never have place nor be able to bruike or joyse any honours, offices, titles, or dignities hereafter within this realm, and in tyme coming and to have forfeaulted, omitted, and tint all and sundrie thur lands, heritages, taxes, stradings, rooms, possessions, titles, effects, goods, and gear, whatsoever pertaining to them, to our sovereign lord, and to remain perpetuallie with his majestie in propertie. Which was pronounced for doon. Whereupon his majesties solicitors asked and took instruments.

March 3, 1687.

The said day, anent the criminal actione and procees of treason, formerlie insisted and now persewed at the instance of his majestie's advocat, against Donald Campbell, off Oab;

Duncan, elder, of Drumnunie; Angus Campbell, of Daltot; and John Campbell of Ulva; for their rýseing and joyneing in armes and in rebellione with the laite Argyle and other rebells, in maner mentioned in ther dittay, which, with the former procedur thereaunt, is recordit the sixt of December last, which criminal action being this day called, compeired sir John Dalrymple, younger, off Stair, his majestie's advocat, with sir Robert Colt and Mr. Georg Bannerman, advocats, his majesties solicitors, as persewers on the one pairt, and on the other pairt compeired the said Donald Campbell, of Oab; who denyed the dittay, and crymes, lybelled, and Angus Campbell, of Daltont; and John Campbell, of Ulva; who confess in maner efter specifit.

His Majesty's Advocat declares he restricts the lybell to the pannalls joyning with the rebells, or corresponding or conversing with, or harbouring, recepting, or assisting them, or being airt or pairt off the rebellione lybelled.

Mr. John Stewart, advocat, as procurator for the pannalls, alleadges, that that pairt off the lybell that the pannall Oab was perhaps once seen in company with the rebells, that per se is not relivant; because in this particular case, it should be made appear that the pannall was ever in company with the rebells, which is denyed; It is offered to be provine by the persewers witness, that the pannall hade a daughter dead, to be hurried to-morrow efter the pannall sawe the rebells; and it was going to the littell village to gett some necessarys for her burriall; farder alleadges, that wearreing off armes per se is not relivant, and particularlie having off a sword, alwayes denyng that the pannall hade any or wore any sword, at any tyme that ever they ranconterd with the rebells, because in that countrey, and at the tyme of that horrid rebellione, ther was no man that hade a sword, but he hade it about him to give a signification off the loyalte and dependance upon his majestie if the occasione should offer, and to defend themselves against the violence off the rebells, which cannot in no sence infer such an abominable guilt as that off the cryme off treason lybelled.

Sir Robert Colt, one of his majestie's solicitors, oppons the lybel which is most relivantie lybelled upon the invasione by the late Argyle, and that the pannalls are airt and pairt off the said rebellione as being eyr actualle in armes with the late Argyle or those that rose in that rebellione, or as assistants theroff, or as corresponders with, and in company with these rebells, whither in armes or without armes; so that the lybel being relivant in the severall members theroff, and the defence, resolving in a naked denyal off the lybell; and Campbell, of Oab, for whom this defence is proponed, having raised no exculpatione, and having alleadged nothing that can eleid the relivance, the defence ought to be repelled and the lybell admitted to the knowledge off ane inquest, in order to its being provine or not, and take instrumt upon the pannalls procurators acknowledging the pannalls being present with the rebells voluntarie at that same place mentioned in the defence.

Mr. John Stewart oppons the defence, which is no acknowledgement, but upon the contraire, ane expresse denyall off all the articles off the lybell, and that which is alleadged against the relivance is nowayes answered, nor could a lybell off that nature be sustained supposing it were proven that which is insinuat, and the defence, because the pannall perhaps one single tyme, the tyme off the whole rebellione, was seen in a littell clachan or village wher the rebells was, about such a necessary duty, and never being seen with them befor or efter, or in company with any of them, albeit he hade a sword about him at that tyme it cannot inferre the treasonable converse lybelled.

INTERLOQUITOR.

The lords justice general, justice clerk and commissioners off justiciarie, having considered the lybell perseved at the instance off his majestie's advocat and solicitors against Donald Campbell, off Oab; Duncan Campbell, elder of Drumnunie; Angus Campbell, of Daltont; John Campbell, of Ulva; with the debate above written, they find the lybell as it is restricted, viz. that the pannalls, joynd with the rebells, or corresponded or conversed with, or harbourd or recept, or assisted them, or was airt or pairt off the rebellione lybelled, relevant separatin to infer the crime and paine of treason, and remitts the samen to the knowledge of the assyse.

* The celebrated Graham, of Claverhouse, who forms a very conspicuous figure in the Scottish History in the seventeenth century. Upon the meeting of the Convention of Estates, "he went" Dalrymple instructs us, "wherever the spirit of Montrose should direct him," a modern fiction, says Laing, exceeded only by another, that his heroism was caught from the recitation of Ossian's Poems. He was killed in the battle of Killcranky, (June 17th, 1689), where he had beaten the troops of king William under Mackay. Pictoria has honoured him with the following epitaph:

Ultima Scotorum, potuit quo sospite solo
Libertas Patrie salva fuisse quæ:
Te moriente, novas accepit Scotie cives,
Accipitque novos, te moriente, Dens.
Illa tibi superasse negat, tu non potes illi:

Which Dryden did not disdain to translate as follows:

"Oh, last and best of Scots! who did maintain Thy country's freedom from a foreign reign;
New people fill the land, now thou art gone,
New Gods the temples, and new kings the throne.
Scotland and thou didst each in other live,
Nor wouldst thou have nor could she thee survive.
Farewell, who dying didst support the state,
And couldst not fall but with thy country's fate."

Dalrymple has printed the following Correspondence, furnished to him, he says, by sir David Dalrymple (Lord Hailes):

Lord Strathnaver to Lord Dundee.

"My lord; The concern that many equally interested in us both, has for your lordship, ab-

Execution of Newton, of Drinn; — sir Ewan Cameron, of Lochzeith; — Cameron, his eldest son; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Schute; the laird of M'Naughton; — Grant, of Ballandalloch; — Stewart, of Appin; — M'Kean, alias M'Donald, elder, of Glendoe; Alexander M'Donald, younger, of Glengary; Donald M'Neill, of Callahellie; and sir John M'Lean, of Dowart, and divers others their associates and accomplices. The authentick copie wherof, in English, produced in manner after specified maketh mention, That where the crimes of rebellious and treason, ryeing and continuing in armes against their majesties and their highness authority and government, and the assaulting of their majesties forces, the garisoning of houses and strengths, the harbouring, corresponding, and associating with open rebels and traitours; the falling upon, wounding or robbing their majesties forces in their retreat, are high crimes, punishable with forfeiture of lyfe, lands, and goods; and by the third act first parliament King James the first, it is statute and ordained, That no man sottourly rebell against the king's persone, under the pain of forfaiting of lyfe, lands and goods; and by the thretty-seventh act of his second parliament, it is statute, that nae man wilfully resett, entertaine, or doe favours to open and manifest abstracting from that respect which your own merits made me have, cannot but occasion regret in me, to see that the courses you take, tend inevitably to the ruin of you and yours, if persisted in. I cannot therefore but wish, that you would follow the duke of Gordon's example, and I am persuaded it will be found the best course; neither shall your friends who at this time dare not well meddle, be wanting to show their affection to you, and interest in the standing of your family, and I hope you will do me the justice to believe that none wishes it better, or will more effectually lay himself out in it, than, my lord, &c. STRATHNAVER."

"Inverness,
"3d of July, 1689."

Lord Dundee to Lord Strathnaver.

"My lord; Your lordship's, dated the 3d, I received the 13th, and would have returned an answer before now, had I not been called suddenly to Enverlochie, to give orders anent the forces, arms, and ammunition sent from Ireland. My lord, I am extremely sensible of the obligation I have to you, for offering your endeavours for me, and giving me advice in the desperate estate you thought our affairs were in. I am persuaded it flows from your sincere goodness and concern for me and mine, and in return, I assure your lordship, I have had no less concern for you, and was thinking of making the like address to you; but delayed it till things should appear more clear to you. I am sorry your lordship should be so far abused as to think, that there is any shadow of appearance of instability in this new structure of go-rebells; and by the 14th and 15th acts parliament 6th of king James the second, and parliament twelfth king James the sixth caput on hundred and forty-six, the ryeing in fear of weare, or supplying the rebels in help, red, or council, or the staffing of houses for the furthering of the king's rebels, are crimes for which the persones are punishable as traitours, against whom not only forfeitures are allowed to proceed in absence by the eleventh act of the first session second parliament of king Charles 2nd, but also by the 69th act parliament 6th king James the fyfth, the summonds of treasons may be perswaded against the sir for the treason committed by his predecessor: Nevertheless it is of verity, that the deceist John viscount of Dundee, and James earle of Dumfermling; — viscount of Frendraught; — lord Dunkeld; major William Grahame, off Baquihaple; coltenell Alexander Cannan; John Clelland, of Fasken; Mr. Colin M'Kenzie, uncle to the earle of Seaforth; sir John Drummond, of Machany; William Crawford, younger, of Ardmillan; James Crawford, his brother; — Robertsoode, of Strowan; Mr. David Grahame, brother to the viscount of Dundee; the deceist — Halyburton, of Pitcurr, and — Halyburton, his sone; James Edmonstoun, of Newtown, of Drinn; sir Ewan Cameron, of Lochzeith; — verment these men have framed to themselves: they made you, I doubt not, believe, that Darie (Londonderry) was relieved three weeks ago. By printed accounts, and I can assure you, it never was relieved, and now is taken. They told you, the English fleet and Dutch were masters of the sea. I know for certain the French is, and in the Chanel; in testimony whereof they have defeated our Scots fleet. For as they came alongst they fell on the two frigats, killed the captains, and seized the ships, and brought the men prisoners to Mull. They tell you Shomberg is going to Ireland to carry the war thither. I assure you the king has lauded a considerable body of forces there, and will land himself amongst our friends in the west (whom I am sorry for) very soon. So, my lord, having given you a clear and true prospect of affairs, which I am afraid amongst your folks you are not used with, I leave you to judge if I or you, your family or mine, be most in danger. However, I acknowledge frankly, I am no less obliged to your lordship, seeing you made me an offer of your assistance in a tyme when you thought I needed it. Wherein I can serve your lordship or family at any tyme you think convenient, you may freely employ me. For, as far as my duty will allow me in the circumstances we stand, I will study your well as becomes, my lord, your most humble servant, Dundee."

Campbell, his eldest sone; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Selkirk; the laird of M'Naughtons; Grant, of Ballindalloch; Stewart, of Appin; M'Lean, alias M'Donald, elder, of Glencoe; Alexander M'Donald, younger, of Glengerrie; Donald M'Neil, of Glenbellie; and sir John M'Keap, of Dowart, with diverse others their associates and accomplices, having shaken off all fear of God and regard to their ma'ties and their lands, and love to their native cuntry, they did ryse and continow in open armes against their majesties authority and government, the first, second, thrid, or ane or other of the dayes of the moneth of April, 1689 years, or ane or other of the dayes of the moneth of May thereafter, the said year; and upon the — day of May or ane or other of the dayes of the said moneth and year of God forsaide, the said decest John, viscount of Dundee, and the other persons a'mentioned, did come to the toune of Perth in fear of wear, and therein in ane hostile manner did seize and carry away the decest laird of Blair, and other officers of their majesties forces, and detained the laird of Blair prisoner in the castl of Dowart, in a cruell and sad conditione, till he dyed; and upon the — day of June, one thousand six hundred and eighty nyne years, or ane or other of the dayes of the said moneth, the persones abovenamed and others, being all armed, marching to joyne the rebells, did attack a certain number of their majesties forces under the command of captain Alexander Young, in Kyn tyre; as also the said John, viscount of Dundee, James, earle of Dumfermling, and the other persones abovenamed, haveing raised and assembled severall thousands of rebells, and highland rebells, [sic in orig.] they had the boldness to march throw the cuntry, oppressing and destroying their majesties good and loyall subjects, and to oppose their forces; and upon the 26th day of July, 1689, or ane or other of the dayes of the said moneth, the said unq'll John, viscount of Dundie, as general or leader of the persons forsaids, and other rebells, did in a plain battle attack their majesties armie, betwixt the blair of Athole and the pass of Gilliechrankie, and did kill and wound severall of their majesties forces and good subjects; and thereafter, upon the — dayes of August, 1689, or ane or other of the dayes of the said moneth, or ane or other of the moneths of the said year, the said James earle of Dumfermling, and the other persons forsaids, and their accomplices, did attack their majesties forces at Donkeld, where they did kill lieutenant collonell William Okeiland, major — Hender, and severall others of their majesties officers, and faithfull souldiers; and haveing mett and assembled at Innerlochie upon the first, second, or third dayes of the month of — and year of God forsaide, or ane or other of the dayes of the months of — they entered into treasonable conspiracies, bonds, and associations, for furnishing of certain numbers and proportions of armed men for the maintenance and support of the rebellion, and sent out parties to murder and destroy their majesties good subjects, and to robb and herrie them of their goods, and the particular acts of rebellion, treason, ryseing, and continueing in armes against their majesties authority and government, the assaulting of their forces, the garrisoning of houses, and strengths, the harbouring, corresponding with open rebells and traitours, and the falling upon, wounding or robbing their ma'ties forces, and the other crimes abovementioned, upon the dayes re'ive of the severall monthes of the said year, one thousand six hundred and eighty nyne, or upon ane or other of the dayes of one or other of the moneths of the said year 1689, off the which horrid and treasonable crimes above specified, or ane or other of them, the hail forenamed persones, and ilk ane of them are actors airt and pairt, which being found by their majesties and the estates of parliament, they ought to be punished as horrid traitors and rebells, with forfeiture of lyfe, lands, honour, and goods, to the terror of others to committ the lyke in tyme comeing; and therefore the saids hail defenders abovenamed, to have compared before their majesties and the three estates of parliament within the parliament house of Edinburgh, at ane certane daye bygone, to have heard and seen sentence and decreet, given and pronounced against them in the same matter, as at more length is contained in the said principall summons, which contains therein a warrant for executing thereof, with the usuall solemnities necessar upon twenty fyve days warning, at the mercat cross of the head burgh of the shyre, where the fornamed persones live; and in case there be not tutus accessus thereto at the head burgh of the next adjacent shyre where they live, conforme to ane act of the first sessione of your majesties first parliament, dated the first day of August, 1689 years, as the said summons raised and dewly execute against the hail fornamed persones more fully propret, The said sir John Dalrymple, their majesties advocat, compared personally, who desyred that the said proces of treasons raised before the parliament at his instance against the representatives of the viscount of Dundee, and — Halyburton, of Pitcurr; and against the said James earle of Dumfermling, and the persons abovenamed, and others in this kingdom, who rose in actual rebellion against their majesties, and still continow in armes, might be called, and accordingly all the persons against whom the lybel or indytement of high treason is raised were thryce publicly called by meacers at the barr and at the great door of the house, and none of them compareing, the said sir John Dalrymple, their ma'ties advocat, produced in presence of the estates of parliament, the letters and indytement of high treason wrytten in Latine upon parchment, under the hand and subscriptione of the deput director of the chancelary, keeper of the quarter seal, together with ane other dupliant thereof, under the hand and subscriptione of the said deputy, director of the Chancery, keeper of the said quarter seals, item, Ane authentick copie of the said letters of treason translated into English, together with the forsaid act of parliament, dated the first day of August, 1689 years, whereby the king and queen's majesties and the estates of parliament doe grant warrant to his majesties advocat to raise ane indytement of high treasons befor the parliament, against the viscount of Dundee, the earle of Dumfries, and other persones, who are in open rebellion against their majesties; and lykways against all such persones as intercepted any of his majesties forces under the command of major generall M'Kay in their retreat, and killed, wounded, or robbed them of their cloaths, horses, and armes; and thereby they declare that a citation against the saids persones, at the mercat cross of the head burgh of the shyre where they duell, or in case ther be not tutus accessus therto at the mercat cross of the head burgh of the next adjacent shyre shall be sufficient; and after production and reading of the said indytement, in Latine, wherof there was two principalls produced and ane authentick copie thereof in English, and the act of parliament abovementioned, which were read in audience of their majesties high commissioner and the estates of parliament, their majesties said advocat did produce ane executione of the said summons, dated the 7th, 8th, 10th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 24th days of March, 1690 years, under the hand of George Ogilvy, Albany herald; bearing that the said George Ogilvy, Albany herald, att command of the saids letters of treason raised at the instance of their majesties said advocat against the saids defenders, and by vertew thereof, with one of their majesties trumpeters, and witness thereunto subscriyving, past upon the said 7th day of March, to the mercat cross of Coupar, in Fyfe, head burgh of the s'reldome thereof; and upon the said eight day, to the mercat cross of Forfar, head burgh of the s'reldome thereof; and upon the said 10th day, to the mercat cross of Aberdeen; and upon the said 12th day, to the mercat cross of Bamff; and upon the said 13th day, to the mercat cross of Elgine of Forres; and upon the said 14th day to the mercat crosses of Nairne and Invernes rextive; and upon the said 24th day, to the mercat cross of Perth, head burghs of the s'reldomes thereof, and thereat ilk ane of the saids croces rextive and successive in their majesties names and authority with their coats of armes displayed, sound of trumpet, and other solemnities requisite and necessary open proclamation and publick reading of the said summons of treason, he lawfully charged the hail persones above and abovementioned, viz. John viscount of Dundee; James earle of Dumfries; viscount of Frendraught; lord Dunkeld; major William Graham of Banquhalp; colonell Alexander Cameron; John Cleland of Esker; Mr. Colin Milne, uncle to the earle of Seaforth; sir John Drummond of Machony; William Crawford, younger, of Ardmilian; James

Crawford, his brother; — Robertsons of Strowan; David Graham, brother to the deceist John, viscount of Dundee, for himself, and as representing the said viscount; — Halyburton, of Pitcurr; and — Halyburton, as air to the said deceist — Halyburton, of Pitcurr, his father; James Edinbustoun, of Newtoun, of Downe; sir Ewan Cameron, of Lochzeel; — Cameron, his eldest sone; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Sclate; the laird of M'Naughtoun; Grant, of Ballindalloch; — Stewart, of Appin; — M'Lean, alias M'Donald, elder, of Glencoe; Alexander M'Donald, younger, of Glengarie; Donald M'Neill, of Gallihellie; and sir John M'Keam, of Dowart, and diverse others, their associates, and accomplices; and all others the successors of such of them as are dead, and your tutors and curators, if they any have for their intrest; to have compared befor the high court of parliament, within the parliament house of Edinburgh, upon the days particularly mentioned in the said summons, and that he made certification, and affixt and left authentick doubles, with a list of the witness, at and upou ilk ane of the said mercat crosses, befor and in presence of the witness mentioned, in and subscriyving witness to the said executione; together with another executione under the hand of William Glover, Rothesay herald, bearing that upon the said eight, tenth, twelt, fourtein, and fyfteen days rextive of the month of March, 1690 years, the said William Glover to have at command of the said summons of treason, at the instance of the said sir John Dalrymple, their majesties advocat, for ther highnes intrest, against the hail defenders abovenamed, and their accomplices, past with ane trumpeter, upon the said 8th day of March, and year of God forsaid, to the mercat cross of Lanerk, head burgh of the s'reldome thereof, and upon the tenth day of March, and year of God above wryten, to the mercat cross of Air, head burgh of the s'reldome thereof; and also upon the said 12th day of March, and year of God, forsaid, to the mercat cross of Inverarie, head burgh of the s'reldome of Argyle; and upon the fourteen day of March, and year of God above wrytin, to the mercat cross of Renfrew, head burgh of the s'reldome thereof, and upon the fyfteen day of March, and year of God forsaid, to the mercat cross of Sterling, head burgh of the s'reldome thereof; and there at ilk ane of the saids crosses, respective and successive; in their majesties name and authority, the said William Glover, Rothesay herald, lawfully summoned, warned, and charged, ilk ane of the fornamed persones abovenamed, and others contained in the summons of treason, and ilk ane of them, and the successors of such of them as are dead, be sound of trumpet, three severall tymes, with displayed coat, be open proclamation, and publick reading of the said summons of treason, and using other solemnities, necessary to compare befor their majesties high court of parliament, to be holden within the parliament house of Edinburgh, at ene certain day bygone, in the hour of cause without continuation of dayes, to the effect for the caus'st and made certification as is exprest in the said summons of treasons, and affixt and left ene just and authentick copie upon ilk one of the saids mercat crosses, respective and successive, upon the dayes respective above specified, together with a list of the witness names befor, and in presence of the witness mentioned, and designed in the execution and subscribing witness therto, as the saids executions more fully bears. Therafter the saids George Ogilvie, Albany herald, and the said William Glover, Rothesay herald, who did execute the saids letters of treasons, and the witness ins't and subscribing witness to their saids executions respective forsaid, compared personally in presence of their majesties high commissioner and the estates of parliament; and after publict readings of the said lybell of treasons in Scots, and the executions of the samen; the saids heralds and witness, being solemnly sworne, and interrogat,* deponed that the saids executions formerly subscribed by the saids heralds and witness, were trew executions in all poynts, in manner therein contained, and that the samen was true, as they should answer to God, as their oaths and depositions, wryten upon the back of the saids respective executions and subscribed by them, and by the president of parliament, more fully bears. Therafter their majesties advocat did obviat three objections which might be made; Primo, that where the executions does not bear that the parties were ceited at their duelling houses, but only at the mercat cross of the head burgh of the shyres, he represented that the warrant given by the parliament for raising the proces, does expressly allow that manner of citation; Secundo, Albeit the persons cited be absent, yet the leading of probation against them, altho absent, is expressly warranted by the act of the session of parliament, king Charles the second, in anno 1669; Tertio, the deduceing of probation against persons guilty of treason after their death, is conform to the sixty nyuth act, sext parliament of king James the fyfth, which acts were read in audience of their majesties high commissioner and the estates of parliament, and then their majesties advocat declared, that he restricted the lybell to the defenders their being actually in armes against their majesties, after the fourth day of May, 1689 years, (which was twenty one days after the proclamation of their majesties king William and queen Mary, to be king and queen of this realme) or such of the saids defenders who joyned with any of the rebels who were in armes after the said day; and the said James earle of Dumfermling; ——— viscount of Frendraught; ——— lord Dunkeld; major William Grahame, of Baughaple; colonnell Alexander Cannon; John Clelland, of Fasken; Mr. Colin M'Kenzie, uncle to the earle of Seaforth; sir John Drummond, of Machannie; William Craufurd, younger, of Ardmillan; James Craufurd, his brother; ——— Robertsons, of Strowan; James Edmouston, of Newton, of Doune; sir Ewan Cameron, of Lochzeel; ——— Cameron, his eldest sone; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Sclait; The laird of M'Naughton; ——— Grant, of Ballindalloch; ——— Stewart, of Appin; ——— M'Kean alias M'Donald elder of Glencoe; Alexander M'Donald, younger, of Glengarie; Donald M'Neill, of Gallahellie; and sir John M'Lean, of Dewart, and also the said David Grahame, for himself, and as successor to the late viscount of Dundee; and ——— Halyburton, of Pitcurr, son to the said ——— Halyburton, of Pitcurr, his father; being lawfully summoned by heralds, with displayed coats, and sound of trumpet, and other solemnities requisite, to have answered to the forsaid indytement; and being oft and diverse tymes called by macers in the parliament house, and at the great door which was cast open as use is and not compearand, the which lybell and indytement of treasons persewed by their majesties advocat against the deceast viscount of Dundee, and his representatives, the earle of Dumfermling, and others contained in the lybell, with the executions thereof, with the principall indytement, and the authentic double of the samyne, in English, with the forsaid act of parliament, empowering and granting warrant to the said sir John Dalrymple, their majesties advocat, to intent, raise, and prosecute, the forsaid lybell of treasons against the saids defenders in the way and manner abovementioned, being at length heard, seen and considered by their majesties and the estates off parliament; and they therewith well and ripely advysed, They by their vote and interlocutor, fand the lybell relevant in thir termes, that these persons were actually in armes against their majesties after the fourth day of May, 1689 years, or joyned with any of the rebels, who were in armes after the said day relevant to infer the pain of treasons; After pronouncing of which interlocutor their majesties advocat persewer did adduce diverse famous witnesses, lawfully ceited for proving the poynts of the lybell admitted to his probations, who having compeared in presence of their majesties high commissioner and the estates of parliament, and being solemnly sworne, purged of partiall counsell, examined, and interrogat, upon the poynts of the lybell and indytement of treasons, admitted to the persewars probations, deposed in manner mentioned in their oaths and depositions, as the samen subscribed by them and the president of parliament extant in the proces fully bears; and sicklyke, their majesties advocat produced the wreis aftermentioned, viz. Ate* bond of association entred into by the laird of Lochzeell, Donald M'Donald younger, of Sclait, and other highlanders, wherby they bind and obledge themselves, for his majesties (the late king James) service and their own safety, to meet at the day of September, 1689 years, and to bring alongst with them the number of fencible men; that is to say, each one of them their proportionall part and number, particularly y^rin enumerat, but it is therby declared, that in case any of the rebels shall assault or attack any of the persones mentioned in the said bond of association, betwixt the date thereof and the forsaid day of randevouze, they doe solemnly promise to assist one another to the outmost of their power; dated the 24th day of August, 1689 years; Item, another bond of association betwixt the viscount of Frendraught, John Grant, of Ballindallech, and others, dated att the 15th day of January 1690 years, whereby, as they pretend in testimonie of their loyalty to their sacred and dread sovereign; and for the security of their freinds and good neighbours, they vow and protest befor the Almighty God, and on their salvation at the great day, to goe on secretly and with all the power and strength they have to stick and hyde by one another, and when any of them shall be stressed or any ways molested by any pairty or enemie whatsoever, they shall repair to their aid with all their strength and power, and that upon the first call without any further murr or delay; and that they shall never be byassed or broken off the said associatione, without the consent of his majestie's generall and the major pairt of themselves, So help them God; as also produced ane letter wryten by the said sir Ewan Cameron, of Lochzell; Mr. Colin M'Kenzie, uncle to the earle of Seaforth; John Grant, of Ballindalloch; the laird of M'Naughtoun; sir John M'Lane, of Dovart; and others of the highland clans, direct to major Generall M'Kay from Birse, the 17th day of August 1689, in answer to his q^yby they acknowledge the receipt of the major generall's letter fra Strathbogie, and they said that he gave account to brigadier Cannon from St. In'stone, to which he gave a civill return, for by telling that they support themselves by fictions and stories (a thing known all the world over) is no railleing; and that the Christian means (as the major generall said in his last) they make use of to advance their good cause by, is evident to all the world, and the argument they use to move them to address to their government, is consequentiall to the whole; for, instead of telling them what Christians, men of honour, good subjects, and good neighbours, ought to doe, he tells them in both letters that his majestie (the late king) has hott wars in Ireland and cannot in haste come to them, which tho it were also true, as they know it is not, is onely ane argument from safety and interest; and that he might know the sentiments of men of honour, they declare to him and all the world, they scorne his watter and the indemnities of his government, and to save his further trouble by his frequent invitations, they assure him that they are satisfied, their king take his own tyme and

way to manage his detentions and punish his rebels; and albeit he should send no assistance to them at all, they will all dye with their swords in their hands befor they fall in their loyalty; and swore alleageance to their soveraign; and desyres he may then judge what effect duke Hamilton's letter has upon them; but that they had gotten ane honourable father for that storie from Ireland, and altho they can better tell him how matters goe in Ireland, and that they pity those on whom such stories has influence, yet since they have no orders to offer conditions to any rebell, they allow his grace and the major-generall to believe on, and take their measures by their success till his majestie (the late king) his further orders; and they thank the major generall for the good meaning of his invitation, though they are confident he had no hopes of success, and that they will shortly endeavour to give him a requyteal; and that those of them who live in islands have already seen and defyed the prince of Orange his frigatts; and that they had returned duke Hamilton's letter, because they had more use for it then they: And after production and reading of the saids two bonds of associatione, and missive letter abovementioned, in audience of their majesties high commissioner, and the estates of parliament, the said sir John Dalrymple, their majesties advocat, declared, that besydes the depositions of the witness adduced against sir Ewan Cameron, of Lochzeell; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Sclaitt; the laird of M'Naughton; and Grant, of Ballindalloch; he made use of the saids two bonds of association entred into and signed by the laird of Lochzeel, and other highlanders, at the castle of Blair, in August, 1689, and the other bond in January 1690, subcryved by the viscount of Frendraught and others; by which bonds they obleidge themselves to stick to one another in his majesties service, which by the place and persons appears to be the late king James; and farther he declared, that he made use of the saids bonds of associatione and missive letter for adminiculating of the probation against the saids persons subcryvers thereof, and desyred that the probation adduced against the defenders might be read over and votted singly as to every one of the defenders, and which was accordingly done; And the king and queen's majesties, and the estates of parliament having considered the forsaid libell and indytement for high treason, perswaded at the instance of their majesties advocat, against the fornamed persones, defenders, with the depositions of the witnesses who were adduced and present, and deponed in the said matter of treason, as to the poynts admitted to the lord advocat his probation in manner foward, viz. against the deccent John, viscount of Dundee; Mr. David Grahan, brother to the said viscount, for himself, and as air and successor to the said late viscount; the lord Dunkeld; major William Grahan, of Balquhapse; colonell Cannon; John Clelland, of Fasken; James earle of Dumfermling; ——— viscount of

Frendraught; Mr. Colin M'Kenzie, uncle to the earle of Seaforth; sir John Drummond, of Machanie; William Craufurd, younger, of Ardmillan; James Craufurd, his brother; the laird of Strowan; ——— Robertson; James Edmonstoun, of Newtown of Doune; sir Ewin Cameron, of Lochzeell; ——— Cameron, his eldest son; ——— Hallyburton, of Pitcurr; and ——— Hallyburtone, of Pitcurr, his son; ——— Stewart, of Appin; ——— M'Lean, alias M'Donald, elder, of Glencoe; Alexander M'Donald, younger, of Glengurie; David M'Neill, of Gallochelly; sir John M'Lean of Dowart; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Sclait; ——— Grant, of Ballindalloch; and the laird of M'Naughtoun; that the fornamed persons were actually in armes against their majesties after the 4th day of May, 1689, or joynd with any of the rebells who were in armes after the said day; and having also considered the bonds of association and missive letter abovementioned, produced by the lord advocat, which he declared he made use of, for adminiculating of the probation against the said Donald M'Donald, younger, of Sclait; and ——— Grant, of Ballindalloch; they fand and hereby finds the forsaid cryme of treason as it is found relevant, viz. that the fornamed persones were actually in armes against their majesties, after the 4th day of May, 1689 years, or joynd with the rebells who were in armes after the said day, sufficiently verified and proven against the said John, viscount of Dundee; Mr. David Grahame, his brother; major William Grahame, of Baquhapple; colonell Alexander Cannon; John Clelland, of Fasken; James earle of Dumfermling; ——— viscount of Frendraught; Mr. Colin M'Kenzie, uncle to the earle of Seaforth; sir John Drummond, of Machanie; William Craufurd, younger, of Ardmillan; James Craufurd, his brother; the laird of Strowan; Robertstone; James Edmonstoun, of Newtown of Doune; sir Ewin Cameron, of Lochzeell; ——— Cameron, his eldest son; ——— Hallyburton, of Pitcurr; ——— Stewart, of Appin; M'Lean alias M'Donald, elder, of Glencoe; Alexander M'Donald, younger, of Glengurie; ——— M'Neill, of Gallachelly; sir John M'Lean of Dowart; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Sclait; ——— Grant, of Ballindalloch; and the laird of M'Naughtoun; having past severall votes upon advyising of the probation as to each one of y^m, upon pronouncing of which interlocutor, William earle of Craufurd, for himselfe and in behalfe of dam Henrietta Seton countes of Wigton, now countes of Craufurd, his spous, gave in the protestation under wryten, representing, That whereas the said James, earle of Dumfermling, upon the assignations granted to him by the said countes of Craufurd of two thousand merks of her joynture, did grant to the said countes a back bond, dated the said day of May, 1689 years, declaring the samen to have been granted in trust and for the behoove of the said countes and her children, as the said backbond bears; as also that the said William earle of Craufurd having ane assignation from the deceist earle of Craufurd, his father, of all debts and soumes of money, hath right to the soumes dew to him by the said James earle of Dumfermling, his father, on any account whatsoever; and therfor the said William earle of Craufurd, for himself, and in name of the said countes of Craufurd, his spous, protested that the doom and sentence of forfaiture to be given and pronounced against the said James earle of Dumfermling shall not be prejudiciall to their saids debts and claims; but that the estate to be forfaitured shall be burnden and lyable therefore; sicklyke as the said sentence of forfaiture had not been pronounced, and therupon asked and took instruments, which protestation their majesties and the estates of parliament have admitted and admitts; and sicklyke captain Charles Straiton protested, that the doom and sentence of forfaiture to be given and pronounced against the viscount of Dundee, shall not prejudice him of the soume of 5,000 merks a'rents thereof, contained in a bond granted by the late viscount to prove Kennet, and in a translation be him in favours of the said captain Charles Straiton, and which bond was granted several years befor the late happie revolution, which protestation their majesties and the said estates of parliament also have admitted and admitts; And therefore our sovereign lord and lady, and the estates of parliament, by the mouth of John Ritchie, dempster of parliament, decerne and adjudge the name, fame, memory, and honour, of the said viscount of Dundee; and ——— Hallyburton, of Pitcurr, to be extinct, their blood to be tainted, and their names to be riven furth and be delett out of the book of armes, sua that their posteritie may never have place nor be able hereafter to brook or joyse any honours, offices, titles, or dignities, in tyme coming; and the said persons to have forfaitured, amitted, and tint, all and sundry their lands, heretadges, tacks, steedings, roumes, possessions, goods, and gear, moveable and immoveable, whatsoever pertaining to them, to belong to their majesties, and to remain perpetually with them and their successors in property; And lykeways their majesties and the estates of parliament, by the mouth of the said John Ritchie, dempster of parliament, decern and adjudge the said James earle of Dumfermling; ——— viscount of Frendraught; ——— lord Dunkeld; major William Grahame; colonell Alexander Cannon; John Clelland, of Fasken; Mr. Colin M'Kenzie, uncle to the earle of Seaforth; sir John Drummond, of Machanie; William Craufurd, younger, of Ardmillan; James Craufurd, his brother; the laird of Strowan; Robertson; David Grahame, brother to the viscount of Dundee; James Edmonston, of Newtown, of Doune; sir Ewin Cameron, of Lochzeel; ——— Cameron, his eldest son; Donald M'Donald, younger, of Sclait; the laird of M'Naughtoun; ——— Grant, of Ballindalloch.

John Stewart, of Apperthorpe; Alexander McDonald, elder, of Glasgow; Alexander McDonald, younger, of Gledgury; Donald McNeill, of Gallahelly; and sir John McLean, to be execute to the death, denounce traitours, and underly the pains of treason whenever they shall be apprehended, and that at such tymes and places and in such manner as their majesties or the estates of parliament, or the commissioners of justiciary, shall appoint; and ordains the saids persons, their name, fame, memory, and honours, to be extinct; their blood to be tainted, and their armes to be riven furth and delett out of the books of armer, so that their posterity may never have place nor be able to exercise any honours, offices, titles or dignities, with any coming; and the saids persons, immediately abovenamed to have forfeited, amittit and tint, all and sundry their lands, heretadges, tackis, steedings, touns, possessions, goods, and gear, moveable and immoveable, whatsoever pertaining to them, to belong to their majesties, and to remain perpetually with them and their successors in property. Which was pronounced for doom; and whereupon their majesties advowt asked and took instruments.

Alexander Halyburtoun, William Fraser, prisoners.

Indyted and accused for the cryme of treasons in fortyfyeing, mantaining, supplying, and taking in, and keeping out, there majestie's fort and garison of the Bass, against there majesties and there authority, in mair mention in there lybell 'ut in die precedente.'

Persewer—Mr. Hugh Dalrymple, advocat, assessor to there majestie's solicitor.

Mr. Hugh Dalrymple produced ane warrand of privie counsell for persewring the pannalls, whereof the tenor followes: "Edinburgh, the twenty-one day of January, 1692 years.

"The lords of there majesties privie counsell doe hereby peremptorly appoint and requyre there majesties solicitor or his assystants, without delay, to intent and prosecute an Indytment of treasons befor the lords commissiouners of justiciarie against Alexander Halyburtoun, and William Fraser, prisoners in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, which they were appoynted to doe by a former Interloquitor and hes neglected. Extracted by me,
"Sic Subscrib. D. MONCRIFFE, Cl. S. Con."

Sir Robert Coll and Mr. Charles Gray, advocates, being allowed to propone defences for the pannells, they declared that they would propone no defences for the pannalls.

Mr. Hugh Dalrymple, as persewar, desyred therefor that the lybell might be advysed and remitted to the knowledge of the inquest.

The Lords justice generall, and commissiouners of justiciarie, having considered the indytment persewed by there majesties solicitor and his assystants, against Alexander Halyburtoun and William Fraser, prisoners, they find the said indytment relevant to infer the crymes and paines of treasons lybelled, and remits the same to the knowledge of ane Assyse.

† In the small and rare Collection of Jacobitical Tracts, (Memoirs of lord viscount Dundee, &c.) published in London, 1714, is given the following article relating to the case of these persons :

"The Siege of the Bass.

"The Bass is a strong rock in the Fryth of Forth, standing between Fife and East Lothian, within five miles of Dunbar, in which there was a garrison of fifty men, commanded by a captain and his respective officers, whereof Charles Maitland was gouverneur, 1688, and defended it strenuously for his master, king James, till 1690. Then having small hopes of king James's restoration, wanting provisions, ammunition, and other necessaries, was forced to give it up to the government, who made Mr. Fletcher of Saltoun gouverneur, he having four of king James's officers prisoners, they boldly surprised the garrison and sent all the soldiers ashore, which being reported in the country, where there were many loyal families, they were supplied with men, provisions, and ammunition. Intelligence thereof being carried to France to king James, there was a ship sent with all sorts of provisions and stores, and two boats, one that carry'd two patarooes, twelve iniquets, and rowed with twelve oars, and another smaller boat.

But afterwards their provisions falling wheras by the common laws and the laws of this and all other well governed nations, the crimes of treason and rebellion, and open enmity and hostility against their majesties, and the aiding, assisting, abateing, supplying, intercommuning, and keeping correspondence with rebells or traitors, or open enemies, are punishable with the forfeiture of life, lands, and goods, and particularlie by the act James first parl. 1st, cap. 3d, it is statute, that noe man openlie or notourlie rebell against the king's persone under the pain of forfeiture of life, lands, and goods; and by the act 37 parl. 2d Ja. 1st, it is statute, that noe man resett, maintaine, or doe favour to open and manifest rebells against the king's majestie under the foresaid paine; and by the act Ja. 2, parl. 6, cap. 24, and parl. 12, cap. 49, it is statute, that if any commite treason against the king's persone or his majestie, or ryces in fear of weir against him, or recetts or supplies any that hes comitted treason, in help, redd, or counsell, or stuffes the houses of those that are couvict of treason, and holds them against the king, they short, the garrison sent the twelve oar'd boat by night, to bring off some sheep and other necessaries, which they frequently received from their friends, and the government being informed thereof sent some companies to guard the coast, who surprized several of the garrison, when they came ashore, and thereby their communication with the land being stopped, they went out by night in their boats, and took several ships, one laden with salt, whence having taken what was convenient, she was ransomed from Edinburgh; a Dutch dogger which they plundered and put off again; and a ship laden with wheat which they thought to have carryed to the Bass; but the wind proving contrary drove them to the coast of Montrose, where she ran ashore, and the men getting safe to land dispersed in the country; and falling again short of provisions they went in their boats to the isle of May, where they took several sheep, and what could their boat could carry. But the government being enraged at their repeated boldness, king William ordered the whole revenue of the kingdom to be expended on their reduction, and on that account sent two frigates, one of sixty and another of fifty guns, who lay battering two days without doing any damage to the garrison, though the ships had several of their men killed, and their rigging and sails cut and shattered, and their ships so much dammified, that they cost the treasury of Scotland about 500*l.* to repair them.

"Afterwards there were two ships appointed shall be punished as traitors; and by the act Cha. 2, parl. 1, sess. 1, cap. 5, it is declared, that it shall be high treason for the subjects of this realme, les or more, to ryse or continew in armes upon pretext whatsoever without his majesties speciall approbation; as also by the constantly to attend that service, whereby the garrison was rendered incapable of procuring any provisions by the use of the boats; however, there came after some time, a small privateer from Dunkirk, laden with rusk and other necessaries: but the garrison became so weak of men, that they had not hands enough to hoist up the rusk, but were obliged to borrow ten sailors to assist them, and when they had got only seven bags into the garrison, the largest of the two ships bore down upon the privateer, who was forced to cut her cables to prevent her being run down, so that the garrison was then in worse condition for holding out thap before, having ten sailors added to their number, and only seven bags of rusk, which could serve but a short time; wherefore the governor was obliged to put each man of the garrison to the allowance of two ounces of raw rusk dough in 24 hours. About that time, Mr. Trotter was taken, and condemned for aiding and assisting the place, and captain Alexander Hallyburton, captain William Frazer, Mr. William Witham, and Mr. William Nicolson, who belonged to the garrison, were taken on shore, and condemned to be hanged; and the day of Mr. Trotter's execution being come, the gibbet was erected at Castle-town, and he being brought to the place again was fired from the Bass, amongst the crowd, which terrified them, and obliged them to remove the gibbet to a farther distance, where he was hanged. The rest who lay in prison at Edinburgh under condemnation, were reprieved from time to time, till set at liberty by the capitulation.

"At last the garrison being reduced to five or six days provision according to the above-mentioned allowance, put out a flag of truce, whereupon the government sending to know what they wanted, the garrison replied, that they would surrender upon terms, and drew up their own articles, upon which the honourable privy council sent two of their number to the Bass, to acquaint them what conditions they would grant.

"The governor, who had saved some bottles of the best French wine and brandy, and some fine basket, made them drink plentifully, telling them there was no scarcity of provisions, and unless he had his own terms he would not surrender; delivering at the same time his articles to their lordships, and after they were gone, he ordered all the caputs, coats, and hats in the garrison to be put on the muzzles of musquets, to make them believe the place was full of men; upon which their lordships returned to the council, and reported how they were treated, and that the garrison was in every respect well provided, which induced the ho-

2nd act sess. 2, of the same parliament, it is declared, that it shall be high treason to levie warr or to take up armes against the king, or to intyse strangers or others to invade any of his dominions; lykeas it is declared and statute, by the 2d act of this present parlia't, daited the 17 June, 1689, that it is high treason in any subject of this kingdome, by writinge, speaking, or any other manner of way, to disowen, quarrell, or impugne their majesties royall power and authority, or right and title to the crowne; and also by the common lawe and lawes, and acts of parliament of this kingdome, the holding out or assisting and aiding others to hold out in armes or otherwayes any of the king's forts and strengths against the king, or the usurping of the same, without lawe or warrand, or airt and part of any of the crimes forsaid, are punishable as treason: Nevertheless it is of verity, that the saids captain James Midletoune, William Nicolson, and William Wotham, haveing shaken off all fear of God and regard to their majesties authority and lawes, did, about the moneths of November or December, ane or other of the dayes of the saids moneths, in the yeire 1691. or in the moneths of Januarie or Februarie, or one or other of the moneths of the yeire 1692, or one or other of the dayes thereof, or in the moneths of Januarie, Februarie, March, Aprill, or May, 1693, or ane or other of the days thereof, by or without commission from the late king James, come under the command of collonell William Grahame, or some other person from Dunkirk, or some other pairt beyond sea, with the other petsones in your company for recruiting the garison of the Bass, that at that tyme held out, and still holds out rebelliouslie against nourable council to comply with the governor's articles, which were,

I. "That the garrison should come ashore with their swords about them, and there should be a ship appointed by the government with fresh provisions to transport such of them as were willing to go to Dunkirk or Havre-de-Grace, and that in a month after the surrender, those who pleased to stay at home, might live without disturbance.

II. "That all they had taken, or what belonged to them after they surprised the place, they should be allowed to dispose of to the best advantage, together with their boats, and all things pertaining to any of them.

III. "That such of them as should incline to go abroad might stay in Edinburgh, until the ship was ready, without molestation, and have so much a day, according to their several stations.

IV. "That all who had belonged to the garrison, or had aided or assisted it, should have the benefit of the capitulation; and those who were dispersed over the kingdom, should have a time to come in; and those who were condemned, in prison, or otherways distressed, should be set at liberty the same day the garrison should come ashore, without any fees, or other charges whatsoever."

their majesties, and there they and each of them, getting and taking armes, under the command of Michael Middleton, or other commandant upon the place, did stay and continue in the garrison to keep out that sort against their majesties, at least they stood and continued therein with the said rebels and gave them their presence; and notwithstanding they the said James Middleton and William Nicholson, were with others latelie charged to surrender the said sort under the paine of treason, yet they disobeyed the said charge and stand therfor denuded rebels; and further ther was a proclamation with letters of intercommuning out against them, notwithstanding of all which they continued their said rebellious practices in keeping out the said sort, and in aiding and assisting the garrison therof soe to doe, untill that latlie in the moneth of May last, or therabout, they were apprehended; lykeas the said William Wetham having come in on or other of the dayes of the moneths of the yeres forsaide, and joynd or taken part with the said rebels and rebellious garrison, by presence or otherwayes, for some dayes or moneths, did thereafter goe out and went abroad to England, Flanders, and France, and to St. Germanes, in all or one or other of these places, corresponding, acting, or conspyreing traitorously against their majesties, and with their enemies, untill that coming back latelie, with what intelligence and help he could bring to his accomplices in the Bass, he and the other two persones above named did meett together, and in their returne to the Bass were stoped about the darkning of the evening near to Whyt Kirk, where after some resistance made by them, they were taken by some of the king's true leidges and brought in prisoners to Edinburgh; Lykeas the said John Trotter and Alexander McLeish having also shaken off all fear of God and regaird to their majesties, and the lawes and government, and turning most unnatural and wicked enemies to their majesties and their native countrie, have from the beginning of the suppyreing and revolting of the said rock and fort of the Bass, which was in the moneth of June, 1691 yeres, and since that tyme in one or other of the dayes of the moneths of the yere 1691, 1692, 1693, 1694, and untill of late they were taken aiding, assisting, helping, suppyeing, receyving, harbouring, corresponding, or intercommuning, with the forsaide enemies, and rebels in the Bass, or one or other of them, and have furnished them with meatt and drink, house, harbour, victwall, or something else usefull or comfortable to them, or have sent, caried, or caused carye to them meatt and drink, or something else helpfull or comfortable to them; or have intelligence with them by word, write, message, or some other way, or have sent or caused send letters or messages to, or received letters or messages from them; and particularie he the said John Trotter in the moneths of November 1691, or January 1692, or March 1692, or in one or other of the dayes thereof, or on one or other of the dayes above lybelled, have letters or other messages by word or write sent to him out of the Bass, from the said colonell Graham, with a demand of supplie of some necessaries, such as one iron chain and staples for their house, and iron and leather with other particulars necessarie or usefull for the saids rebels, which letters being left at the house of one George Hoge in Wintoun or some other house therabout, to be delivered to him; he gott the same, and according to the direction thereof mett with the bearer and told him so much, and promised that what was demanded should be sent into the Bass; and the said bearer having a letter of charge from the said Graham to be delivered to the said John Trotter out of his own hand, that he might forward it to France by the way of Rotterdam, and which Graham said was for the late king James, he the said John Trotter gott and tooke the said letter from the bearer when he mett with him at the place called Kittenaked or therabout, and said he should be carefull of it, and not pleased that it was not left at Wintoun with the other letters that he might have gott it sooner; lykeas he the said John Trotter had at severall tymes drunk the late king James his health; as also by the meanes and procurement of Trotter, there was provision of butter, bisket, cheese, and the lyke, sent from Cookennie and other places, in one or other of the dayes, moneths and yeres above lybelled, and further in one or other of the dayes of March, 1692, or in one or other of the moneths of the said yeire or other yeres lybelled, he the said John Trotter bought and purchased a boat, and sent her with provisions of shoes, stockens, butter, and suggar loaves, and the lyke into the Bass, and his accompt sent therewith containing more particulars then were sent; he was thereafter challenged by ane express from the Bass, who mett with him at the place called Kittenaked or therabout, and he answered that he sent these things as he gott them, and he payed for them conforme to the accompt sent; and he the said John Trotter in ane or other of the dayes of the moneths of the yeres forsaide, sent for one William Robertsons, skipper, in Port Seatoun, to come to him to Wintoun, and ther he mett with him in companie with ——— M'Govan and ——— M'Cleane, who were declared rebels come from the Bass; and he proposed to the said Robertsons to lend his boat, and to serve in her with some men that he and the rebels were to putt on board to surpris captain Burd's ship, which was appointed to watch the Bass, and offered him fourtie pound sterling for that service, but Robertsons refusing, he the said John Trotter treated with him to carye in some provisions, as meall from Leith, and some drinking bear from Aberdeen to the Bass in his boat; and he promised to him for this last busines to repaire to him the loss of a boat that the rebels of the Bass had taken from him, and gave him a crowne in earnest; and the said ——— M'Govan and ———

M^cClean, at the same time told that he had gott threttie pund starlin to make provision for the Bass, and that he had not made them but kept the money, and thereafter meeting again with Robertsons he gave him two dollars more to leaenourage him in his undertaking; and meeting with him in Leith, he gave him money to buy a number of hames for the Bass, which Robertsons did, and he the said Trotter gave him money to pay them; lykeas the said John Trotter persisting in his said wicked and traiterous practices in the moneths of Decerher and Janwarie last, or in one or other of the dayes therof, or in one or other of the dayes of ye moneths and yeires above lybelled, came to Dumbur and having changed his name (the better to cover his traiterous trafecqueings) from Trotter to Dods, he with the said Alexander M^cCleish, both or either of them treated with certain seamen, viz. William Sinellie, Alexander Wood, George Ker, and Robert Spevin, and one or other of them to carye them into the Bass, and gave them good deed for that end, and also threatned them if they would not, and they refusinge helcft with Alexander M^cCleish a letter to be sent into the Bass, which was sent in by the same seamen, and Alexander M^cCleish received a letter in answer from the Bass directed for him, which was sealed upon him when he was taken, and he ordeined the wife of James Hamilton, in Dumbur, in whose house he was taken, to burne the said letter, with two letters more that he gave her; lykeas there were found upon him, when he was taken, or at least he left with his said landlady, severall recepts and accompts and other notes and papers, aither written by himself or others, all relateing to the said treasonable correspondence with and supplying of the saids rebels in the Bass, which were held as repeated breviatus causa, and should be shouen to him or his lawiers before his tryeall, and then should be produced in judgment against him; as also he the said Alexander M^cCleish did upon one or other of the dayes of the moneths and yeires forsaid, meitt with the said skipper, William Robertsons, — M^cGovan and — M^cClean, att Aherdour, about the furnishing the rebels in the Bass; and lately in November, Decemher, or Janwarie last, and upon one or other of the dayes therof, he the said Alexander M^cCleish hyred the said four seamen, and treated with all or one or other of them, to carye in two men in their boats to the Bass, under pretext that they were to carye them only to a ship lying out at sea about nyne or ten a clock att night, but so he had contrived it that those two men being strait should constraine and force the seamen to carye them to the Bass, which they lykewayes did, calling when they came neaf, a Hackett a Hackett! which was the name of one of the said rebels, and probably of one of the said two; and the seamen havinge gott a guinea for their paines, he the said Alexander M^cCleish changed the said guinea, and distribute the money amongst them att their returne, and bid them keep the matter quyet, for it would hang them as well as himselfe; and thereafter, on one or other of the dayes forsaid, he again treated with the said seamen to carye in ale to the Bass, and de facto brought a barrrell of ale to the boat syde that they might take it in, but they refused it; and further, upon one or other of the dayes forsaid he hyred them, givinge them ale and money to gae into the Bass with a letter, which they caried in and delyvered att the Bass, and gott and brought aue letter in answer back againe and delyvered it to him; and he was also present when the said Trotter, under the name of Dods, and he and Trotter, or either of them, treated with the said seamen to carye in the said Trotter to the Bass, as lykewayes to serve Trotter to and from the Bass for a yeire if could have agreed with him; and in these villanous and traiterous practices, he and the said John Trotter were surprysed and taken, and by the hail forsaid practices, and by his accessions thereto, the hail forsaid persones all or each of them are guilty of the crimes of treason and oppen hostility or conspiracie against their majesties, at least were open enemies to their majesties and the kingdome, or airt and part of the same, which being found be aue assyse, he ought to be punished by forefaulture of their lyfe, lands, and goods, to the example and terrour of others not to doe the lyke in tyme coming.

My lord advocat declares, he insists against Middletoun, Wetham, and William Nicolson, for having joynd themselves to the rebels in the Bass, and borne arms with them in holding out that fort, and as being airt and pairt of their rebellion, conforme to the indytmnt exhibit against them.

Sir Patrick Hume for captain James Middletoun, William Nicolson, and William Wetham, the pannalls, allwayes denyeing the indytmnt, and hail members and qualifications therof, alleadges first, that that pairt of the indytmnt bearing that the be the common lawe and lawes and acts of parliament of this kingdome, the holding out or assisting others to hold out in armes or otherwayes any of the king's forts against the king, or the usurping of the same without his lawe or warrant, is no otherwayes relevant, then as the samen is founded upon the speciall lawes and acts of parliament mentioned in the indytmnt, which doeth not meit this case.

2. The particular tyme when it is alleadged the saids crimes were committed, is not condescended upon as ought to be in all criminall indytmnts.

3. Whereas it is alleadged, that the pannalls came under the command of colonell Grahame, or some other person from beyond sea, with others, for recruiting the garison of the Bass, it is not relevant to infer the crimes lybelled, because it being acknowledged by the indytmnt that the defenders were souldiers, and came over under the command of a superior officer they behoved to obey, so that the coming over not being voluntar or ane act of choise of the defender's owne, but it being acknowledged that they were commanded to it by superior officers, whose command they could not disobey, otherwayes they would have bein shott to death upon the place; if it were true that the defenders came over in manner lybelled it could not infer a crime against them, farr less the crime of treason, according to that excellent rule in lawe, Leg. 167, 'de Regulis juris qui Jusu Judicis vell superioris,' which is all one 'aliquid facit non videtur dolo malo facere, qua parere necesse habet,' especially seing it is acknowledged that the defenders did not goe in here to recruite the Bass in this kingdome, but were sent from beyond sea when they were in the enemies power, and could not resist their commands.

4. If the defenders had bein sent over under the command of a superior officer, as their coming over could be no crime for the reason foresaid, so their getting and taking armes when they were in the Bass could be noe crime, because they were still in the same hazard, and under the same impressions of fear of being hauged and shott to death, in caice they disobeyed, and whatever might have bein pretended if they had bein once at freedome and att their own libertie, and thereafter come and subjected themselves to the command, but seing it is acknowledged that they were in the power of the enemy before they came over, and were sent from beyond sea, under command, as their coming over upon that consideration could be noe crime, so their continewing in armes in the Bass after they came over could be no crime, seeing they were still under the same command and impression of fear.

5. Whereas it is lybelled that the pannells did gett and take armes in the Bass, allways denyeing the same, it is not relevant, not only for the reasons foresaid, but also for this reason that the simple presence in armes with an enimie is not relevant to infer the paine of treason, unless there be some act of hostilitie or other public deed that did clearlie intinate their desigine of opposing the government, and therfor it is that the lawes and acts of parliament lybelled, are only against oppen and notorious rebels, which necessarilie imports that there must be some publict or open act of hostility, other then the simple having of armes to make a partie guilty of treason; and for that reason the lords of justiciary, in the case of M'Leod, of Assint, who was conveyed for garisoning the house of Ardbreck, and convocating their majesties leidges, to the number of 400 men, they by interlocutor, in Ffebruarie, 1674, refused to sustain that indictment, in relation to the raising of men, or disposing any of them in companies, under colours, to be relevant, except it were alleadged that they were 200 men and upwards, and were under colours and mustered, or under wecklie or dayly pay, and that all this was done after the publication of the letters of fire and sword against him.

6. That alternative in the indictment, that at least the defenders continewed to abyde in the Bass, with the other persons that were in it, and gave them their presence, is not relevant, for if simple presence with armes be not relevant, farr less simple presence without armes, especially the defenders being sent to the Bass, from abroad, and being under command as said is.

7. Whereas it is lybelled, that James Middletoun and William Nicolson were with others charged to surrender the said fort under the paine of treason, yet they disobeyed, upon which they were denounced and intercommened, and continewed to keep out the fort, and aiding and assisting the garison y'r of it is not relevant; first, because if it could be made appear that the defenders were in the Bass, no such charge came to their knowledge. 2d. Albeit it had come to their knowledge, yet it was not in their power to have given obedience, because it was acknowledged by the indictment that they were under the command of Michael Middletonne, or some other commandant, and whatever effect a charge might have had against a commanding officer, yet it was never heard of that a single soldier in a garrison which was charged to render is guilty of treason, when the superior officer, whose commands he is obliged to obey so long as he is under his command, refuses to surrender the garrison; so that it not being in the defenders power to surrender the fort, their not doing it after the charge can never be imputed to them as a crime: 3. As it was not in their power to surrender the fort, so their staying there after the charge cannot be understood a keeping out of the fort, or aiding or assisting the garrison:—4. The pretended keeping out of the fort, or aiding and assisting the garrison after the charge, being only lybelled in general termes, is not relevant, unless some particular acts of keeping out, and aiding and assisting, had been condescended upon; and it is not lybelled, that after the said charge, the saids Middletonne or Nicolsonne did use any acts of hostility, nor so much as that they did bear arms in the garison after that tyme; 5. The pretended charge is ipso jure null as to William Nicolson, seeing he is not designed, but his name only sett donne blank Nicolsonne; and it is clear by the act of parliament, that all executions where the pairtie, name and surname are not sett down with their designations, the same are null: 6. They gave obedience to the charge, seeing it appears by the execution that the charge was given the fyfth of May; and it is acknowledged by the indytmnt, that the said James Midletoun and William Nicolson, came out after the 13th of the said moneth, which is some few days thereafter: so that if it could be made appear that they had been in the Bass, yet it is evident that they laid hold upon the first occasion to leave the garrison, seeing it is acknowledged, that they came out some few dayes thereafter: 7. As to James Midletoun, if it could be made appear, that he was in the Bass, which is denyed, it is offered to be proven that he came out before the charge was given to surrender the said fort, the charge not being given till the fyfth of May, and he came out the sabbath day before the 2d of May.

8. Whereas it is alleadged as to William Wotham, that he came in about the tyme forsaide, and was some tyme in the Bass, and did thereafter goe abroad to England, Flanders, France, in all these places corresponding and conspyreing against their majesties, and that he came back with intelligence, always denyeing the same, yet it is not relevant, not only for the reasons forsaids, but lykeways for thir reasons, that he being an Englishman borne, he was but a young boy the tyme of the Revolution, about fourteen yieires of age, or therby; and being att that tyme the earle of Dumbarton's padge, he went over to France with the earle, and gott a pass from the king to goe over to France, with his servants, and the pannall continowed with the earle till he died; and he is not yet above nyntein yieires of age, soe that he was incapable to conspyre or correspond against their majesties; 2. It is acknowledged by the indytmnt, that as he was none of these that surprysed the Bass, so he was not in it when the governour and other persons were charged. do delyver it, nor is he mentioned in the counsell's ordour, which is the warrant of the charge; and albeit he had been once in the Bass, yet seeing he left it some short tyme thereafter, as is acknowledged, his simple being there cannot infer a crime against him, far less the crime of treason: 3. That the said William Wetham did conspyre and correspond against ther majesties and with ther enimies, being only in general termes, is not relevant, unless the particular acts of conspyreing and corresponding were condescended upon: 4. It is denyed that he came back with intelligence, or gave any help to those in the Bass, nor is it relevant, the intelligence and helping not being condescended upon.

9. Whereas it is lybelled that the defenders did meitt together thinking to returne to the Bass, but were stoped; it cannot be so much as a qualification of the crime, for first what their designe was being actus animi is not punishable, next the pretended designe did take no effect, as is acknowledged, and soe can import no crime: 3. Their meitting together could be no evidence of their designe to goe to the Bass, for if they had such a designe they might have made it much more effectwall, by goeing single allon, then goeing altogethar; but it appears by the wholl tract of the affair, even as it is mentioned in the lybell, that if it could be made appear, that the defenders had been in the Bass, that they came out of it with a designe not to returne, for otherways they would not have come out.

10. The indictment of treason cannott be sustained against the pannalls; because it is denyed that they were the king's subjects, and the lawes and acts of parliament against treason is only in relation to subjects who bare dew alleadgeance, seeing the crime of treason takes only place where alleadgeance is dew, as is clear from all the lawiers that have written upon that subject, and particularlie Clarus. Lib. parag. Lese Majest. numb. 6, who is positive, 'Quod ille qui non est subditus principi, non dicitur contra eum Committere Crimen Lesie Majestatis et ita licet aliquo participari Jure ut offendi, veluti quis officitur de foro alicujus, principis si tamen ratione originis velle domicilij non sit subditus non dicitur Committere contra eum Crimen Legre Majestatis.' And affirms it hes been many tymes so determined, and albeit ffornaigners opposing any king or state, may be looked upon as enimies, yet they are not guilty of treason, as is clear from sir Edward Coke, in his title of High Treason, page 11, where he makes a distinction betwixt a forraigner, who is anemie, and a subject who ryces in rebellion, that anemie committing open hostility in the nation and taken, is only to be punished by the marshall lawe, or ransomed, but that he cannot be indicted of treason.

11. It is alleadged separatim for James Middleton, allwayes adhering to the forsaid defences, that it is offered to be proven, that he is a forraigner, being a Flandrian borne, att least holden and repute to be so, so that as to him there cannot be the least question, that the indytmnt of treason can be sustained against him, and he can onlie be treated as a prisoner of warr; but there will be no need of any such probatione, it being sufficient to give him the benefite of a prisoner of warr, seing that it is acknowledged that he came from abroad.

12. The indyctment as to William Wytham and Nicolson, always adhering to the foresaid defences, is not relevant, albeit it could be proven that they were subjects borne, yet they having quitte and deserted these nations, and haveing fixed and taken up their residence in forraigne nationes animo remanendi, the said William Nicolson having gone abroad about 20 years hence, and William Wytham when he was but 14 years of age, they cannot now be considered as the king leidge men, but as forraigners, it being the constant practice of all nations that 'Civis originarius renunciatus et domicilium' also 'transference [alio transferens] civis esse desinit:' as to all effects, as is clear from the common lawe, Leg. 5, parag. ult. dig. de captivo et post linum [postliminio] and Gail, Lib. 2, observ. 36, num 7, and the lawiers there by him cited, and Perez upon that title of Cod. de municipis, [municipibus] et originariis num. 19 and 20, so that the said William Nicolson and William Wytham upon that consideration lykewayes can onlie be looked upon as prisoners of warr, and are in the same case as if Frenchmen or other forraigners hade come to recruite the Bass, who if they hade been taken could not have been convened for treason, but behooved to be used as prisoners of warr; and the lords of justiciarie may be pleased to consider, what may be the consequence of this if it were otherwayes sustained, for there are many thousands of people that come from France, and other parts of the French dominions, who hade taken up their residence in Brittain and Ireland and other dominions belonging to the king of Brittain, who have absolutely quitted France and the French dominions, and are now no more looked upon to be French subjects, but subjects to the king of Brittain; and if any of those or others of the French refugees, whereof there are verie many in the king's armies, should be taken prisoners fighting against the French king, then by his rule they could have no quarter; but the French king might proceed against them for treason, and yet wee see dayly that ther is no such thing practised, but when any of the refugees or others who were formerlie French subjects are taken prisoners fighting against the French king, they are treated as prisoners of warr, and relieved and ransomed as other prisoners, and how many of the British subjects are in the French armie, and actwallie fighting against our king, yet when any of them comes to be taken prisoners they are not punished as traitors, but as prisoners of warr, and the king's practyse in those caices ought certainly to be the rule in this, and when there were many prisoners taken at Cromdale, when actwallie in armes feighting against the king, and albeit for the most part they were all Scots subjects, yet ther was none of them persewed for treason, but were all of them treated as prisoners of warr, and were sett at libertie upon finding caution only to live peaceable and not disturb the government; and the defenders, when they were apprehended, were not in armes nor using any acts of hostility against the government, but were demanding themselves peaceable in the countrie, and they should not be worse treated then those who were taken in armes actwallie fighting against their majesties, and dewreing all the tyme of the late civil warres in Brittain, albeit there were many prisoners taken upon both syds, yet ther was non of them persewed for treason, but were used as prisoners of warr, and therfor the pannels ought not to pass to the knowledge of ane inquest.

Sir James Ogilvie replies, that he oppons the lybell as declared by lord advocat, and which is relevant notwithstanding of the defences proponed, the crimes lybelled being expresselie contrair to the acts of parliament condescended upon: And whereas it is pretended that the saids acts doe not meit the case, it is answered, that ther is no disparitie condescended upon in the defence, and lybell and acts are opponed.

2. Whereas it is pretended that ther is no speciall tyme condescended upon, the indytmnt, is opponed, wherein the yeeres, months, and dayes are particularlie mentioned.

3. The pretence is no wayes relevant that the pannels came from beyond sea, under the command of a superior officer, neither does he lybell, came onlie in these termes; for first, it is lybelled alternative that they came by commission or without it; and altho they hade been under command, that can no wayes warrand them for ryseing in armes against their native sovereigne, and assisting those who maintaine the flort of the Bass against authority, and whereas it is pretended that if they hade disobeyed their superior officer they might have been in hazerd of their lives, it is answered, first, that is denyed that they were in any such hazerd, but esto they hade, they can blame non but themselves that they were in those circumstances.

4. The pretence that they were under fear and hazerd when in the Bass merits no answer, seing their goeing there and concurring with those who maintained it against the government, was in itself a crime.

5. The pretence is most frivolous that the lybell is not relevant unless an act of hostility were lybell'd, for the lybell is oppon'd that they were within the Bass, bearing armes for holding off it out; And the case of M^rLeod of Assint is nowayes paralel with this, for he had only convocate some men for garisoning his house and defending himself against the earle of Seaforth, who was about to execute legall diligence against him, and therfor the lords did most justly sustaine the convocation only to be a deforcement, unless speciall acts of hostility were condescended upon, but the Bass was then, and is still maintained, against his majesties authoritie, and which is noutour.

6. Whereas it is pretended that simple presence is yet less relevant, it is answered, that in this circumstanci'd case where one of his majesties floris is surprysed and keepest out, simple presence is unquestionable relevant, especially seeing ther is no rationall occasion condescended upon for the pannalls their goeing there, so it is unquestionable clear that they were assisting and aiding captain Middleton and others, who were in armes, maintaining the said floris as said is.

7. As to what is pretended against the relevancie of that qualification of the lybell, that Middleton and Nicolson were intercomuned, it is answered, that the intercomuning is only condescended upon as a qualification, seeing the holding out of the floris is as relevant to inferr treason, befor they were intercomuned as since, and that the charge came not to their knowledge is most frivolous, seeing the heraulds and trumpets came to the foot of the rock and sounded their trumpets, and did give in the copies and summons, so that non who was then in the floris could be ignorant, but the intercomuning was mainelie designed for interPELLING his majesties oyr subjects from receiving, harbouring, or keeping correspondence with the pannalls, and those others, who were in rebellion with them.

And whereas it is pretended that they were under the command of their superior officer, and so could not give obedience, the former answer is oppon'd, viz. That they put themselves neidlessie under this necessity; 2, non constat, that any other did command; And 3, non sojor is obleiged to obey his superior officer, if he be commanded to committe an act of rebellion, and if he doe it is on his perrill, and bothe he and the officer that commands are lyeable.

As to the pretence that the charge is null, in summar as concernes Wm. Nicolson, because the execution is only against blank Nicolson, without any farther designation; It is answered, that the execution is oppon'd, wherein he is design'd blank Nicolson in the Bass, which is sufficient, but esto the charge were null, yet the lybell is relevant, altho he had never been charged, and the pannall cannot condescend on any other of that surname that was in the Bass at the tyme; whereas it is alleadged that the pannall Middleton and Nicolson did give obedience, because they were taken within some few dayes after they were charged; it is answered, this is nowayes relevant, unless they had actually come and surrendered themselves to some person in authority under their majesties, as ane sheriff or magistrat of ane burgh royall, and this is not so much as pretended.

Whereas it is alleadged for Wetham, that it is denyed that he was bringing intelligence; it is answered, that this is only condescended upon as a qualification, and appears to have been truth, but his majesties advocat will not burden himself with the probation therof, the lybell being relevant without this aggravation.

As to the alleadgence that he was but fourteen years of age att the Revolution, and that he was the earle of Dumbarton's servant, who got a pass for himself and the pannall, and his other servants to goe to France, it is answered, that his goeing to France is not any part of the lybell, seeing what is offered to be proven against him is that he was in companie with the other rebels who were in armes within the Bass, and that he is not contained in the counccills ordour meritts no answer, for that might have been occasioned by the want of the true information of the matter of fact; but it is believed that he was not there att the time, but that he was out getting intelligence as said is, and was taken in his return, and to that pretence that there is no speciall act of conspiracie condescended upon, the advocat makes noe farther use therof but as ane qualification, and certainly noe person is guilty of perduellion, but is also guilty of conspiracie.

8. That they were going back to the Bass, is lykewayes only insert in the lybell as a qualification, and which has been evidently true in matter of fact, seeing they were taken and apprehended about Whitkirk, when they were travelling under night.

9. Whereas it is pretended that Middleton was borne in Flanders; and therfor he is none of their majesties subjects, and oweth them noe alleadgence, and so cannott be guilty of perduellion; it is answered, it is acknowledged to be the opinion of all lawiers that treason can only be committed by subjects, but here the pannall is presumed to be such, for first his parents wer borne in this kingdome, and he himself has a Scots name, and his mother-in-lawe does still live at Pakirk; and therfor he is presumed to have been borne himself within the kingdome; but, 2. He was found in rebellion within the kingdome with severall others who were Scotsmen; add 3. There can be no instance given that ever the king's advocat was putt to prove that a person of a Scots sirename taken in rebellion within the kingdome was ane born subject: 4. Albeit it were proven that he were a foraigner, yet having come to the kingdome to assist the subjects against their native soveraigne, he is thereby airt and part of their crime.

Whereas it is pretended for Wetham and Nicolson, that although they had been British subjects, yet they had deserted his majesties dominions, and had actually settled residence elsewhere; It is answered, primo, that the matter of fact is denied as being calumnious; but, 2d. Esto it were true, yet it is no wayes relevant, because they were subjects ab origine, and therefor are still bound to give alleadgeance, especiallie when found within the kingdome; and 3. They were airt and pairt by concurring as said is.

Whereas it [is] pretended that it may be of dangerous consequence if the pannalls be sentenced, and undergoe the paines lybelled, seing the French refuges who were in his majesties service, some of whom are taken, may suffer upon this account; it is answered, that the pannalls are nowayes concerned therewith, this being a measure of government, and their majesties may indemnisie, or ordour the exemption of the sentence as accords, but this can furnish them with no legall defence; and whereas it is pretended that in the late civil warrs, noe person who was taken prisoner did ever suffer for their being in armes; it is answered, that the contrair is too well known, seing the duke of Hamilton, the marques of Montrose, the earle of Holland, lord Capell, and several other subjects of the best rank and qualitie, were execute upon no other account, but that they had bein in armes.

And whereas it is pretended, that non of these taken at Cromdale were brought to a tryall; it is answered, that first they were unquestionable in rebellion, and many who were in armes att that tyme are forfaitured upon that account, as particularlie the earle of Dunfermline, viscount of Dundie, viscount of Frandrait, the laird of Pitteur, and many others; and if noe person did lose their life upon the forsaid account, it is but alienarie the effect of their majesties clemencie and bounty, in respect wherof the defences ought to be repelled, and the pannalls ought to pass to the knowledge of the inquest.

Sir Patrick Hume duplies, that the defences are opposed, which stand relevant notwithstanding of the replye, and doeth fullie answer all that is now alleaged, only he will take notice of some few particulars for the farder clearing of the defences, and first, whereas it is alleaged, that the particular tyme is condescended upon, the lybell is opposed, which albeit it condescends upon moneths and yeires, yet seing the lybell takes in all the yeires, without condescending upon a particular tyme when it is alleaged the crimes were committed, it is all one as if it had bein lybelled, that the crime was committed on one or other of these yeires, and such a generall indictment can never be sustained.

2. Whereas it is alleaged, that the lybell mentions the crimes as parallel to those mentioned in the acts of parliament condescended upon; it is answered, the acts are opposed, and the indytmnt being compared with the acts, it will appear that the case as it is lybelled doe not meitt the precise termes of the acts of parliament.

3. Whereas it is alleaged that the lybell is alternative that the pannalls either with or without commission came over; it is answered, that albeit the lybell bear that the pannalls came over, by or without commission, from the late king James, yet the lybell bears that the pannalls came under command of colonell Grahaime, or some other persones from Dunkirk, it is sufficient to liberate the pannalls for treason that they came under command of superior officers whose commands they were obledged to obey, and which by the laws and practice of all nations does liberat a person in that circumstance from a punishment dewe to a crime, and the pannalls were not to be blamed seeing they were souldiers in the French armies long before the Revolution, except as to Wetham, who went over with his master since that tyme, who having quitt his native countrie might lawfullie take on as a sojour of fortoun; so that neither their coming over nor going unto the Bass, being still under command as said is, could make them lyeable for any crime, farr less treason, neither the concurring to the holding out of the Bass, they being still under command; and as to the instance in the case of Assint, the paralell holds exactlie in this case, and the pannalls are in a much more favourable case, seing Assint was there at his owen libertie, which the defenders were not.

Whereas it is alleaged; that single presence in this circumstantialt cause is sufficient in keeping out any of the king's forts, seing there was no rationall account of their goeing there; it is answered, that naked presence with an enimie, was never sustained to infer a crime, for, if that were sustained, then all persons present, whither enimies or freinds, might be guilty of treason, and the account of the defenders coming over is mentioned in the indytmnt itselfe, that they came from Dunkirk, and under command, and it is a verie rationall account that they behooved to come over when they were commanded.

Whereas it is alleaged, that the charge for rendering the Bass was sufficiently made known to the pannalls, it is absolutely denied, that the same came to their knowledge, for the execution beares only that it was only putt in a bucket, and the charge being made a principall ground of the indytmnt, if that was not valid the indytmnt must fall, especiallie as to Nicolsone, it being blank as to his Christian name, and does not bear that he was in the Bass; but whither they were lawfullie charged or not, the indytmnt cannot be sustained, as to the defenders, seing they were not in capacity, in the circumstances they were in to give obedience, being under the command of others, and so soon as they gott opportunity they came out, and it was not necessarie for them to render themselves to a magistrat, there being noe such charge in the letters, but it was sufficient that they came out, and when they were seized upon, they were peaceable be-heaving themselves, and not making anie disturbance or act of hostility in the countrie; Whereas it is alleadged, that it is not necessary for their majesties advocat to prove that Middleton was a borne subject of this nation; It is answered, that albeit, when Scotsmen dwelling within the kingdom should ryse in armes or doe any act of rebellion, ther is noe need to prove, that they are borne subjects, because the presumption lyes against them; but when persons coming from abroad, especiallie when they have been a long tyme abroad, the presumption lyes then for them that they are forraigners borne, and therfor my lord advocat must prove that they are subjects, and it is not enough that the said James Middleton's parents were borne in Scotland, and that he himselfe is of a Scots name, for albeit his parents had bein borne in Scotland, yet he himselfe might be borne abroad, as truelie he was, and there are many of Scots names, that are forraigners borne; and if need beis, it is positively offered to be proven, that he is a Flandrian borne. Whereas it is alleadged that the said James Middleton and the other pannalls thaire coming to the kingdome, and joyning with rebels in armes against the government, is airt and part of the crime; it is answered, that they cannot be principallie lyeable for the reasons forsaid, neither can they be lyeable as airt and part which can be noe farther extended, but only to consider them as forraigners and strangers, and be noe more found guilty of airt and part to inferre treason then if native Frenchmen or other forraigners, had come over to the assistance of the Bass, in which case the could only have bein treated as prisoners of war when apprehended; whereas it is alleadged, that the pannalls being subjects ab origine, are so obliged to give alleadgence, it is answered, that the former defence as to that is opposed, and the defenders especiallie Middleton and Nicolson having gone abroad before the warr broke out, and being actualle in the French service, they having quite all their interest in this kingdome, and taken up their residence elsewhere, they were noe farder tyed to alleadgence to that prince where they were borne, as was plead in the case of the bisshop of Sarum.

And whereas it is alleadged, that in the late civil warres many persones of quality suffered; It is answered, that they did not suffer properlie for being taken in armes, but as having done other acts against the government for the tyme. Next whatever may be alleadged as to chief commanders, who are their owen masters and att freedome, there can never be ane instance given, in the case of single souldiers, or other inferior persones under command, and that ever they were convened for treason or suffered a capitall punishment upon that account; and albeit the viscount of Dundie, my lord Dumfermline, and others were forfault, yet all these were cheiff commanders; But none of the souldiers under them, or who were taken at Cromdale, were aither forfault, or made subject to any punishment, but were sett at libertie, upon finding of caution to secure the peace, and which was the practice of old, be the Israeleits, wherein the case of the unjust warr of the king of Syria against the Israeleits, the armie of the king of Syria having fallen in the hands of the Israeleits, the king of Israel having enquired att the prophet Elisha, if he should smite them, the prophet's answer was, Thou shall not smite them, wilt thou smite those whom thou has taken with thy sword and thy bow; Sett bread and water before them, and let them eat and drink, and goe to their master. And if the defenders shall be other wayes treated then prisoners of warr, it might be of verie dangerous consequence, and this being a militarie affair, it is proper to be determined by the rules and customes of warr, and therfor the defenders humbly desyre that the lords of justiciarie would be pleased to represent the whole case as it now stands to his sacred majestie, who knows exactlie weell these affaires, that his majestie may declare his royall pleasure, whither the defenders should be treated as prisoners of ware, and in the meantyme to delay aynie farder procedure in this process till the king's pleasure be known.

Mr. John Frank alleadges for Mr. Wetham, that he being still minor he is not obliged to answere to any crime, by which he may either lose life or limb, as is most clear by the most ancient of our lawes recorded in the majestie, book 2, cap. 42, parag. 11, if any minor is challenged of felonie and be within age, he shall not be compelled to answer theratent, but when he is major he shall answer, much less ought he to be obliged to defend in a criminall pursuite, '*ubi colone juvenili potest dicere, vell tacere quod decere potest'. As our countrieman M^r Kenzie has observed, and since by the late act of parliament, act 20, parl. 1st Charles 2, minors within sixteen are not punishable with death, even for cursing or beating of parents, which is ane atrocious horrid crime plainlie against the light and lawe of nature, farr less ought they for such crimes as are 'in apicibus juris' and unquestionable by the learnedest doctors; and wee have ane excellend rule in lawe, Leg. 108, Dig. † de regulis juris, 'ferè in omnibus ponatur libus iudicis et erati et imprudentie succuritur.' It is furder alleadged for Mr. Wetham, that he being ane Englishman borne, his circumstances doe plead ane exemption from the crime for which he is indyted, in respect both the nature of the crime and the probation, and punishment y^rof in England differs from the lawe of Scotland.

* This should be 'ubi calore juvenili potest dicere vel tacere quod ei nocere potest.' It occurs in Mackenzie's Criminals, Part. 1, tit. 1, s. 5.

† This should be Dig. Lib. 50, tit. 17, leg. 108.

My Lord Advocat triplies, to the answers and duplies, the indytmnt and replies are opposed, and as to the indytmnt not being speciall and particular, as to the tyme, day, and moneth, it is answered, that the crimes charged doe import a tract of tyme, some of the pannalls being longer and shorter tyme in their rebellion, but the lybell hath definit limits, and it does not appear that the pannalls are prejudged of any defence competent by the latitude contained in the indytmnt, in which case the persewer would have condescended more particulare.

2. The crime subsumed upon are the same with these condemned by the act of parliament lybelled on.

3. The indytmnt beares the mainer of the pannalls their coming to the Bass, because it was so formed upon their own confession before the councill, but it is not lybelled, that they came either by command or commission, but expresslie that they came by or without commission, and only under command of Graham, which is an aggravation, and noe extenuation, that they came in a formed companie to invade their own countrie, and assist rebels against their king and soveraigne, and tho' they hade come by command as is not lybelled, yet it hade been noe defence, since noe command, especiallie of a forraigne prince, can defend in the case of treason; and if the defenders logick were good, a regement of Scotsmen, invading their native countrie by command of the French king, should be free of treason or rebellion, which is absurd, nor in such a case is there the least distinction betwixt commander and sojor, all these pretences being groundless in the case of treason.

4. Simple presence as lybelled, though it be not sollie, is yet relevant in that circumstantial case; where a companie of men possesses themselves of a fort and holds it out against the government, and some joyne and shyde with them, and give noe account for what els they came there, and if simple presence in this caise should not be sustained, it might happen that the hail rebels might escape, because they might be seen and discovered, over the walls, and yet not one of them sein in armes, but the persewer is not straitned in this point.

5. The indytmnt lybells the charge and intercommuning only as an aggravation, for though noe such charge hade been given, the keepers out of the Bass are notorious rebels, who have shewed their hostility against their king and countrie, both by holding out the fort forcible, and by many other nottoure acts, and when rebels do either take a fort, or appear in the feilds in armes, the charging them to render or lay down is only an act of favour, and the intercommuning enshewing is only to putt the loidges in mala fide; but the holding out of the fort by armes, is rebellion, and the joining with such rebels in armes, are guilty thereof; but beyds, and for superabundance, the charge against Nicolstone and all of them, is lawfull, because though it bear not his first name, it designes him Nicolstone in the Bass, and with the rebels there, and noe other Nicolson is condescended on, and the forsaid designation of all of them, is premised immediately to their names.

6. That Middleton, or any of them, are not Scotsmen, is not incumbent to the persewer to prove; the persewar grants that it is a necessarie quality to the crime of treason, that the persone accused be either naturé aut Jure subditus, but since Middleton and all others, must be presumed to be having all the appearance of Scotsmen, and being found in companie with Scots rebels, holding out treasonable a fort within the kingdome, and that he cam from abroad signifies nothing, since the rest of the companie, that came with him, came lyke-ways from abroad, and yet are undoubtedly Scotsmen, so that his coming from abroad, in this manner, doeth rather presume him to be a Scotsman, seing Scotsmen and non else seem to have entered in that conspiracie.

But 7, tho he were a stranger all over, yet joing with Scotsmen in their treason or rebellion, he is airt and part of treason, and it were an absurditie unheard-of, to affirme that a stranger joing with unnatural traitors to take away the life of their prince, should not be guilty of treason, and for what is objected, that if he were principall actor he would not be a traitor, ergo he cannot be airt and part. It is a non sequitur, for even a woman assisting a man to the rapt of a virgine, would be airt and part of the rapt, and a spado assisting in the crime of adulterie would be airt and part of the adulterie, altho both incapable to be principal actors.

8. To affirme that a countriemans residing elsewhere, for never so long, wears out the character of his originall, or liberats him from his alleadgance, is against reason, and the opinion of all lawiers, nor is the instance of the pleading to the contrair, by reverend churchmen, worth the noticing, and as for Wetham, tho an Englishman, yet he is a post natus, which as to both priviledges and crimes, confounds the two kingdomes, and besydes he is a rebell here, against his naturall prince.

9. As to the late civill wares, it is certain that none were detained as traitors, hinc inde, and in Monmouth's invasion, it is weell enough knowen, how privat souldiers were detained, and he is ill read in the wares betwixt the house of Lancaster and York, that hath not found hundreds of privat souldiers hanged on both sydes.

10. As to the instance of the Syrians, it seems the defender forgott that that companie was a companie of pure forraigners, for any thing that appears.

11. As for the representation to the king, craved, the lords will noe doubt doe in that as they shall see cause, but for the consequences that this instance of justice may import, they will certainly be of advantage to the government, but cannot break the least measure of fair ware, for beyds that it may deter unnasmall countreimen, wherof we have too many abroad, from invading their countrie; it may also be of singular influence to reduce the Bass; and as to the wares abroad, the rules are better laid down, and more certainly observed, on both sydes, then that the case of the pannalls, which is everie way speciall, should make the least alteration; and in effect, hou fair and just soever a ware may be, yet traitors, as well as spyes, are knowen to be excepted on both sydes, and how this exception may be less, or more, observed in the clemencie or politick of the king's and princes, on both sydes, it concerns not this tryeall and justice.

12. For what is objected out of the Majestie, it deserves noe answer, being absolet and in effect contrair to the knowen law of all the world, where minors are judged doli capaces as to crimes speciallie atrocious, crimes such as treason, in the first place, and though by our act of parliament a minor committing a crime under 46 yeirs of age be sometye excused a panā ordinariā, yet it signifies nothing in this caice, besides the Majestie speaks of fellonie and not of treason; and the fellonie appears to be some feudall delinquencie against the superior, or els the author its lyke hade not been see farr out of purpose.

As to Wetham's youth, and being ane Englishman, it is allreadie answered, and therfor it is craved that the pannalls may pass to the knowledge of ane inquist.

The Lords continow this tryeall till the twentie first instant att one a clock in the afternoon, and ordaines the pannalls to be caryed back to prison, and the witnesses and assysers to attend ilk persone under the paine of 200 merks.

Februarie 21, 1694.

My Lord Advocat declares he insists at this dyet against John Trotter and Alexander McCleish for the crimes lybelled against them, and craves interlocutor upon that part of the lybell.

INTERLOCUTOR.

The lords commissioners of justiciary haveing considered that part of the indytmēt against John Trotter and Alexander McCleish the pannalls, they find the same relevant as it is lybelled against them, to infer the crime and paine of treason, and remitts the same to the knowledge of the assyse.

Sic Subscribitur, DAVID HOME, I. P. D. C.

My lord advocat craved the lords interlocutor upon John Trotter and Alexander McCleish's confessions emitted upon the nyneteenth instant in their lordships presence and before the whole assyse in face of court; whither the same be a judiciall and probative confession or not.

The lords finds the forsaids confessions swa submitted before them and the assyse to be both judicial and probative.

My Lord Advocate for further probation adduced the pannall's judiciall Confession, wherof the tenors followes:

EDINBURGH, Feb. 19, 1694.

In presence of the lords commissioners of justiciarie and assizers sittand in judgment, John Trotter the pannall, confesses that since the moneth of August, 1691, he has frequently assisted the Bass with meat, drink, and other things comfortable to them, and has held correspondence otherwayes with the rebels in the Bass frequently till the moneth of March last, and since March last he sent in a letter to the rebels in the Bass, which was none of his owen writing, and received ane answer from them; declares that for the tyme preceeding March last, it was but three tymes that he supplied them, viz. first in August, 1691, att which tyme he sent by Hacket and others of the saids rebels bisket and mail, which Hacket bought himselfe, and was shipt att Leith for the Bass and the pannall's pairt was to give Hacket his advice how to manadge his busienes; declares that the boat was a Bruntsland boat, but he knowes neither the name of the boat nor of the master; declares the second tyme was in Februarie or March, 1692, att which tyme the pannall sent in some tobacco and other small things from Fisherawe with Grahame's man; and att that tyme he sent in two letters with Charles Maitland to the Bass; the third tyme was in December 1692, or Janwarie thereafter or therby, att which tyme some of the rebels came ashore and brought money with them, and the pannall directed them how they should gett butter and cheese, and bisket for their money; declares that about March last he mett with skipper Robertstone att Wintounne, and the skipper being to goe to the north, the pannall desyred him to speak with M'Govan and M'Clean, two of the rebels in the Bass, and att their desyre he gave Robertson money; and he thinks the said Robertstone mett with them afterwards, and he himselfe told Robertstone that he thought they would propose to Robertstone to goe to the Bass, and they would gratifie him for it, and declares that he gave Robertstone money to buye twelve barrells to carrye to Aberdour to fill with beer or ale for the Bass, which money he gott from the Bass men; declares that he believes the four dollars mentioned in ane accompt under his hand was given be him to the Bass men, and acknowledges the said accompt to be his hand write; and that it was accompt drawn up to send to the rebels in the Bass, that they might send out money to pay it, which he knew they had in their hands as they said to him: and that the said memorandum was drawn out att yr desire; acknowledges the article of fiftie-fyre pund mentioned in his accompt, payed to James Douglass for things to be sent to the Bass, but they were never sent to the Bass nor to Portseatoun; declares that he sent from Dumbarr in the end of December or beginning of Janwarie last, a letter from a freind of Hacket's to Hacket then in the Bass; declares that he gott a letter with the boat that returned from Middleton, the present governour in the Bass; declares they used to call him John Dods and he has gotten the letters with that direction; confesses that the butter and cheese that he advised collonell Grahame the governour of the Bass man to buy for the Bass in December, 1692, were caryed to Portseatoun by Grahame's man, and by him and his neighbour transported to the Bass under colour that they were goeing to the English shipe lyeing in Cockenieroad as the pannal was informed; confesses that all his correspondence and supplie was according to the dates above marked, viz. before March 1693, except the letters which he sent and received in December or Januarie last; he declines any defence, and throwes himselfe in their majesties mercy.

400. Proceedings in the Parliament of Scotland respecting the Massacre of Glenco: 7 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1695. [Collection of State Tracts published in the Reign of King William the Third.*]

COMMISSION for Trial of the Slaughter committed at Glenco, upon the 13th day of February, 1692.

Anno Dom. 1693. per expressam instructionem, potestatem concessimus de mortuo Gulielmo Duci de Hamilton, aliisque, pro examinando et inquirendo de caede quorundam Cognominis de Macdonald aliorumque de Glenco. Anno Dom. 1692. et de modo et de methodo Commissionis ejusdem; nihilominus Inquisitio quæ tunc facta erat in prosecu-

* "From an Article entitled, "The Massacre of Glenco: Being a True Narrative of the barbarous murder of the Glenco men in the highlands of Scotland, by way of military execution, on the 13th of February, 1692. Containing the commission under the great seal of Scotland, for making an inquiry into that horrid murder: the proceedings of the parliament of Scotland upon it: the report of the commissioners upon the inquiry, laid before the king and parliament, and the address of the parliament to king William for justice upon the murderers. Faithfully extracted from the Records of Parliament, and published for undeceiving those who have been imposed upon by false accounts."

The Narrative is preceded by a Letter as follows:

"Sir; In answer to yours of the 1st of October, I herewith send you from the Records of our parliament, a true and authentic Account of the Massacre of Glenco, as you righteously call it. I wish this matter could have been forgotten to eternity; but since you say it is altogether needful for the vindication of the justice of our country, against many false, slanderous accounts that are daily given of that business in England, I am willing you print what I now send you; and that you may be furnished to answer all objections against the truth of this Narrative, you may inform any Englishman of quality, that is willing to be satisfied in the matter, that the Report of the Commission, the Address of our Parliament herewith sent you, and the Duplicates of the lord Stair's Letters, are, or were at least in the Scots Secretaries Office at London; or if they should happen to be withdrawn from thence, they may inform themselves fully in the truth of this from Mr. Johnston, who was at that time secretary of state for Scotland, and had particular directions from the late queen Mary to push on this inquiry, and search into the bottom of that horrid murder; for her majesty was grieved at the heart, that the reputation of the king her husband should have suffered so much by that affair. I would not, however, that Mr. Johnston should know any thing of your design to publish this: for though you know as well as I that his diligence to serve and obey the queen in this matter, was always judged here to be one of the chief causes of our nation's losing that able and honest minister; yet he is so nice in point of honour, that he chused rather to be unjust to himself, and to lie under imputations, than to give any part of those papers to be published, though frequently urged to it, because he said it would be undecent in him, that had once been his majesty's secretary, to do any such thing. Therefore, though you are carefully to conceal this matter from him till it be published, yet as soon as it is, I must pray you, if you think it proper, to go and tell him, that I beg his pardon for making this appeal to him, without his leave: and though I may suffer in his good opinion by what I have done, yet if this publication may any ways oblige him to do himself, his late master, and his country further justice, by telling what he knows more of the matter, I shall be the easier under his displeasure. I had almost forgot to notice, that the duke of Athol, the lord Chancellor, and marquiss of Anandale, all now at London, were members of the commission, who made the inclosed report; and howsoever scrupulous they may have been in point of honour, to communicate any papers relating to this matter, they cannot in honour but own that this history is authentic, if any of the English nobility think fit to inquire of them about it: but you must be careful to let none of them know any thing of your design to publish it, or which way you have this information; though if they should come to know it, I chuse rather to incur their displeasure, by appealing to them, than to omit any thing that lies in my power to vindicate the honour and justice of our country."

"Edinburgh, Nov. 1, 1703."

And at the end of the Narrative are subjoined the following Observations:

"It is said that some of the persons did get a remission from king William; concerning which it is to be observed, first, that the taking of a remission is a tacit acknowledging of the crime, and taking upon them the guilt: next, that any such remission is null and void, and will not defend them, because it did not proceed upon letters of Slains, nor is there any assithment made to the nearest of kin; it being expressly provided by the 136 act, par. 8 Jac. the 6th, that remissions are null, unless the party be assithed; and by 157 act, par. 12 Jac. 6. And it is farther to be observed from that act, that albeit respites and remissions had been formerly granted for several enormous crimes, yet the defendants were ordained to be criminally pursued notwithstanding of the same; and the said act is ratified by the 173 act, par. 13, Jac. 6, against the granting of remissions and respites to the committers of murder, slaughter, and other atrocious crimes therein mentioned, where there are not sufficient letters of Slains shewn; and that no respite or remission be admitted in judgment, except the same be compounded with the treasurer, and subscribed by him, at least past his register. And act 178, it is provided, that no respite or remission be granted for slaughter, until the party skaithe'd be first satisfied; and if any respite or remission shall happen to be granted before the party grieved be first satisfied, the same shall be null by way of exception or reply, without any further declarator. Thirdly, It is to be observed, that the parliament having declared, that the killing of the Glenco-men was a murder under trust; it is clear by the 51 act, par. 11, Jac. 6, that murder and slaughter of a person under trust, credit, assurance and power of the slayer, is treason: so that by the said act, these that had accession to, or were any ways airt and part of the slaughter of the Glenco-men, are guilty of treason."

Of this horrible transaction various accounts are in print. It is very pathetically related by Gilpin in his Tour in Scotland.

Mr. Laing (Hist. of Scotland, vol. 4, p. 241) observes of it:

"The outcry against the massacre of Glenco was not confined to Scotland; but by the industry of the Jacobites, it resounded with every aggravation through Europe. Whether the inhuman rigour, or the perfidious execution of the orders were considered, each part of the bloody transaction discovered a deliberate, treacherous, and an impolitic cruelty, from which the king himself was not altogether exempt. Instead of the terror which it was meant to inspire, the horror and universal execration which it excited, rendered the highlanders irreconcilable to his government, and the government justly odious to his subjects. His friends endeavoured, by the plea of inadvertence and haste, to transfer the blame to his ministers; and his ministers were equally earnest to vindicate the orders as strictly legal; or as analogous to letters of fire and sword, which the privy council had been accustomed to grant. But when a second order, signed and countersigned by the king with such unusual precaution, is combined with the impunity which his ministers enjoyed, no doubt can remain that, however the execution might exceed his intentions, the measure was not concerted without his knowledge and previous consent. No enquiry was made at the time, no punishment was inflicted afterwards, on the authors of the massacre. On the contrary, it is asserted that the officers most active in the execution were preferred. The best and perhaps the just explanation of the transaction is, that William, beset with ministers inured to the sanguinary measures of the former government, was betrayed for once into an act of cruelty inconsistent with his character, and with the mild and merciful tenor of his reign."

That the parliament, which met in September 1692, omitted to investigate the Massacre, he ascribes to the detection of Neville Pain's correspondence, which at once intimidated the Jacobites from opposition, and indisposed the Presbyterians (to whom their establishment had been recently restored) to thwart the government, while the Jacobites were plotting to subvert. And of the measures which were in 1695 taken as related in the text concerning the massacre, he thus writes:

"On the death of Hamilton and Queensberry, the marquis of Tweeddale was appointed commissioner to parliament, which was never summoned except to provide supplies. The money voted for new levies, but not appropriated in the former session, had been ungenerously diverted to other purposes; and the troops intended for internal defence were employed to recruit the regiments abroad. The nobility were thus disappointed of commissions for themselves and their friends. The people were disgusted at William's supine inattention to Scotland; and an enquiry into the massacre of Glenco was so loudly demanded, that some extraordinary concessions were required from the crown. An enquiry was no sooner proposed, than the parliament was informed that a commission had been issued to investigate the massacre; and thanks were returned for a measure obviously intended to supersede a public examination, and to screen the offenders from public justice. But the result of the enquiry, by the artifices of the ministers to supplant a rival, was reported to parliament at its repeated request; and after a diligent investigation, the guilt of the massacre was transferred to Dalrymple. The king was literally tried, and acquitted, by a vote that his instructions contained no warrant for the slaughter; but the offenders, instead of being surrendered to public justice, as the parliament requested, were pardoned or preferred. The necessary supplies and levies were provided. The episcopal clergy were permitted, on accepting the oaths to government, to remain exempt from the jurisdiction of presbyteries, and 106 who were persuaded to qualify, retained their livings under the protection of the king."

In the "Complete History of Europe, &c." for the year 1707, in which year lord Stair died, is given an encomiastic account of him; to which is appended a defence against "two things commonly objected against this earl." With the first, "that being lord advocate to king James, he had framed a proclamation in Scotland for a toleration, wherein the king's absolute and dispensing power was very highly asserted," the bloody proceedings at Glencoe have no immediate connection.

"The other charge against the earl," proceeds his advocate, "was that the peremptoriness and severity of his letters, when he was secretary of state, was the cause of the barbarous massacre of the Glencoe men; a matter of fact, which, if considered with regard to the merit of the persons or their number, was inconsiderable, but has been very much taken notice of by all the writers of the life of king William, and others, partly because the officers entrusted in the execution of a military command, did not only exceed the warrant they had, but broke in upon the undeniable rules of hospitality and humanity; and partly because the circumstances of that matter have been greatly aggravated, to serve the turns of a party for disparaging and persecuting the late earl of Stair." The matter was carried on with that heat, as to draw the late king William directly into question in the parliament of Scotland, which the enemies to the memory of that great prince have laboured to improve to his disadvantage. It were too long to account for that here: as for the king himself, it is ridiculous for men of common sense to imagine that so great a prince should have singled out a low and obscure mean sept of thieves, who could in no ways either be an object of his vengeance or jealousy, but as they were enemies to the government; nor can any man of candour and ingenuity imagine, that the earl of Stair, who had neither estate, friendship, nor enmity in that country, nor so much as knowledge of these persons, and who was never noted for cruelty in his temper, should have thirsted after the blood of these wretches, and it is as little conceivable how a commission under the great seal was directed to no magistrates, nor court of judicature, nor to any persons having power and authority by law, to enquire into this matter for several years after it was past, nor how these entrusted with this commission, came to tread the very steps of the cruel inquisition, in having taken an oath of secrecy among themselves and having imposed it upon their clerks; how they came to make use of different tools to give light to that matter (as they pretended) more especially Roman Catholics then in rebellion, and Glengary in particular the chief of them, and manager of a great part of the intrigue, who besides his Catholicity, is and was known to be one of the most obstinate enemies to king William's person and government? Or how these gentlemen came to adventure to take testimonies concerning the honour and life of any subject, and much more of any employed in his majesty's service, and yet most of all, which concerned the king's honour directly, without giving so much as an opportunity to any body concerned to see that things were fairly and honestly done, or to justify themselves or their friends. And yet all these circumstances are no less undeniable and certain than they are surprising.

"When these inquisitors had thus prepared matters, reports were spread of great and strange discoveries, and then some men out of zeal for the king, whom the enemies of his government would have loaded with these cruelties, moved the parliament that the proceedings of the commission might be laid before the House, to which the king's commissioner was pleased to give very ready compliance. A just deference to that great assembly forbids too particular a disquisition of all that past upon that subject. Thus much is certain; the thing itself being horrible, some body was to be blamed. The king could not be charged, and indeed it is undeniable, that though his royal orders were given after the breach of a pacification, and in very precise terms, yet they did contain a warrant for mercy according to circumstances, and it was not possible, that the king could know that his troops were received hospitably by the people whom that warrant principally concerned.

"The blame then must lie either upon the secretary, the king's general in Scotland, or the officer that executed the order. To lay it upon the officer that executed the order, where indeed it justly lay, was of no consequence against the earl of Stair, and did not answer some men's design: to lay it upon the general was hard, for truly he had been prevailed with to furnish the commission with a good many of the earl's principal letters and the king's principal instructions. And though the dispensing of the mercy, mentioned in the king's order, did belong to the general, and so the excess seemed more naturally to touch him, yet the report of the commission cleared him clean, for the barbarity of the fact consisted in one circumstance, viz. that officers received in hospitality for several days, and kindly entertained by their landlords, fell upon them unexpectedly and murdered them. Now the general being at Edinburgh, and but lately returned from London, the commission presumed that he was ignorant of the troops being friendly received in Glencoe.

“ It remained that the earl, then master of Stair, must be guilty; but seeing what was done against him was neither by way of process nor sentence, and was carried with so much haste, when he was in Flanders, attending the king, that there was no time left for publishing a case in his defence by his friends. And that a case being printed late that evening when the vote passed, and some copies of it being delivered to some members before the House rose, the earl’s brother, though a member himself, was fain to ask forgiveness of the House rather than be sent to prison; which to a man sickly and weak as he was then, was present death, besides abandoning of his friend’s just defence. I say then, that what was done in parliament not being done judicially, nor by way of legislature, and during the earl’s absence, leaves the matter still entire; and not to enter into a detail of that whole matter, the earl’s friends made the following remarks.

“ 1. That the orders for using military execution against Glencoe were not so much as countersigned by the earl of Stair. 2. That all his letters, as well those which accompanied the orders, as those that preceded the military execution, made mention of the power the general had to shew mercy according to occasion, and that those clauses of the earl’s letters were omitted in the report of the commission. 3. That the earl’s letter writ after the execution, or a few days before it, from London, could never be the cause or warrant of any excess; because it was impossible in nature, that those letters could come to the general, much less to the knowledge of the officers entrusted with the execution, seeing the post in those places with the best expedition must require 7 or 8 days in coming and as much in going. 4. The warmth expressed in the earl’s letters against Glencoe, being always tempered with a power to the general to show mercy, could not so much as be the occasion, much less the cause of the excesses committed: and the indignation expressed even in the later letters after the execution, was yet excusable, upon the supposition of his being ignorant of the troops being received friendly at Glencoe, which was more natural and easy for the commission to have presumed, than that the general then at Edinburgh should have been ignorant of it. 5. Another great circumstance which aggravates the barbarity committed on Glencoe, was his taking the oaths, but as to this it is to be observed, that neither the king, nor any about him, had the least intimation of it at granting of the orders, and yet upon the supposition that they might come in, even after the time for taking the oaths, and lay down their arms, there was power for dispensing mercy both in the order and in the letters that related to it. And in the next place it was unjustifiable in the commissioners or inquisitors concerning the matter of Glencoe, to pretend that they proceeded for the vindication of the government, and yet to draw their chief lights from Glengarry and Keppoch, persons notoriously disaffected to it. While at the same time they overlooked the council books, where they would have found at large the rise and circumstances of all that matter, and that the king having entered into a pacification with the highlanders, then, in arms, on condition that they should submit and take the oaths by the first of January 1691-2, and that this pacification (which was traversed by diverse interests well known to some of the inquisitors) not being likely to have all the desired effect; the king put out two very solemn proclamations, intimating that after the day none of the rebels should be received into mercy, but treated with the rigours of war; so that neither Glencoe nor any of them, had any reason to complain of unfair dealing. 6. By the story, as it is pieced together by these inquisitors, it is very plain, that old Glencoe did not come in till the end of December, the day indeed they thought fit to omit for reasons best known to themselves. When he did come in, he did not offer himself to any one empowered to tender the oaths, but old colonel Hill governor of Inverlochy, who told him, he had no such power. This governor being the person by whom any order could be put in execution; Glencoe according to his cunning, thought that if he kept a little correspondence with him, without directly submitting to the government, he should be safe, but to make all sure, he was forced to make a step further, and some days after the time went to the sheriff’s deputy of Argyleshire, where he took and subscribed the oaths, and got a certificate at the bottom of the paper, of his having taken them of that date from the sheriff’s deputy which was intrusted with himself, and was sent by him, with his son, to be presented to the privy council. But they having positive orders to admit of nobody after the day, the clerks would not receive the certificate, and these were sufficient warnings for Glencoe to have made his application to the general or to the council, to have his case represented. But having some dependence upon his intelligence with the governor of Inverlochy, and as it appears being willing to play fast and loose, he was content to keep his oaths in his pocket, and to make a fair appearance of friendship during the winter, that he might be safe at home till it was time to go to the field; nor will this subtilty seem any ways a thing extraordinary to persons that are conversant with the genius of that sort of people. In this state of affairs some foot were sent from the garrison of Inverlochy to quarter in Glencoe, which does not appear to have been by any order. These troops Glencoe received with all the appearances of friendship, and the officer having received his orders during the time he was there entertained, had not resolution or honesty enough either to declare fair war, or lay down his commission, rather than imbrue his hands in the blood of his landlord and his children, but chose to take the opportunity of an order given by persons wholly ignorant of the hospitality and submission of these unhappy wretches, and executed it in a way that is for ever unjustifiable. In this, and this only, consisted the atrocity of that matter, and had the inquiry been directed to find out truly where the matter lay, the officers had received condign punishment. It is true, the report of the commission does charge these officers for their behaviour, but as the report bore hard in laying the blame where it was not, the king suspected the sincerity of the whole, and nothing followed upon it.

Lastly, the keenness and asperity that appears in the earl's letters, proceeded from a cause very different from what his enemies have endeavoured to possess the world of; and the truth of it is, he had pretty good reasons to wish, that if the highlanders should break the pacification, and draw upon a whole country the severity and cruelties of war, it should rather light upon an obscure small sept of tenants, considerable for nothing but their noted robberies and murders, who being treated with the rigours of war might procure an easy submission from the rest. And the earl was the more concerned, because he was thought to have a considerable part in advising the pacification, whereby the broken and desperate men in the highlands, some whereof were in rebellion, even before king James went away, and had defeated a party of his troops, who were commanded to assist in executing of a sentence upon a civil contract, might be brought in to be good subjects, and to have liberty and property in their native country: but for this counsel the earl was very liberally blamed by the enemies of the government, because it indeed broke their interests, nor have they ever made any considerable appearance since; and by others, because the thing was not done by them. And these people did not fail to solicit the late king to severities, and to disparage the pacification, as being very dishonourable; and upon that occasion the merits of Glencoe were set forth to the full, and a certain person was sent commissioner to manage that affair at court, who was witness at all the deliberations before the military order was drawn up.

To conclude, it is plain to any man who considers the matter, that it must appear very strange, that ever the king or his ministers should have been suspected accessory to so mean a cruelty."

Sir John Dalrymple in his relation of Stair, says, that the scheme for cutting off by the means of "Letters of fire and sword, an inhuman but illegal weapon," all the highland rebels who should not take the oaths within the time prescribed, was suggested by lord Breadalbane, adopted by Dalrymple, and assented to by the king. And he adds, that "Glenco with all his clan was peculiarly obnoxious to lord Breadalbane, because there had been frequent wars between their people. And sir John Dalrymple thought that mercy would be thrown away upon them, because they had been in the irreclaimable habit of making incursions into the low countries for plunder, and because he had himself obtained a pardon for them from king William, when one of the tribe having discovered his accomplices in a crime, the rest had tied him to a tree, and every man in the tribe had stabbed him with a durk, Glenco the chieftain giving the first blow." I perceive not that Dalrymple refers to any distinct authorities for this circumstantial account, the latter part of which is somewhat indistinctly expressed.

Burnet states that the proposition of military execution upon the Glenco men originated from Breadalbane, and that the severe order concerning the separation of that clan from the rest of the highlanders, was signed by the king, without any inquiry about it, "for he was too apt to sign papers in a hurry without examining the importance of them;" the consequence of his suffering that sort of business to accumulate, till it became necessary to dispatch a great deal in a very little time. And he refers the king's permitting the matter to escape public investigation to the operation of his tenderness upon discovering how many had participated in the transaction.

In Dalrymple's Appendix to part 2, book 6, he has inserted some curious documents relative to the treaty with the Highlanders, and other proceedings about this time respecting them. The following are those most nearly connected with Glenco:

Secretary Stair to Lord Breadalbane.

My lord; London, Dec. 2, 1691.

"Yours of the 16th past was very uneasy; it is a little qualified by that of the 19th.—I know not by what I was moved to write to you eight days ago, as if I had known what these letters brought me; and though what I wrote then was only to hasten matters, the lingering being of ill consequence, yet I never thought there was danger in the miscarrying of it. I confess I was desirous of your return, upon the finishing of your negotiation; but without that, or the having prevailed with one man, is what I never wish to see. I am convinced it is neither your fault, nor can any prejudice arise to their majesties service by the change of measures, but only ruin to the Highlanders; but yet at the present settlement it would do yourself and your friends no advantage. That person you suspect to have blown up the M'Leans, hath great access, and wants nothing but such an occasion to introduce him, and to make him in a manner necessary to do what you cannot. I doubt not all will come right; but though it is necessary you do seem to come hither, that they may rue, yet you had not best, in my opinion, leave it; and here you cannot be before our settlement, as I apprehend, is in readiness. I shall not repeat my thoughts of your doited cousin; I perceive half sense will play a double game, but it requires solidity to embrace an opportunity, which to him will be lost for ever; and the garrison of Inverlochy is little worth, if he can either sleep in his own bounds, or if he ever be master there. I repent nothing of the plan; but what account can be given why Argyle should be forced to part with Ardnamurchan, to which Lochiel hath no more pretence than I? you cannot believe with what indifference the king heard this matter, which did alarm and surprise us all, and confirmed the bold assertions of others against you. I hope you will be able to document sir Ewen's and Mr. John M'Lean's commissions, which are necessary for your vindication. Lieut. col. Hamilton, deputy governor of Inverlochy, is a discreet man, you may make use of him. I should be glad to find, before you get any positive order, that your business is done, for shortly we will conclude a resolution for the winter campaign. I do not fail to take notice of the frankness of your offer to assist. I think the clan Donnell must be rooted out, and Lochiel. Leave the M'Leans to Argyll. But before this, Leven and Argyll's regiment, with two more, would have been gone to Flanders. Now all stops, and no more money from England to entertain them. God knows whether the 12,000*l.* sterling had been better employed to settle the Highlands, or to ravage them; but since we will make them desperate, I think we should root them out before they can get that help they depend upon. Their doing, after they get K. J. allowance, is worse than their obstinacy; for these who lay down arms at his command, will take them up by his warrant. Be assured no papist will be exempted from this oath of allegiance; and in Ireland they must take it, by act of parliament now made, since the supremacy is out of it. You may assure yourself, in our settlement of government, you are not forgot by your friends, though I must tell you some are again emboldened, who had given over to object against your being assumed.

My dear lord, adieu.

Secretary Stair to Lord Breadalbane.

My lord, London, Dec. 3, 1691.

“ The last post brought Tarbat letters from Glengarry, or from his lady, and Rorry upon a message. Glengarry had sent to him to Edinburgh. This hath furnished him with opportunity to discourse the king on all these matters. He tells me he hath vindicated you; only the share that the M'Donalds get is too little, and unequal to your good cousins, (really that's true) and he would have the money given to Glengarry, and leave Argyll and him to deal for the plea. He thought his share had only been 1,000*l.* sterling. I have satisfied the king in these points, that his share is 1,500*l.* sterling, and that he nor none of them can get the money, if Argyll consent not; for that destroys all that is good in the settlement, which is, to take away grounds of hereditary feuds: to be brief, I will assure you that I shall never consent any body's meddling shall be so much regarded, as to get any of your terms altered. By the next I expect to hear either these people are come to your hand, or else your scheme for mauling them; for it will not delay. On the next week the officers will be dispatched from this, with instructions to garrison Inver-garry, and Buchan's regiment will join Leven's, which will be force enough; they will have petards and some cannon. I am not changed as to the expediency of doing things by the easiest means, and at leisure, but the madness of these people, and their ungratefulness to you, makes me plainly see there is no reckoning on them; but delenda est Carthago. Yet who have accepted, and do take the oaths, will be safe, but deserve no kindness; and even in that case, there must be hostages of their nearest relations, for there is no regarding men's words whom their interest cannot oblige. Menzies, Glengarry, and all of them, have written letters, and taken pains to make it believed, that all you did was for the interest of king James. Therefore look on, and you shall be satisfied of your revenge. Adieu.

Lord Basil Hamilton to the Duke.

London, 9th Jan. 1692.

“ I know not if the news of the Highlanders taking the oaths will put a stop to the marching of the troops that were designed for that purpose, but I believe it will not; but that the orders for their campaign will still go on.

taking the oath of allegiance; it remains now to propose to your majesty, how to make them useful and serviceable to you, and to take up arms for your majesty in case of any insurrection at home, or invasion from abroad, or that your majesty think it fit to use some of them in foreign parts.

"1st, The law obliges the nation to rise in arms when required, and, to continue in arms forty days.

"2d, That your majesty by virtue of this law, ordain all the highland landlords and chieftains to have such a proportion of men ready, as their estates and interest may easily raise and provide, without making the levy too heavy for them, which levy may be, according to the calculation made thereof, four thousand good and effective men.

"3d, That these men, both officers and soldiers, be enrolled, and thereby ready to be called for when required. And to that end,

"4th, That your majesty give commission to some principal man in the highlands, to have the charge of raising, enrolling, and bringing them to the field, and placing of fit inferior officers over them, according to the number that every tribe sends out.

"5th, That this principal person have the pay of a general officer, but that only when he is employed, to defray his expence; who is to receive his orders from your majesty, or your government, or from the commander in chief of your standing forces in that kingdom.

"6th, That Lochzeal, in respect of his experience and skill, and his interest in the other clans besides his own, may have the next command over this militia, and have the pay of a colonel while he is employed, in regard he is ambitious to serve your majesty, and he is a protestant.

"7th, That there be forty captains set over the four thousand, of such as every tribe may have one of their own to command them, and these to have a gratuity at their return home, after they are dismissed, as they behave themselves, and do keep their men in good discipline; and this gratuity to be bestowed by the advice of your majesty's government, the commander in chief of your forces, and of the person who has the principal command of the highlanders. That as soon as your majesty settles your government of that kingdom these two commissions be given, that they may immediately thereafter go about the enrolling of the men, according to the proportions to be charged by proclamation on every landlord and chieftain, to be ready when called for.

"8th, As this establishment will encourage the highlanders to be faithful, and serve your majesty, being commanded by persons of themselves, and in whom your majesty may confide; so it will extremely discourage such as design to give disturbance to the peace of that kingdom, and to embarrass your government there, when they find that your majesty has engaged a formidable force of highlanders ready to fall on them, contrary to their expectation, and endeavours of keeping them from coming in.

"9th, Your majesty has these forces without any charge, except for a few officers, and that only when employed, and that but for a short time, which will discuss any commotion can be in that nation; and it may be asserted, that there cannot be better militia men than they are.

"10th, Your majesty has not a fund in that kingdom, nor can have, to maintain above three thousand standing forces, which are so few, that it is a great encouragement for all ill designs, especially in your majesty's absence. But this addition of four thousand highlanders will alter the case exceedingly, will strengthen your government, encourage your standing forces, and disappoint your enemies; for they may be so ordered as to be ready to march on few days advertisement.

"11th, It will be fit there be a major or two in constant pay, for attending and looking after these forces, and to serve as adjutants for raising, bringing them to the field, and to keep them from prejudicing the countries.

"12th, That in pursuance of this diligence, and that the discontented disaffected parties in that kingdom may see that your majesty will trust and employ the highlanders, (if these force you to it) your majesty will be pleased to dispatch Lochziel home, contented, and obliged to your majesty's royal bounty: it is but a small sum he pretends, and your majesty will find it very well bestowed.

"13th, In case your majesty, at any time, think it fit to employ a regiment of highlanders abroad, they may be detached out of this body of men; and in that case, it is humbly offered to your majesty, that they be allowed to use their own apparel, and their own arms, and to be disciplined in their own fashion, and to be commanded by persons having their language, and who have interest with them.

One of the Highland Chieftain's Commissions to treat.

"I Col. MacDonell, of Keppoch, doth hereby, in my own name, and in name of Rannald M'Donell of Insh, Ronald M'Donall of Froets, Donald M'Donald Coldonarge, Aeneas M'Donell of Bohurtmy, Aeneas M'Donell of Killbrihanatt, Aeneas M'Donell of Tulloch, Alex. M'Donell of Inveroy, Neil Kennedy of Kearuthan, Alex. M'Donell of Tirnoderish, and the rest of my kinsmen and friends, earnestly desire and request, impower and commissionate the right hon. John earl of Breadalbane, to treat and conclude with the present government, for procuring to me and my foresaid friends such lending and concessions as he may obtain from them; hereby promising, upon my oath, in my own name, and for them, that I and they shall stand and adhere to such terms as his lordship will procure for me and them. In witness whereof I have written and sealt thir presents, the twenty-fourth of June, 1691.

of Insh, Ronald M'Donald of Fensett, Alex. M'Donell of Inveroy, Donald M'Donell of Cleonaige, Aeneas M'Donell of Bohuntine, Aeneas M'Donell of Killiehonat, Aeneas Mac Donell of Tulloch, Neil Kennedy of Leonurhane-more, Alex. Kennedy of Leoruthan-beig, Alex. Mac Donell of Firrnadross, Aeneas Mac Donell of Auchnacochine, and all the rest of my kinsmen, friends, and followers, engage, on my faith and word, that I and they shall submit to the present government, live peaceably, and commit no acts of hostility nor depredations, nor join with any forces from abroad, or within the country, to commit any such acts until the first day of September next, providing that such proposals and terms as shall be made by the earl of Breadalbane to the present government be granted to me and those above-mentioned, against the foresaid day: providing also, that no act of hostility or depredations be committed against me, or any of my said friends or kinsmen, before the abovesaid first day of September next. To these conditions I do hereby oblige myself to stand and adhere: In witness whereof I have written and subscribed these presents, the 24th of June, 1691.

"COLL. MACDONALD."

"There is a tradition, whether true or not I know not, that when lord Nottingham afterwards wrote to lord Breadalbane to account for the 12,000*l.* which had been given him to be divided among the Highlanders, he answered the letter in these words: 'My lord, the Highlands are quiet: the money is spent: and this is the best way of accounting between friends.'"

But, according to Burnet, Breadalbane had honestly brought back the money.

The following anecdote is highly creditable to human nature:

"During the rebellion, in the year 1745, the clan of Glenco were quartered near the house of lord Stair. The Pretender being afraid they would remember, that the warrant for the massacre of their clan had been signed by the earl's father, sent a guard to protect the house. The clan quitted the rebel army, and were returning home: the Pretender sent to know their reason. Their answer was, that they had been affronted; and when asked what the affront was, they said, 'the greatest of any; for they had been suspected of being capable of visiting the injuries of the father upon the innocent and brave son.'"

In English thus :

William, by the grace of God, king of Great Britain, &c. To all good men to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Whereas we have taken into consideration, that though in the year of our Lord 1693, we gave power, by express instructions, to William duke of Hamilton deceased, and others, to examine and inquire into the slaughter of certain people of the name of Macdonald and others in Glenco, in the year 1692, and into the way and manner how the same was committed, yet nevertheless, the inquiry then made, pursuant to the said instructions, was defective; and considering likewise, that the most effectual method for receiving full information of the true circumstances of the matter aforesaid, must be by a commission to that effect; and being very well satisfied of the abilities and fitness of the persons under-named, for the ends before expressed: know ye therefore that we have named and constituted, and by the tenor of these presents do name and constitute, our right trusty and well-beloved cousin and counsellor, John marquis of Tweeddale, our high-chancellor, and William earl of Annandale, and our trusty and beloved counsellors, John lord Murray, sir James Stuart our advocate, Adam Cockburn of Ormiston our justice clerk, Mr. Archibald Hope of Rankeiller, and sir William Hamilton of Whitelaw, senators of our college of justice, sir James Ogilvy our solicitor, and Adam Drummond of Meggins, (of whom five shall be a quorum, and granting them power to chuse their own clerk) our commissioners, to take precognition and make enquiry into the slaughter aforesaid, by whom and how, and by what colour of authority the same was committed: and in order to the discovery of the same, we give power to the said commissioners to send for all warrants and directions granted for that end: and likewise to examine all persons that had any hand in the business aforesaid, and likewise to examine witnesses as shall be found necessary, either upon oath or declaration; and afterwards the said commissioners shall transmit to us the true state of the matter aforesaid, together with the proofs and evidence that shall be brought before them, that after due and full information, we may give such directions thereupon, as to us shall seem meet and necessary. In testimony whereof, we have commanded our Great Seal to be appended to these presents. Given at our court at Kensington, the 40th day of April, 1695, and of our reign the seventh.

Superscribed by the signature of the handwriting of our most serene lord the king.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

Upon the 22d of May, 1695, this commission was read in parliament, and the House voted nem. con. That his majesty's high commissioner transmit the humble thanks of the parliament to his Majesty, for ordering an inquiry into that matter, whereby the honour and justice of the nation might be vindicated.

It being urged that the commission should proceed with diligence, as being a national concern, and that the discovery be made known to the House before its adjournment; his grace assured them, that he doubted not of his majesty's giving satisfaction to his parliament in that point, and that before they parted.

The commissioners proceeded according to order, and made the following Report:

REPORT of the Commission given by his majesty, for inquiring into the slaughter of the men of Glenco, subscribed at Malyrduhouse the 20th day of June, 1693.

John marquis of Tweeddale, lord high chancellor of Scotland, William earl of Annandale, John lord Murray, sir James Stuart his majesty's advocate, Adam Cockburn of Ormiston, lord justice clerk, sir Archibald Hope of Rankeiller, and sir William Hamilton of Whitelaw, two of the senators of the college of justice, sir James Ogilvy his majesty's solicitor, and Adam Drummond of Meggins, commissioners appointed by his majesty, by his commission under the great seal of the date the 29th of April last past, to make inquiry, and to take trial and precognition about the slaughter of several persons of the surname of Macdonald and others in Glenco, in the year 1692, by whom and in what manner, and by what pretended authority the same was committed, with power to call for all warrants and directions given in that matter; as also to examine all persons who had a hand therein, with what witnesses they should find necessary, either upon oath or declaration, and to report to his majesty the true state of the said matter, with the evidence and testimonies to be adduced before them, as the said commission more amply bears: having met and qualified themselves by taking the oath of allegiance and assurance, conform to the act of parliament, with the oath de Fidei, as use is in such cases, did according to the power given to them, chuse Mr. Alexander Moor of Beircroft to be their clerk; and he having also qualified himself as above, they proceeded into the said inquiry, to call for all warrants and directions, with all such persons as witnesses, that might give light in the said matter; and having considered the foresaid warrants and directions produced before them, and taken the oaths and depositions of the witnesses undernamed, they with all submission lay the report of the whole discovery made by them before his majesty in the order following. And, first, of some things that preceded the said slaughter. Secondly, of the matter of fact, with the proofs and evidence taken, when and in what manner the same was committed. Thirdly, of the warrants and directions that either really were, or were pretended for the committing it. And, Lastly, The commissioners humble opinion of the true state and account of that whole business.

The things to be remarked preceding the said slaughter, were, that it is certain that the lairds of Glenco and Auchintreaten, and their followers, were in the insurrection and rebellion made by some of the highland clans, under the command first of the viscount of Dundee, and then of major general Buchan in the years 1689 and 1690. This is acknowledged by all. But when the earl of Braidalbin called the heads of the clans, and met with them in Auchallader in July 1691, in order to a cessation, the deceased Alexander Macdonald of Glenco was there with Gleggary, sir John Maclene and others, and agreed to the cessation, as it is also acknowledged: But the deceased Glenco's two sons, who were at that time with their father in the town of Auchallader, depone, that they heard that the earl of Braidalbin did at that time quarrel with the deceased Glenco about some cows that the earl alledged were stolen from his men by Glenco's men; and that though they were not present to hear the words, yet their father told them of the challenge. And the two sons, with Ronald Macdonald, indweller in Glenco, and Ronald Macdonald in Innerriggen in Glenco, do all depone, that they heard the deceased Glenco say, that the earl of Braidalbin at the meeting of Auchallader threatened to do him a mischief, and that he feared a mischief from no man so much as from the earl of Braidalbin, as their depositions at the letter A in the margin bears. And Alexander Macdonald, second son to the deceased Glenco, doth farther depone, that he hath often heard from his father and others, that there had been in former times blood betwixt Braidalbin's family and their clan, as his deposition at the same mark bears. And here the commissioners cannot but take notice of what hath occurred to them in two letters from secretary Stair to lieutenant colonel Hamilton, one of the 1st, and another of the 3d of December, 1691, wherein he expresses his resentment from the marring of the bargain that should have been betwixt the earl of Braidalbin and the highlanders to a very great height, charging some for their despite against him, as if it had been the only hindrance of that settlement: Whence he goes on in his of the 3d of December to say, that since the government cannot oblige them, it is agreed to ruin some of them to weaken and then the rest, and that the Macdonalds will lie in this net; and, in effect, seems even from that time, which was almost a month before the expiring of the king's indemnity, to project with lieutenant colonel Hamilton that some of them should be rooted out and destroyed. His majesty's proclamation of indemnity was published in August 1691, offering a free indemnity and pardon to all the highlanders who had been in arms, upon their coming in and taking the oath of allegiance betwixt that and the 1st of January thereafter: And in compliance with the proclamation, the deceased Glenco goes about the end of December 1691, to colonel Hill, governor of Fort William at Inverlochic, and desired the colonel to minister to him the oath of allegiance, that he might have the king's indemnity. But colonel Hill in his deposition, marked with the letter B, doth farther depone, that he hastened him away all he could, and gave him a letter to Ardkinlas to receive him as a lost sheep; and the colonel produces Ardkinlas's answer to that letter, dated the 9th of January, 1691, bearing, that he had endeavoured to receive the great lost sheep Glenco, and that Glenco had undertaken to bring in all his friends and followers, as the privy council should order: And Ardkinlas further writes, that he was sending to Edinburgh, that Glenco, though he had mistaken in coming to colonel Hill to take the oath of allegiance, might yet be welcome, and that thereafter the colonel should take care that Glenco's friends and followers may not suffer, till the king and council's pleasure be known, as the said letter marked on the back with the letter B. bears. And Glenco's two sons above named do depone in the same manner, that their father went about the end of December to colonel Hill, to take the oath of allegiance; but finding his mistake, and getting the colonel's letter to Ardkinlas, he hastened to Inverary as soon as he could for the bad way and weather, and did not so much as go to his own house in his way to Inverary, though he past within half a mile of it, as both their depositions at the letter B bears. And John Macdonald, the eldest son, depones farther at the same mark, that his father was taken in his way by captain Drummond at Barkaldin, and detained 24 hours.

Sir Colin Campbell of Ardkinlas, sheriff-deputy of Argile, depones, that the deceased Glenco came to Inverary about the beginning of January, 1692, with a letter from colonel Hill to the effect above mentioned, and was three days there before Ardkinlas could get thither, because of bad weather; and that Glenco said to him, that he had not come sooner, because he was hindered by the storm. And Ardkinlas farther depones, that when he declined to give the oath of allegiance to Glenco, because the last of December, the time appointed for the taking of it, was past, Glenco begged with tears that he might be admitted to take it, and promised to bring in all his people within a short time to do the like; and if any of them refused, they should be imprisoned or sent to Flanders. Upon which Ardkinlas says, he did administer to him the oath of allegiance upon the 6th of January, 1692, and sent a certificate thereof to Edinburgh, with colonel Hill's letter to Colin Campbell, sheriff clerk of Argile, who was then at Edinburgh; and further wrote to the said Colin that he should write back to him, whether Glenco's taking of the oath was allowed by the council or not, as Ardkinlas's deposition at the letter B testifies. And the said Colin, sheriff clerk, depones, that the foresaid letters, and the certificate relating to Glenco, with some other certificates relating to some other persons all upon one paper, were sent in to him to Edinburgh by Ardkinlas; which paper being produced upon oath by sir Gilbert Elliot, clerk of the secret council, but rolled and scored as to Glenco's part, and his taking the oath of allegiance, yet the commissioners found that it was not so delete or dashed, but that it may be read that Glenco did take the oath of allegiance at Inverary, the 6th day of January, 1692. And the said Colin Campbell depones, that it came to his hand fairly written, and not dashed; and that with this certificate he had the said letter from Ardkinlas (with colonel Hill's above mentioned letter to Ardkinlas inclosed) bearing, how earnest Glenco was to take the oath of allegiance, and that he had taken it upon the 6th of January, but that Ardkinlas was doubtful if that the council would receive it: and the sheriff clerk did produce before the commissioners the foresaid letter by colonel Hill to Ardkinlas, dated at Fort William the 31st day of December, 1691, and bearing, that Glenco had been with him, but slipped some days out of ignorance; yet that it was good to bring in a lost sheep at any time, and would be an advantage to render the king's government easy. And with the said sheriff clerk, the lord Aberuchil, Mr. John Campbell, writer to the signet, and sir Gilbert Elliot, clerk to the council, do all declare, That Glenco's taking the oath of allegiance, with Ardkinlas's foresaid certificate, as to his part of it, did come to Edinburgh, and was seen by them fairly written, and not scored or dashed; but that sir Gilbert and the other clerk of the council refused to take it in, because done after the day appointed by the proclamation. Whereupon the said Colin Campbell, and Mr. John Campbell, went, as they depone, to the lord Aberuchil, then a privy counsellor, and desired him to take the advice of privy counsellors about it; and accordingly they affirm that Aberuchil said he had spoke to several privy counsellors, and partly to the lord Stairs, and that it was their opinion that the foresaid certificate could not be received without a warrant from the king, and that it would neither be safe to Ardkinlas, nor profitable to Glenco, to give in the certificate to the clerk of the council; and that the lord Aberuchil confirms by his deposition, but doth not name therein the lord Stair. And Colin Campbell, the sheriff clerk, does farther depone, that with the knowledge of the lord Aberuchil, Mr. John Campbell, and Mr. David Moucrief, clerk to the council, he did by himself, or his servant, score or delete the foresaid letter, so that it stands scored, as to his oath of allegiance, and that he scored, or obliterated to the said

Mr. David Moucrief, clerk of the council, who took it in as it is now produced. But it doth not appear by all these depositions, that the matter was brought to the council board, that the council's pleasure might be known upon it, though it seems to have been intended by Ardkinlas, who both writ himself, and sent colonel Hill's letter for to make Glenco's excuse, and desired expressly to know the council's pleasure.

After that Glenco had taken the oath of allegiance, as is said, he went home to his own house; and, as his own two sons above named depone, he not only lived there for some days quietly and securely, but called his people together, and told them he had taken the oath of allegiance, and made his peace, and therefore desired and engaged them to live peaceably under king William's government, as the depositions of the said two sons, who were present, marked with the letter E. bear.

These things having preceded the slaughter, which happened not to be committed until the 13th of February, 1692, six weeks after the deceased Glenco had taken the oath of allegiance at Inverary, the slaughter of the Glenco alien was in this manner, viz. John and Alexander Macdonalds, sons to the deceased Glenco, depone, That Glengary's house being reduced, the forces were called back to the south, and Glenlyon, a captain of the earl of Argyle's regiment, with lieutenant Lindsay, ensign Lindsay, and six score soldiers, returned to Glenco about the 1st of February, 1692, where, at their entry, the elder brother John met them with about 20 men, and demanded the reason of their coming; and lieutenant Lindsay shewed him his orders for quartering there under colonel Hill's hand, and gave assurance that they were only come to quarter; whereupon they were billeted in the country, and had free quarters and kind entertainment, living familiarly with the people until the 13th day of February. And Alexander further depones, that Glenlyon being his wife's uncle, came almost every day and took his morning drink at his house; and that the very night before the slaughter, Glenlyon did play at cards in his own quarters with both the brothers. And John depones, That old Glenco his father had invited Glenlyon, lieutenant Lindsay, and ensign Lindsay, to dine with him upon the very day the slaughter happened. But on the 13th day of February, being Saturday, about four or five in the morning, lieutenant Lindsay, with a party of the foresaid soldiers, came to old Glenco's house, where having called in a friendly manner, and got in, they shot his father dead with several shots as he was rising out of his bed; and the mother having got up and put on her clothes, the soldiers stripped her naked, and drew the rings off her fingers, with their teeth; as likewise they killed one man more, and wounded another grievously at

* Aubrey, in his Miscellanies, relates that Archibald Mackeanys alias Macdonald, a second-sighted seer, had warned Glenco, "that he would be murdered in the night time in his own house, three months before it happened."

The same Author makes mention that the same place. And this relation they say they had from their mother, and is confirmed by the deposition of Archibald Macdonald indweller in Glenco; who farther depones that Glenco was shot behind his back with two shots, one through the head, and another through the body; and two more were killed with him in that place, and a third wounded and left for dead. And this he knows, because he came that same day to Glenco's house, and saw his dead body lying before the door, with the other two that were killed, and spoke with the third that was wounded, whose name was Duncan Dob, who came there occasionally with letters from the Brae of Mar.

The said John Macdonald, eldest son to the deceased Glenco, depones, the same morning that his father was killed, there came soldiers to his house before day, and called at his window, which gave him the alarm, and made him go to Innerriggen, where Glenlyon was quartered, and that he found Glenlyon and his men preparing their arms, which made the deponent ask the cause; but Glenlyon gave him only good words, and said they were to march against some of Glengary's men, and if there were ill intended, would not he have told Sandy and his niece? meaning the deponent's brother and his wife; which made the deponent go home and go again to his bed, until his servant, who hindered him to sleep, raised him. And when he rose and went out, he perceived about twenty men coming towards his house, with their bayonets fixed to their muskets; whereupon he fled to the hill, and having Auchnaion, a little village in Glenco, in view, he heard the shots wherewith Auchintriaten and four more were killed; and that he heard also the shots at Innerriggen, where Glenlyon had caused to kill nine more, as shall be hereafter declared. And this is confirmed by the concurring deposition of Alexander Macdonald his brother, whom a servant waked out of sleep, saying, It is no time for you to be sleeping, when they are killing your brother at the door; which made Alexander to flee with his brother to the hill, where both of them heard the foresaid shots at Auchnaion and Innerriggen. And the said John, Alexander, and Archibald Macdonald do all depone, that the same morning there was one serjeant Barber and a party at Auchnaion, and that Auchintriaten being there in his brother's house with eight more sitting about the fire, the soldiers discharged upon them about eighteen shot, which killed Auchintriaten and four more; but the other four, whereof some were wounded, fall-

Glenco had received concerning a former danger previous notice from the same seer, which had been equally neglected and equally verified. It may, however, be thought by most readers of this first prediction, that the danger might have been foreseen without preternatural intelligence, and that compliance to the warning might have been given without any stupidity of superstition or of credulity.

ing down as dead, serjeant Barber laid hold on Auchintriaten's brother, one of the four, and asked him if he were alive? He answered, that he was, and that he desired to die without rather than within: Barber said, that for his meat that he had eaten, he would do him the favour to kill him without; but when the man was brought out, and soldiers brought up to shoot him, he having his plaid loose, flung it over their faces, and so escaped; and the other three broke through the back of the house, and escaped: and this account the deponents had from the men that escaped. And at Innerriggen, where Glenlyon was quartered, the soldiers took other nine men, and did bind them hand and foot, killed them one by one with shot. And when Glenlyon inclined to save a young man of about twenty years of age, one captain Drummond came and asked how he came to be saved, in respect of the orders that were given, and shot him dead. And another young boy of about thirteen years ran to Glenlyon to be saved, he was likewise shot dead: and in the same town there was a woman and a boy about four or five years of age killed: and at Auchnaion there was also a child missed, and nothing found of him but the hand. There were likewise several killed at other places, whereof one was an old man about eighty years of age. And all this the deponents say they affirm, because they heard the shot, saw the dead bodies, and had an account from the women that were left. And Ronald Macdonald, indweller in Glenco, farther depones, that he being living with his father in a little town of Glenco, some of Glenlyon's soldiers came to his father's house, the said 13th of February in the morning, and dragged his father out of his bed, and knocked him down for dead at the door; which the deponent seeing, made his escape, and his father recovering after the soldiers were gone, got into another house; but this house was shortly burnt, and his father burnt in it: and the deponent came there after, and gathered his father's bones, and burnt them. He also declares, that at Auchnaion, where Auchintriaten was killed, he saw the body of Auchintriaten and three more cast out and covered with dung. And another witness of the same declares, that upon the same 13th of February, Glenlyon and lieutenant Lindsay, and their soldiers, did in the morning before day fall upon the people of Glenco when they were secure in their beds, and killed them; and he being at Innerriggen, fled with the first, but heard shots, and had two brothers killed there, with three men more and a woman, who were all buried before he came back. And all these five witnesses concur, that the foresaid slaughter was made by Glenlyon and his soldiers, after they had been quartered, and lived peaceably and friendly with the Glenco men about 13 days, and that the number of those whom they knew to be slain were about 25; and that the soldiers after the slaughter did burn the houses, barns and goods, and carried away a great spoil of horse, nolt, and sheep, above a thousand. And James Cāmpbel, soldier in the castle of Sterling, depones, that in January 1692, he being then a soldier in Glenlyon's company, marched with the company from Iverlochie to Glenco, where the company was quartered, and very kindly entertained for the space of fourteen days; that he knew nothing of the design of killing the Glenco men, till the morning that the slaughter was committed; at which time Glenlyon and captain Drummond's companies were drawn out in several parties, and got orders from Glenlyon and their other officers to shoot and kill all the countrymen they met with: and that the deponent being one of the party which was at the town where Glenlyon had his quarters, did see several men drawn out of their beds, and particularly he did see Glenlyon's own landlord shot by his order, and a young boy of about twelve years of age, who endeavored to save himself by taking hold of Glenlyon, offering to go any where with him if he would spare his life, and was shot dead by captain Drummond's order: and the deponent did see about eight persons killed, and several houses burnt, and women flying to the hills to save their lives. And lastly, sir Colin Cāmpbel of Aberuchil depones, that after the slaughter, Glenlyon told him that Macdonald of Innerriggen was killed with the rest of the Glenco men, with col. Hill's pass or protection in his pocket, which a soldier brought and shewed to Glenlyon.

The testimonies above set down being more than sufficient to prove a deed so notoriously known, it is only to be remarked, that more witnesses of the actors themselves might have been found, if Glenlyon and his soldiers were not at present in Flanders with Argyle's regiment. And it is farther added, that lieutenant colonel Hamilton, who seems by the orders and letters that shall be hereafter set down, to have had the particular charge of this execution, did march the night before the slaughter with about 400 men; but the weather falling to be very bad and severe, they were forced to stay by the way, and did not get to Glenco against the next morning, as had been concerted betwixt major Duncason and lieutenant colonel Hamilton; so that the measures being broke, lieutenant colonel Hamilton and his men came not to Glenco till about eleven of the clock, after the slaughter had been committed, which proved the preservation and safety of the tribe of Glenco, since by this means the far greater part of them escaped: and then the lieutenant colonel being come to Canneloch-leven, appointed several parties for several posts, with orders that they should take no prisoners, but kill all the men that came in their way. Thereafter some of the lieutenant colonel's men marched forward in the Glen, and met with major Duncason's party, whereof a part under Glenlyon had been sent by lieutenant colonel Hamilton to quarter there some days before; and these men told how they had killed Glenco and about thirty six of his men that morning, and that there remained nothing to be done by the lieutenant colonel and his men, save that they burnt some houses, and killed an old man by the lieutenant colonel's orders, and brought away the spoil of the country. And this in its several parts is testified by John Forbes, major in colonel Hill's regiment, Francis Farquhar and Gilbert Kennedy, both lieutenants in that regiment, who were all of the lieutenant colonel's party, as their depositions more fully bear.

It may also be here noticed, that some days after the slaughter of the Glenco men was over there came a person from Cāmpbel of Balcalden, chamberlain, i. e. steward to the E. of Braidalbin, to the deceased Glenco's sons, and offered to them, if they would declare under their hands, that the earl of Braidalbin was free and clear of the said slaughter, they might be assured of the earl's kindness for procuring their remission and restitution, as was plainly deponed before the commissioners.

It remains now to give an account of the warrants, either given or pretended to be given for the committing of the foresaid slaughter; for clearing whereof it is to be noticed, that the king having been pleased to offer by proclamation an indemnity to all the highland rebels, who should come in and accept thereof by taking the oath of allegiance, betwixt and the first of January 1692, after the day was elapsed, it was very proper to give instructions how such of the rebels as had refused his majesty's grace should be treated; and therefore his majesty, by his instructions of the date of the 11th of January 1692, directed to sir Thomas Livingston, and supersigned and countersigned by himself, did indeed order and authorize sir Thomas to march the troops against the rebels, who had not taken the benefit of the indemnity, and to destroy them by fire and sword (which is the actual stile of our commissions against intercommuned rebels) but with this express mitigation in the fourth article, viz. 'That the rebels may not think themselves desperate, we allow you to give terms and quarters, but in this manner only, that chieftains and heritors, or leaders, be prisoners of war, their lives only safe, and all other things in mercy, they taking the oath of allegiance: and the community taking the oath of allegiance, and rendering their arms, and submitting to the government, are to have quarters and indemnity for their lives and fortunes, and to be protected from the soldiers,' as the principal paper of instructions produced by sir Thomas Livingston bears.

After these instructions there were additional ones given by his majesty to sir Thomas Livingston upon the 16th of the said month of January, supersigned and countersigned by his majesty, and the date marked by secretary Stair's hand; which bear orders for giving of passes, and for receiving the submission of certain of the rebels; wherein all to be noticed to the present purpose is, that therein his majesty doth judge it much better that those who took not the benefit of the indemnity in due time, should be obliged to render upon mercy, they still taking the oath of allegiance : and then its added, if Mackean of Glenco and that tribe can be well separated from the rest, it will be a proper vindication of the public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves.* And of these additional instructions, a principal duplicate was sent to sir Thomas Levingston, and another to colonel Hill, and were both produced ; and these were all the instructions given by the king in this matter.

But secretary Stair, who sent down these instructions, as his letters produced, written with his hand to sir Thomas of the same date with them, testify, by a previous letter of the date of the 7th of the said month of January, written and subscribed by him to sir Thomas, says, You know in general that these troops posted at Inverness and Inverlochier will be ordered to take in the house of Innergarie, and to destroy entirely the country of Lochaber, Lochal's lands, Kippochs, Glengaries and Glenco ; and then adds, ' I assure you your power shall be full enough, and I hope the soldiers will not trouble the government with prisoners.† And by another letter of the 9th of the said month of January, which is likewise before the instructions, and written to sir Thomas as the former, he hath this expression, That these who remain of

* This Order is thus given in the Memoirs of the Massacre of Glenco :

" WILLIAM R.

" As for Mac-Jan of Glenco and that tribe, if they can be well distinguished from the rest of the Highlanders, it will be proper, for the vindication of public justice, to extirpate that set of thieves. " W. R."

" This was directed to sir Thomas Levingston and colonel Hill. And the parliament has voted that Levingston or Hill's orders did not exceed these instructions ; nor, indeed, could they ; for what can exceed extirpation !"

† In the Memoirs of the Massacre of Glenco, is given the following Letter from major Duncanson to captain Campbell :

" Sir ; You are hereby ordered to fall upon the rebels, the Mac'Donalds of Glenco, and put all to the sword under seventy. You are to have especial care that the old fox and his sons do upon no account escape your hands. You are to secure all the avenues that no man escape. This you are to put in execution at five o'clock in the morning precisely, and by that time, or very shortly after it, I will strive to be at you with a stronger party ; if I do not come to you at five you are not to tarry for me, but to fall on. This is by the king's special command, for the good and safety of the country, that these miscreants may be cut off, root and branch. See that this be put in execution, without feud or favour, else you may expect to be treated as not true to the king or govern-

THE REBELS, are not able to oppose, and their chieftains being all papists, it is well the vengeance falls there ; for my part I could have wished the Macdonalds had not divided, and I am sorry that Kippoch and Mackean of Glenco are safe. And then afterwards we have an account, that Lochal, Macnoughton, Appin and Glenco took the benefit of the indemnity at Inverary, and Kippoch and others at Inverness. But this letter of the 11th of January, sent with the first instructions to sir Thomas hath this expression, I have no great kindness to Kippoch nor Glenco, and it's well that people are in mercy ; and then just now my lord Argile tells me, that Glenco hath not taken the oath, at which I rejoice ; it is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sect, the worst of the highlands. But in his letter of the 16th of January, of the same date with the additional instructions, though he writes in the first part of the letter, The king does not at all incline to receive any after the diet, but on mercy ; yet he thereafter adds, But for a just example of vengeance, I entreat the thieving tribe of Glenco may be rooted out to purpose. And to confirm his by this letter of the same date, sent with the other principal duplicate, and additional instructions to colonel Hill, after having written that such as render on mercy might be saved, he adds, I shall intreat you that for a just vengeance and public example, the tribe of Glenco may be rooted out to purpose. The earls of Argile and Braidalbin have promised that they shall have no retreat in their bounds, the passes to Ronoch would be secured, and the hazard certified to the laird of Weems to reset them ; in that case Argile's detachment, with a party that may be posted in island Stalker, must cut them off, and the people of Appin are none of the best.

This last letter, with the instructions for colonel Hill, was received by major Forbes in his name at Edinburgh ; and the major deposes, that by the allowance he had from the colonel, he did unseal the packet, and found therein the letter and instructions as above, which he sent forward to colonel Hill : and that in the beginning of February 1692, being in his way to Fort-William, he met some companies of Argile's regiment at Bellishiel's, and was surprised to understand that they were going to quarter in Glenco, but said nothing till he came to Fort-William, where colonel Hill told him that lieutenant-colonel Hamilton had got orders about the affair of Glenco, and that therefore the colonel had left it to lieutenant-colonel Hamilton's management, who, he apprehends, had concerted the matter with major Duncanson. And colonel Hill deposes, that he understood ment, nor a man fit to carry a commission in the king's service. Expecting you will not fail in the fulfilling hereof, as you love yourself, I subscribe these with my hand.

" ROBERT DUNCANSON."

" For their majesties service, to captain Robert Campbell, of Glenlyon."

that lieutenant col. Hamilton and major Duncason got the orders about the Glenco men, which were sent to lieut. col. Hamilton; that for himself he liked not the business, but was very grieved at it; that the king's instructions of the 16th of January 1692, with the master of Stair's letters of the same date, were brought to him by major Forbes, who had opened them, and unsealed the packet at Edinburgh, as these two depositions do bear.

Yet the execution and slaughter of the Glenco men did not immediately take effect, and thereafter on the 30th of the said month of January, the master of Stair doth again write two letters, one to sir Thomas Levingston, which bears, I am glad that Glenco did not come in within the time prefixed; I hope what is done there may be in earnest, since the rest are not in a condition to draw together to help; I think to harry (that is to drive) their cattle, and burn their houses, is but to render them desperate lawless men to rob their neighbours, but I believe you will be satisfied it were a great advantage to the nation, that thieving tribe were rooted out, and cut off; it must be quietly done, otherwise they will make shift for both their men and their cattle; Argyle's detachment lies in Letrickweel to assist the garison to do all of a sudden. And the other to colonel Hill, which bears, Pray when the thing concerning Glenco is resolved, let it be secret and sudden, otherwise the men will shift you, and better not meddle with them than not to do it to purpose, to cut off that nest of robbers, who have fallen in the mercy of the law, now when there's force and opportunity, whereby the king's justice will be as conspicuous and useful as his clemency to others. I apprehend the storm is so great, that for some time you can do little, but so soon as possible I know you will be at work, for these false people will do nothing but as they see you in a condition to do with them.

Sir Thomas Levingston having got the king's instructions, with secretary Stair's letter of the 16th of January, and knowing by a letter he had from the master of Stair of the date of the 7th of January 1692, that lieutenant colonel Hamilton was to be the man employed in the execution of the Glenco men, in pursuance of the secretary's letter, he writes to lieutenant colonel Hamilton upon the 23d of the said month of January, telling him, that it was judged good news that Glenco had not taken the oath of allegiance within the time prefixed; and that secretary Stair in his last letter had made mention of him, and then adds, 'For, Sir, here is a fair occasion for you, to show that your garrison serves for some use; and seeing that the orders are so positive from court to me not to spare any of them that have not timely come in, as you may see by the orders I send to your colonel, I desire you would begin with Glenco, and spare nothing which belongs to him; but do not trouble the government with prisoners;' as this letter produced by lieutenant colonel Hamilton bears.

And sir Thomas being heard upon this letter, declared that at that time he was immediately returned from his journey to London, and that he knew nothing of any soldiers being quartered in Glenco, and only meant that he should be prosecuted as a rebel standing out, by fair hostility: and in this sense he made use of the same words and orders written to him by secretary Stair. Thereafter colonel Hill gives his order to be directed to lieutenant colonel Hamilton, in these terms: 'Sir, you are with 400 of my regiment, and the 400 of my lord Argyle's regiment, under the command of major Duncason, to march straight to Glenco, and there put in due execution the orders you have received from the commander in chief. Given under my hand at Fort William, the 12th day of February, 1692.' And this order is also produced by lieutenant colonel Hamilton.

Then the same day lieutenant colonel Hamilton wrote to major Duncason in these terms: 'Sir, pursuant to the commander in chief and my colonel's orders to me, for putting in execution the service against the rebels of Glenco, wherein you with a party of Argyle's regiment, now under your command, are to be concerned, you are therefore to order your affairs so that you be at the several posts assigned you by seven of the clock to-morrow morning being Saturday, and fall in action with them; at which time I will endeavour to be with the party from this place at the post appointed them. It will be necessary that the avenues minded by lieutenant Campbell on the south side be secured; that the old fox nor none of his cubs get away: the orders are, that none be spared, nor the government troubled with prisoners;' and the copy of this last order is produced under lieutenant colonel Hamilton's own hand, and accordingly the slaughter of Glenco and his poor people did ensue the next morning, being the 13th of February, 1692, in the manner narrated.*

And upon the whole matter, it is the opinion

* The author of the Memoirs of the Massacre of Glenco, says, that he had copies of Dalrymple's nine letters (viz. to col. Hamilton, two dated 1st and 3d December, 1691; to sir Thomas Levingston five, dated 7th, 9th, 11th, 16th, 30th January 1692; and to col. Hill, two dated on the same days with the last two to Levingston) which were produced respecting this massacre; but I do not observe that he states from them any new matter, unless it be the following passages:

"The winter is the only season in which we are sure the Highlanders cannot escape us, nor carry their wives, bairns, and cattle to the mountains."

"It is the only time that they cannot escape you, for human constitutions cannot endure to be long out of houses. This is the proper season to maul them in the cold long nights."

"I expect you will find little resistance but from the season."

"I am confident you will see there are full powers given you in very plain terms, and yet of the commission ; First, That it was a great wrong that Glenco's care and diligence, as to his taking the oath of allegiance, with Ardkinlas's certificate of his taking the oath of allegiance on the 6th of January 1692, and colonel Hill's letter to Ardkinlas, and Ardkinlas's letter to Colin Campbell, sheriff clerk, for clearing Glenco's diligence and innocence, were not presented to the lords of his majesty's privy council, when they were sent into Edinburgh in the said month of January ; and that those who advised the not presenting thereof were in the wrong, and seem to have had a malicious design against Glenco ; and that it was a further wrong that the certificate, as to Glenco's taking the oath of allegiance, was delete and obliterate after it came to Edinburgh ; and that being so obliterate, it should neither have been presented to, or taken in by the clerk of the council, without an express warrant from the council. Secondly, That it appears to have been known at London, and particularly to the master of Stair, in the month of January 1692, that Glenco had taken the oath of allegiance, though after the day prefixed ; for he saith in his letter of the 30th of January to sir Thomas Livingston, as is above remarked, I am glad that Glenco came not in within the time prescribed. Thirdly, that there was nothing in the king's instructions to warrant the committing of the foresaid slaughter, even as to the thing itself, and far less as to the manner of it ; seeing all his instructions do plainly import, that the most obstinate of the rebels might be received into mercy, upon taking the oath of allegiance, though the day was long before elapsed, and that he ordered nothing concerning Glenco and his tribe, but that if they could be well separated from the rest, it would be a proper vindication of the public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves : which plainly intimates that it was his majesty's mind that they could not be separated from the rest of these rebels, unless they still refused his mercy by continuing in arms and refusing the allegiance ; and that even in that case they were only to be proceeded against in the way of public justice, and no other way. Fourthly, That secretary Stair's letters, especially that of the 11th of January 1692, in which he rejoices to hear that Glenco had not taken the oath, and that of the 16th of January, of the same date with the king's additional instructions, and that of the 30th of the same month, were no ways warranted by, but quite exceeded the king's foresaid instructions ; since the said letters, without the method left very much to your own discretion.

"Till we see what is done by the chiefs, it is not time to receive their tenants, or admitting them to take the oaths or hoping for pardon, till they give evidence that they are willing to pay their rents to you, and to take tacks for their former duties. Who will not do so, and were in the rebellion, must feel the dismal consequences of it."

any insinuation of any method to be taken that might well separate the Glenco men from the rest, did, in place of prescribing a vindication of public justice, order them to be cut off and rooted out in earnest, and to purpose, and that suddenly, and secretly, and quietly, and all on a sudden ; which are the express terms of the said letters ; and comparing them and the other letters with what ensued, appear to have been the only warrant and cause of their slaughter, which in effect was a barbarous murder, perpetrated by the persons deposed against. And this is yet farther confirmed by two more of his letters, written to colonel Hill after the slaughter committed, viz. on the 5th of March 1692, wherein, after having said that there was much talk at London, that the Glenco men were murdered in their beds after they had taken the allegiance, he continues, For the last I know nothing of it ; I am sure neither you, nor any body empowered to treat or give indemnity, did give Glenco the oath ; and to take it from any body else after the diet elapsed, did import nothing at all ; all that I regrave is, that any of the sort got away, and there is a necessity to prosecute them to the utmost. And another from the Hague, the last of April 1692, wherein he says, For the people of Glenco, when you do your duty in a thing so necessary to rid the country of thieving, you need not trouble yourself to take the pains to vindicate yourself by shewing all your orders, which are now put in the Paris gazette ; when you do right you need fear nobody ; all that can be said is, that in the execution, it was neither so full nor so fair as might have been. And this their humble opinion the commissioners, with all submission, return and lay before his majesty, in discharge of the foresaid commission.

Sic Subscribitur, TWEDDALE, ANANDALE (now marquiss of Anandale, and president of the privy council.) MURRAY, (now duke of Athol and lord privy seal.) JA. STUART (her majesty's advocate.) ADAM COCKBURN (late lord treasurer deput.) W. HAMILTON (lord Whitelaw, one of the lords of the session.) JA. OGILVIE (now earl of Seafield and lord high chancellor.) A. DRUMMOND.

The Report being agreed on, and signed by the commissioners, several members moved in parliament on the 24th of June, that the said report should be laid before the house.

Upon which his majesty's high commissioner acquainted the parliament, that the report of the commission, for enquiring into the business of Glenco, being laid before his majesty on Thursday last, he would lay the same before them, with the depositions of the witnesses, and other documents relating thereto, for their satisfaction and full information ; and if they thought fit to make any other use of it, he made no doubt it would be with that deference and submission to his majesty's judgment, that becometh so loyal and zealous a parliament, in vindication of the justice and honour of his majesty's government.

Then the report from the commission for inquiring into the slaughter of the Glenco men, was read, with the depositions of the witnesses, the king's instructions, and the master of Stair's letters, for instructing the said report.

After hearing the said report, it was voted, Nemine contradicente, that his majesty's instructions of the 11th and 16th days of January 1692, touching the highland rebels, who did not accept in due time of the benefit of his indemnity, did contain a warrant for mercy to all without exception, who should take the oath of allegiance and come in upon mercy, though the first day of January 1692, prefixed by the proclamation of indemnity, was passed; and that therefore these instructions contained no warrant for the execution of the Glenco men, made in February thereafter. Then the question was stated and voted, If the execution of the Glenco men in February 1692, as it is represented to the parliament, be a murder or not? and carried in the affirmative.

Moved, That since the parliament has found it a murder, it may be inquired into who were the occasion of it, and the persons guilty and committers of it, and in what way and manner they should be prosecuted. And after some debate thereon, the method of the said prosecution was delayed, and resolved, That this House will again take the same under consideration first on Monday next: and the master of Stair's letters were ordered to be put in the clerk's hands, and any members of parliament allowed an inspection thereof.

The inquiry into the persons who were the occasion of the slaughter of the Glenco men was again proponed, and motioned that before any further procedure in that affair, there may be an address sent to his majesty on what is already past. And after some debate thereon, the question stated, proceed further in the inquiry before addressing his majesty, or address upon what is already past without any further procedure? And carried, proceed further before

Thereafter the question stated and voted, if they should first proceed to consider the master of Stair's letters, or the actors of the murder of Glenco men? and carried; First to consider the master of Stair's letters.

Then the master of Stair's letters, with the king's instructions to sir Thomas Livingstone and col. Hill, and the 4th article of the opinion of the commission relating to the master of Stair, was read; and after some debate the question was stated, whether the master of Stair's letters do exceed the king's commission, towards the killing and destroying the Glenco men, or not? And carried in the affirmative.

June 28, 1695.

The president of parliament represented, That there was a print dispersed, intitled, 'Information for the Master of Stair,' reflecting upon the commission for inquiring into the slaughter of the Glenco-men, and arraigning a vote of parliament: and therefore moved, That it may be inquired who was the author of it, and that both he and the said print may be censured. Mr. Hugh Dalrimple, brother to the master of Stair, and a member of parliament, acknowledged himself to be the author, and gave an account of his mistakes, protesting that he therein intended no reflection on the commission, and that the paper was written before the vote past in parliament, though printed and spread thereafter.

Resolved, That first the author and then the print be censured. And Mr. Hugh was ordered to ask his grace and the parliament pardon; which he did, again declaring, that what was offensive in that paper had happened through mistake.

Thereafter agreed that the said print was false and calumnious. And the question being stated, If the print spread abroad amongst the members of parliament, intitled, 'Information for the Master of Stair,' ought to be condemned as false and calumnious, and therefore burnt, or only that the print should be so marked in the minutes of parliament; it carried, That the print should be marked in the minutes of parliament to be false and calumnious.

Then the parliament proceeded farther in the inquiry of the slaughter of the Glenco-men. And in the first place, as to the orders given by sir Thomas Livingstone, in two of his letters directed to lieutenant colonel Hamilton: and the said letters being read, after debate thereon it was put to the vote, proceed or delay, and carried proceed.

Then the question was stated, Whether sir Thomas Livingstone had reason to give such orders as were contained in these letters, or not? and was carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente.

July 8, 1695.

The parliament having resumed the inquiry into the slaughter of the Glenco-men, and who were the actors; and in the first place about lieutenant colonel Hamilton, and that part of the report of the commission relating to him, and the orders he got, and the orders he said he gave, with the depositions taken before the said commission: and after some debate thereon, the question was stated and put to the vote; if from what appears to the parliament, lieutenant Hamilton be free from the murder of the Glenco-men, and whether there be ground to prosecute him for the same, or not? and carried, he was not clear, and that there was ground to prosecute him.

Then the question was stated and voted as to major Duncanson, at present in Flanders, if the king should be addressed, either to cause him to be examined there about the orders he received, and his knowledge of that matter; or that he be ordered home to be prosecuted therefore, as his majesty shall think fit, or no? and carried in the affirmative.

Then that part of the report of the commission, as to Glenlyon, captain Drummond, lieutenant or adjutant Lindsay, ensign Lundy, and serjeant Darber, read with the depositions of the witnesses against them; and the question stated and voted, If it appeared, that the said persons were the actors of the murder of the Glenco-men under trust; and that his majesty be addressed to send them home to be prosecuted for the same according to law, or not? And carried in the affirmative.

Therefore voted, If it should be remitted to the committee for the security of the kingdom to draw this address, or a new committee elected for drawing thereof? and carried remit.

The report from the committee for security of the kingdom in favours of the Glenco-men, read and remitted to the said committee; that there be a particular recommendation of the petitioner's case to his majesty brought in by the said committee.

July 10, 1695.

The Address about the slaughter of the Glenco-men to be sent to the king, read, with several of the master of Stair's letters to sir Thomas Levingston and colonel Hill: and after some debate upon the paragraph touching the master of Stair, it was voted, approve the paragraph as brought in from the committee, or as offered with amendments: it carried, approve as brought in from the committee. Thereafter the whole Address was put to the vote, and approved as follows:

The ADDRESS of the Noblemen, Barons and Burroughs in Parliament, humbly presented to his most Sacred Majesty upon the Discovery communicate to them, touching the Murder of the Glenco-men in February, 1692,

"We your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the noblemen, barons and burroughs assembled in parliament, do humbly represent to your majesty that in the beginning of this session, we thought it our duty, for the more solemn and public vindication of the honour and justice of the government, to inquire into the barbarous slaughter committed in Glenco, Feb. 1692, which hath made so much noise, both in this kingdom and your majesty's other dominions: but we being informed by your majesty's commissioner, that we were prevented in this matter by a commission under the great seal for the same purpose, we did upon reading the said commission, unanimously acquiesce to your majesty's pleasure, and returned our humble acknowledgments for your royal care in granting the same; and we only desired that the discoveries to be made should be communicated to us, to the end that we might add our zeal to your majesty's for prosecuting such discoveries; and that in so national a concern, the vindication might be also public as the reproach and scandal had been; and principally that we, for whom it was most proper, might testify to the world how clear your majesty's justice is in all this matter.

"And now your majesty's commissioner, upon our repeated instances, communicated to us a copy of the report transmitted by the commission to your majesty, with your majesty's instructions, the master of Stair's letters, the orders given by the officers, and the depositions of the witnesses, relating to that report; and the same being read and compared, we could not but unanimously declare, that your majesty's instructions of the 7th and 10th of January 1692, touching the highlanders who had not accepted in due time of the benefit of the indemnity, did contain a warrant for mercy to all without exception, who should offer to take the oath of allegiance, and come in upon mercy, though the 1st of January 1692, prefixed by the proclamation of indemnity was past; and that these instructions contain no warrant for the execution of the Glenco-men made in February thereafter. And here we cannot but acknowledge your majesty's signal clemency upon this occasion, as well as in the whole tract of your government over us; for had your majesty, without new offers of mercy, given positive orders for the executing the law upon the highlanders, that had already despised your repeated indemnities, they had but met with what they justly deserved.

"But it being your majesty's mind, according to your usual clemency, still to offer them mercy; and the killing of the Glenco men being upon that account unwarrantable, as well as the manner of doing it being barbarous and inhuman, we proceeded to vote the killing of them a murder, and to inquire who had given occasion to it, and were the actors in it.

"We found in the first place that the master of Stair his letters had exceeded your majesty's instructions towards the killing and destruction of the Glenco-men: this appeared by the comparing the instructions and letters, whereof the just attested duplicates are herewith transmitted; in which letters the Glenco-men are over and again distinguished from the rest of the highlanders, not as the fittest subject of severity, in case they continued obstinate, and made severity necessary according to the meaning of the instructions; but as then absolutely and positively ordered to be destroyed, without any further consideration, than that of their not having taken the indemnity in due time; and their not having taken it, is valued as a happy incident, since it afforded an opportunity to destroy them; and the destroying of them is urged with a great deal of zeal, as a thing acceptable and of public use; and this zeal is extended even to the giving of directions about the manner of cutting them off; from all which it is plain, that though the instructions be for mercy to assist all that will submit, though the day of indemnity was elapsed, yet the letters do exclude the Glenco-men from this mercy.

"In the next place we examined the orders given by sir Thomas Levingston in this matter, and were unanimously of opinion that he had reason to give such orders for cutting off the Glenco-men, upon the supposition that they had rejected the indemnity, and without making them new offers of mercy, being a thing in itself lawful, which your majesty might have ordered; but it appearing that sir Thomas was then ignorant of the peculiar circumstances of the Glenco-men, he might very well understand your majesty's instructions in the restricted sense which the master of Stair's letters had given them, or understand the master of Stair's letters to be your majesty's additional pleasure, as it is evident he did by the orders which he gave, where any addition that is to be found in them to your majesty's instructions, is given not only in the master of Stair's sense, but in his words.

"We proceeded to examine colonel Hill's part of the business, and were unanimous that he was clear and free of the slaughter of the Glenco-men; for though your majesty's instructions, and the master of Stair's letters were sent straight from London to him, as well as to sir Thomas Livingston, yet he knowing the peculiar circumstances of the Glenco-men shunned to execute them, and gave no orders in the matter, till such time as knowing that his lieutenant-colonel had received orders to take with him 400 men of his garrison and regiment, he, to save his own honour and authority, gave a general order to Hamilton, his lieutenant-colonel, to take the 400 men, and to put in due execution the orders which others had given him.

"Lieutenant-colonel Hamilton's part came next to be considered, and he being required to be present, and called, and not appearing, we ordered him to be denounced, and to be seized on wherever he could be found; and having considered the orders that he received, and the orders which he said before the commission he gave, and his share in the execution, we agreed that from what appeared, he was not clear of the murder of the Glenco-men, and that there was ground to prosecute him for it.

"Major Duncanson, who received orders from Hamilton, being in Flanders, as well as those to whom he gave orders, we could not see these orders; and therefore we only resolved about him, that we should address to your majesty, either to cause him be examined there in Flanders about the orders he received, and his knowledge of that affair, or to order him home to be prosecuted therefore, as your majesty shall think fit.

"In the last place, the depositions of the witnesses being clear, as to the share which capt. Campbell of Glenlyon, capt. Drummond, lieutenant Lindsey, ensign Lundie, and sergeant Barber had in the execution of the Glenco-men, upon whom they were quartered; we agree that it appeared that the said persons were the actors in the slaughter of the Glenco-men under trust, and that we should address your majesty to send them home to be prosecuted for the same according to law.

"This being the state of that whole matter as it lies before us, and which, together with the report transmitted to your majesty by the commissioner (and which we saw verified) gives full light to it; we humbly beg that considering that the master of Stair's excess in his letters against the Glenco-men has been the original cause of this unhappy business, and hath given occasion in a great measure to so extraordinary an execution, by the warm directions he gives about doing it by way of surprize; and considering the high station and trust he is in, and that he is absent, we do therefore beg that your majesty will give such orders about him for vindication of your government, as you in your royal wisdom shall think fit.

"And likewise considering that the actors have barbarously killed men under trust, we humbly desire your majesty would be pleased to send the actors home, and to give orders to your advocate to prosecute them according to law; there remaining nothing else to be done for the full vindication of your government of so foul and scandalous an aspersion as it has lain under upon this occasion.

"We shall only add, that the remains of the Glenco-men, who escaped the slaughter, being reduced to great poverty by the depredation and vastation that was then committed upon them, and having ever since lived peaceably under your majesty's protection, have now applied to us that we might intercede with your majesty, that some reparation may be made them for their losses. We do humbly lay their case before your majesty, as worthy of your royal charity and compassion, that such orders may be given for supplying them in their necessities, as your majesty shall think fit.

"And this the most humble Address of the estates of parliament is, by their order and warrant, and in their name, subscribed by, may it please your majesty, your majesty's most humble, most obedient, and most faithful subject and servant,

"ANNANDALE, P. P."
"July 10, 1695. This Address voted and approved."

Then it was recommended to his majesty's commissioner, to transmit to the king the said address, with duplicates of the king's instructions, and of the master of Stair's letters.

Moved, That his majesty's commissioner have the thanks of the parliament for laying the discovery made of the matter of Glenco before them, and that the commissioners have the like for their careful procedure therein; which being put to the vote, approve, or not, carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente; which his majesty's commissioner accepted of.

Thomas Aikenhead,† sone to the deceast
James Aikenhead, chirurgion, in Edinburgh, prisoner in the Tolbooth thereof.

YOU are indyted and accused, att the instance of sir James Stewart, his majesties advocat for his highnes interest, and by special order of the lords of his majesties privy councill, that where by the laws of God, and by the

* These MSS. for the use of which I am indebted to his lordship, appear to have belonged chancellor King.

† "No counsel appeared for the prisoner; nor does it seem that one word was urged in his behalf during the course of the trial. Four or five witnesses were examined, one of them a writer in Edinburgh, the rest students at the University, lads from eighteen to twenty, or twenty-one years of age. They proved most of the articles of the libel, with this addition, that the prisoner said he was confident Christianity would be utterly extirpated by the year 1800. There was however a material defect in the evidence. The article most highly criminal, viz. the railing against God, and cursing our Saviour, was not proved at all, but was an inference drawn by the jury from the prisoner's cursing Ezra, and saying that the inventors of the scriptural doctrines would be damned, if there be such a thing as damnation.

"The jury unanimously found the prisoner guilty of railing against God, railing at and cursing Christ, and of the whole other articles in the libel. This verdict the jury, even by the statute, were not warranted to pronounce.—The railing against God, and cursing Christ, ought to have been facts directly proved, and not inferences drawn from cursing the inventors of scriptural doctrines; and as for denying any of the persons of the Holy Trinity, it was not the denial, but obstinately persisting lawes of this and all other well-governed Christian realmes, the cryme of blasphemy against God, or any of the persons of the blessed Trinity, or against the holy Scriptures, or our holy religione, is a cryme of the highest nature, and ought to be severely punished:

Lykeas by the act of parliament, first parla-ment Charles 2d, act 21, Intituled, act against the cryme of blasphemie, it is statute and ordained, that whosoever not being distracted in his witts shall rail upon or curse God, or any of the persons of the blessed Trinity, shall be processed before the cheife justice, and being found guilty, shall be punished with death; and by 11th act, 5 session of the present current parliament, the fersaid act is not only ratified, but it is farder statute, that whosoever shall in their wryteing or discourse denye, impugne or quarrell, or argue, or reason against the being of God, or any of the persons of the blessed Trinity, or the authority of the holy Scriptures, of the Old and New Testaments, or therein, which by the statute subjected the offender to a capital punishment.

"Besides these defences, had the court been endued with the humanity to appoint counsel for the prisoner, it would undoubtedly have been pled for him, that these were rash words, drawn from him in the heat of controversy, which by no means coincided with his serious notions; and that he heartily repented of the warmth which betrayed him into expressions so dissonant from his own sentiments, and so offensive to the feelings of others.—Had these defences been offered for him, the jury could not, without being guilty of perjury, have convicted him of obstinately persisting to deny the Trinity, which the statute required." Arnot, 326.

According to Arnot the following passage in Fountainhall relates to the father of this Thomas Aikenhead:

"April 20. James Aikenhead apothecary in Edinburgh is pursued before the privy council, for selling poisonous and amorous drugs and philters to provoke lust, whereby a woman had narrowly escaped with her life, had not doctor Irvine given her an antidote. The council referred the trial and report thereof to the college of physicians, as being periti in arte; who thought such medicaments not safe to be given without first taking their own advice."

Of the case of this man, (miscalled Aiken)
there is a short report in MacLaurin.

the Providence of God in the government of the world, shall for the first fault be punished with imprisonment, ay, and while he give public satisfaction in sackcloth to the congregation within which the scandal is committed; and for the second fault be fynyed, besides his being imprisoned as above, and for the third should be punished with death, as an obstinate blasphemer: Nevertheless it is of verity, that you, Thomas Aikenhead, shaking off all fear of God, and regarding to his majesties lawes, have now for more than a twelvemonth by past, and upon severall of the dayes within the said space, and one or other of the same, made it as if were your endeavour and work in severall companies to vent your wicked blasphemies against God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, and against the holy Scriptures, and all revealed religion: in soe far as upon one or other of the dayes forsaid, you said and affirmed, that divinity or the doctrine of theologie was a rapside of faigned and ill-invented nonsense, patched up partly of the morall doctrine of philosophers, and partly of poetical fictions and extravagant chimeras, or words to this effect or purpose, with severall other such reproachfull expressions; Lykeas you scoffed at, and endeavoured to ridicule the holy scriptures, calling the Old Testament Ezra's fables, by a profane allusion to Esop's fables, and saying that Ezra was the inventer thereof, and that being a cunning man he drew a number of Babylonian slaves to follow him, for whom he made up a feigned genealogie as if they had been descended of kings and princes in the land of Canaan, and thereby imposed upon Cyrus who was a Persian and stranger, persuading him by the devyce of a pretendit prophecy concerning himself; and as for the New Testament, you not only scoff at it, but in your scoffing did most blasphemously rail upon our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, calling the said New Testament the History of the Impostor Christ, and affirming him to have learned magick in Egypt, and that coming from Egypt into Judea, he picked up a few ignorant blockish fisher fellows, whom he knew by his skill and phisognomie, had strong imaginations, and that by the help of exalted imagination he play'd his pranks as you blasphemously terme the working of his miracles: Lykeas you affirmed Moses, if ever you say ther was such a man, to have also learned magick in Egypt, but that he was both the better arteist and better politician than Jesus; as also you have cursed Ezra, Moses, and Jesus, and all men of that sort, affirming the holy Scriptures to be so stuffed with madness, nonsense, and contradictions, that you admired the stupidity of the world in being soe long deluded by them: Lykeas you reject the mystery of the blessed Trinity, and say it is not worth any man's reflection, and you also scoffe at the mystery of the incarnation of Jesus Christ, affirming blasphemously that Theantropos is as great a contradictione as Hircus Cervus, or a quadratum to be a retundum; and as to the doctrine of redemption by Jesus, you say it is a proud and presumptuous devyce, and that the inventars therof are damned, if after this life ther be either reward or punishment; you also deny spirits, saying that the notion of a spirit is a contradiction, and you have maintained that God, the world, and nature, are but one thing, and that the world was from eternity; and you assert that man's imagination duely exalted by airt and industry can do any thing, even in the infinite power of God: you have lykwayes in discourse preferred Mahomet to the blessed Jesus, and you have said that you hoped to see Christianity greatly weakened, and that you are confident that in a short tyme it will be utterly extirpat, and you have been so bold in your forsaid blasphemies, that when you have found yourself cold, you have wished to be in the place that Ezra calls Hell, to warme yourself there: and these blasphemous railings and expressions in the words above sett down, or words to the like purpose, you have wickedly uttered in severall companies without the least provocation, but merely prompted by your irreligious and devilish malice against God and our blessed Saviour, and the most concerning truths of the holy Christian religion. By all which, it is manifest, that you are guilty airt and part of horrid blasphemy, railing against and cursing our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and impugning and denying the truth of the holy Scriptures, and the quarrelling and argueing against the being of God and against his providence in making and governing the world, which being found by the verdict of an Assize, you ought to be punished by death, and the confiscation of your moveables, to the example and terror of others to commit the lyke in tyme coming.

Pursuer—Sir James Stewart, his Majesties Advocate.

My Lord Advocate produced an act of council for pursuing the pannal, wherof the tenor follows:

Act and Remitt of Council for pursuing Thomas Aikenhead before the Lords of Justiciary for Blasphemy, &c.

EDINBURGH, November 10, 1696.

The lybell at the instance of sir James Stewart, his majesty's advocate, against Thomas Aikenhead, sone to the deceased James Aikenhead, apothecary, for Blasphemy, being this day called in presence of the lords of his majesty's privy council, and the lord advocate and sir Patrick Hume his majesties solicitor, comparing personally for his majesty's interest; and the defender comparing also personally, the lybell and answers thereto being read, the said lords of his majesty's privy council have remitted and hereby remits the said Thomas Aikenhead defender to be pursued before the lords commissioners of his majestie's justiciary for the said crimes of Blasphemy, and appoints the said lord advocate to intent and prosecute the said process against the said Thomas Aikenhead for his lyfe: extracted by me.

* So in the Record.

† It appears that Aikenhead before his trial endeavoured by the following Petition and Retraction, to prevail upon the Court of Justiciary to desert the diet against him:

Unto the right honourable the Lord Justice General, Justice Clerk, and remanent Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Justiciary. The Supplication of Thomas Aikenhead, now prisoner in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh.

"Humbly Sheweth; That your petitioner being indicted and cited to appear before your lordships to underly the law for the crimes contained in the criminall indictment raised against me, and which crimes therein contained are so odious and abominable in themselves, that I do not only from my very heart abhorre and detest them, but I do tremble and abhorre either to repeat the samen myself, or to hear the samen repeated and objected against any person born of Christian parents. And therefore your petitioner doth with all humility and ingenuity represent to your lordships, that he doth ingenuously acknowledge it to be his greatest happiness that he was born and educat in a place where the gospel was professed and so powerfully and plentifully preached, upon a true improvement of which benefite he doth truly believe the salvation of his immortall soul doth intirely depend. (2.) I do firmly believe the immortality of the soul, and that ther shall be a resurrection of my body at the last day, at which time they shall be again united; and thereafter either made eternally happy in heaven, or otherwise condemned in everlasting and endless torments. (3.) I do firmly own and believe in the unity and Trinity of the Godhead, and that ther is no salvation to be expected otherwise than by the blood and merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and by a firm believing and relying upon the samen. (4.) I do also profess and ingenuously believe the scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be canonical, and written and dictated by holy men inspired by the Holy Ghost, and to be of divine authority and set down as a rule for our obedience and faith, and by believing whereof a happy immortality may be obtained, and no otherways. And I do also believe, and assent to the whole other principles of our holy Protestant religion, such as the celebration of baptism and the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, as truly institute and ordained by our blessed Saviour, and thereafter practised by his holy Apostles and their successors to this very hour, and that the said sacraments are to this moment celebrated with the greatest purity in our reformed Protestant churches in Britain and Ireland.

"All which premises I do not only own and acknowledge to be the true grounds of my own faith and beleif. but that I am obliged, to own and maintain the samen albeit with the hazard and loss of my life and all things earthly, and I do believe, own, and acknowledge the hail heads of our reformed religion, contained in our confession of faith as approved by act of parliament. And I firmly believe that in case I should hapen to depart from a true belief of the premises or any part thereof, the just punishment due therefore could be no less than the eternall ruine and tormenting of my body and immortall soul in hell for ever, as is threatned by our blessed Lord and Saviour in his holy Evangells.

"This being premised, it is furder represented to your lordships, that denying the hail articles of the indictment raised against me as they are lybelled, so whatever expressions might have escaped me relating to any of the articles in the said indictment, the samen was uttered or expressed by me not as my own privat sentiments and opinions, but were repeated by me as sentiments and opinions of some atheistical writers whose names I can particularly condescend upon, and whose books I did receive from who is not only insert in the list of the witnesses to be adduced against me, but was the cheif and principall instrument who constantly made it his work to interrogat me auent my reading of the said atheistical principles and arguments therein contained, and of which I am now very sensible and heartily sorry for: and am convinced that these books are most villanous and atheistical, and ought neither to be printed nor exposed to public view; but I absolutely deny that ever the expressions contained in the indictment were uttered by me in the terms lybelled, at least that ever they were spoken by me as my own privat opinions or sentiments, but that whatever expressions I had relating to what is lybelled, were only expressed by me as the arguments, set down in the said atheistical books, which had unhappily him say that Ezra being a cunning man, he drew a number of Babylonian slaves to follow

And that our Saviour was a magician, and did all his miracles by his imaginatione, and the lyke could be done by naturall causes, and that he choysed twelve fishers that were ignorant, whom he knew to have strong imaginationes by which he wrought his wonders; depons that he heard him call Moses ane magitian, and that Mahamet was both the better airtist and polititian than Jesus; and he heard him curse Ezra, and has heard him say that as many pages as was in the Scriptures ther was as many contradictions in it; and heard him say that the Trinity of the persons was a great contradiction, and lykways that the incarnation was as great a contradictione as Hircus-Cervus, and that the authors and propagators of the doctrine of Redemptione by Jesus, was the damnedst crew in the world, and that they would have the most perplexed thoughts of any for ever; and has heard him affirme that God, the world, and nature, are but one thing, and that the world was from eternity; and also heard him assert, that man's imaginatione duely exalted by airt and industry could doe any thing, even in the infinite power of God, and that he hoped to see Christianity greatly weakened, and that he was confident that in the year 1800 it would be utterly extirpat; depones, that about the middle of August last, about eight o'clock at night, going by the Tropic kirk, he hard him (being cold) say that he wished to be in the place Ezra called Indyted and accused for the cryme of blasphemy committed be him in manner mentioned in his indytement.

The said day the persons who past upon the assyse of Thomas Aikenhead, for blasphemy, returned their verdict in presence of the said lords, wherof the tenor follows.

The Assyse having elected and chosen George Clerk, late baillie, their chancellor; and Adam Brown, their clerk, doe unanimously find it proven that the pannall, Thomas Aikenhead has railled against the first persone, and also cursed and railled our blessed Lord the second persone of the holy Trinity, and farther finds the other crymes lybelled proven, viz. The denying of the incarnatione of our Saviour, the holy Trinity, and scoffing at the holy Scriptures. This is subscribed by the chancellor and clerk at the appoyntment of the above written assysers, at Edinburgh, the 23rd day of December, 1696 years.

Sic Subscribitur, GEO. CLERK, Chancellor.
ADAM BROWN, Clerk.

After opening and reading of the quhilk verdict of Assyse, the lords justice clerk, and commissioners of judiciary theifor, by the mouth of John Ritchie, dempster of court, decerne and adjudge the said Thomas Aikenhead, to be taken to the Galowlee betwixt Leith and Edinburgh, upon Friday the eight day of January next to come, betwixt two and four a clock in the afternoon, and there to be hanged on a gibbet till he dead, and his body to be interred at the foot of the said gallows, and ordaines all his moveable goods and gear to be escheat and inbrought to his majesty's use, which is pronounced for doom.

Among lord King's MSS. is the following Paper indorsed: "Copy Petition for Thomas Aikenhead, to the Privy Council,"

To the Right Hon. the Lord High Chancellor, and remanent Lords of his Majesties most Hon. Privy Council: The Supplication of Thomas Aikenhead, prisoner in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh.

"Humbly Sheweth; That your petitioner being sentenced by the lords of judiciary, to be executed upon the 8th day of January next, he doth in all humility acknowledge the justice of the said sentence, pronounced against him; and that the blasphemous and wicked expressions, for which he is sentenced to death, ought not to be so much as named, and he doth ingenuously acknowledge, that from his very soul he perfectly abhors the same, but your petitioner being as yet a minor, and having the misfortune to have got some atheistical books belonging to others in his custody, the reading whereof did prompt him to these extravagances for which he is now most justly sentenced. And seeing it hath pleased Almighty, God, to begin so far in his mercy, to work upon your petitioner's oldured heart, as to give him some sense and conviction of his former wicked errors, and that he doth expect through the mercies of our blessed Jesus to be dayly more and more convinced thereof, and that he doth intirely rely upon our blessed Saviour's death and merits for the salvation of his immortall soul, and that if time were allowed, he doth expect through the merits of Jesus, by a true remorse and repentance, to be yet reconciled to his offended God and Saviour.

"May it therefore pleas your lo'ps, for God's sake to consider and compassionate my deplorable circumstances, and tender years (I being as yet minor), and to prorogat the day appointed for my execution, for such time as your lo'ps shall think fitt, that I may have the opportunity of conversing with godly ministers in the place, and by their assistance be more prepared for an eternal rest. And for his sacred majesty and your lo'ps happiness and welfare, your petitioner shall ever pray, &c."

The following Letter, (among the same MSS.) containing Observations on Aikenhead's Case, appears to have been written by Mr. Locke to his friend sir Francis Masham

"London, Feb. 27, 1696-7.

"Sir;

"You have enclosed (to satisfy your curiosity) the evidence against Aikenhead, and two of his petitions. If the process come, you shall have it, or it shall be left where you shall order. The Flying Post bore that he had not retracted till the day of execution, which you see is false.

"The first act of parliament in Scotland against blasphemy is act 21 parl. 1, sess. 1, Ch. 2d, anno 1661, which has two articles. By the first 'Railing upon, or cursing God, or any of the persons of the Trinity is punishable with death,' these are the words, and here retracting availeth nothing. The next article in that 'Denying God, or any of the persons of the Trinity, and obstinately continuing therein, is punishable with death.'

"The next act is the 11th of Tweeddale's session of parliament, two years ago, and was obtained by trick and surprise. It ratifies the former act, and adds, that 'Whether by writing or discourse, to deny, impugne, querrell, argue, or reason against the being of God, or any of the persons of the Trinity, or the authority of the scriptures, or a providence, is for the first fault punishable with imprisonment, till they retract in sackcloth in the church, for the second, with imprisonment, and a year's rent till as in the first case, and for the third, they are to die as obstinate blasphemers.' So that retracting after the third fault signifies nothing.

"It is plain Aikenhead must have died by the first act, since it was his first fault, as he himself pleads in his petition, and that he did retract, which delivers him from the second article of the first act. Now the words of the first article being 'railing' and 'cursing,' no evidence except that of Mr. Mungo Craig's (in which he is said to have called Christ an imposture) seems to answer the meaning of those words, and as to this Craig, Aikenhead in his speech, in which he owns other things, denies his evidence, and no doubt he is the decoy who gave him the books and made him speak as he did, and whose name is not put in the copy of the petition to the judiciary sent to you, because the writer would spare Craig.

"The age of the witnesses is observable, and that none of them pretend, nor is it laid in the indictment, that Aikenhead made it his business to seduce any man. Laws long in desuetude should be gently put in execution, and the first example made of one in circumstances that deserve no compassion, whereas here there is youth, levity, docility, and no design upon others. Farewell.

"My respects to my lady Masham."

"Aden, Jan. 26, —97~

"Sir;

"I hope you will pardon me that I have not writ to you these several posts, for I have been kept more busie than ordinar, by the frequent meeting of exchequer, upon the falling short of the funds. I thank you heartely for the trouble you have put yourself to, in giving me account of what cannot be known by publick newes. I am afraid it will look like too much imposing upon your good nature to desire a continuance of it, especially when I can proppon no compensation, this being a place scarcely known abroad, and in publick transactions following always the fate of England, but for my part, I would contribute to be at the expense with all my heart for a plenipotentiary at the treaty of peace for this nation; indeed, the fittest person I know, would be your friend Mr. Jonstoun, I wish it had been moved last parliament. To divert you with some remarkable things fallen out of late, it is confidently asserted here, that the river of Clyd went dry for 14 miles, so that children went over it, which ran with a most impetuous current immediately before; I do think this must have fallen out by some chasm in the earth, into which the river hath run into some subterraneous vacuity, till which time that was filled up it could not return to its former course, I am told it was once so before. I doubt not you have heard of a gentleman's daughter in the west, who I think is possessed with a devil, and continues so still, she is 12 years of age, her body is put into strange shapes, and instantly perfectly well: she vomits hot coals, stons, iron, hair, bones, &c. Sometime ago, I sent up an exact account of this, attested by ministers to my Ld. Tullibardden, which you may call for if you please: we had lately an anomaly, and monster of nature I may call him, who was execut for cursing and reviling the persons of the Trinity, he was 18 years of age, not vicious, and extremely studious. Fountonehall and I went to him in prison, and I found a work on his spirit, and wept that ever he should maintained such tenets, and desired a short reprieve, for his eternal state depended upon it; I plead for him in counsel, and brought it to the chancery vote, it was told it could not be granted unless the ministers would interced, I am not for consulting the church in state affairs, I do think he would have proven an eminent christian had he lived, but the ministers out of a pious tho I think ignorant zeal spok and preached for cutting him off. I had capital punishments inflicted most against crimes, that disturb the society and government, and not against the heinousness of the sin against God, for layvers say 'Satis est Deum labere ultorem;' and so stealing a sheep when one is hungry, or speaking against the K. or punish'd by death, whereas cursing, lying, slandering, drunkenness, &c. are scarcely taken notice of by our law, but our ministers generally are of a narrow sett of thoughts and confined principles and not able to bear things of this nature. I have sent you inclosed his speech. I am on all occasions, Sir,

"Your most humble servant."

The following two articles among the same MSS. are written continuously, and indorsed, "Aikenhead's Speech, and his Letter to his Friends, 1697:"

Thomas Aikenhead's Paper.

[The words betwixt crotchets are added to make the sense clear.]

Christian People;

Verity or truth, generally in all things is a quality most appetable, but especially in matters of great consequence, where fancy can not have place; for where it can have way, it doth not much concern whether the thing be real in itself or not. Hence it is a principle innate and co-natural to every man to have an insatiable inclination to truth, and to seek for it as for hid treasure, which indeed had its effect upon me, and my reason therein so mastered me, that I was forced of necessity to reject the authorities and testimonys, both of my parents and others, instilled into me. So that I went further, and examined the point more reasonably, that I might build my faith upon uncontrovertible grounds, and so I proceeded until that the more I thought thereon, the further I was from finding the verity I desired; so that after much ponderings I found my education altogether wrong, not only because it was impossible for me or any that I conversed with, to produce any grounds really sufficient to confirm the same; but with the greatest facility sufficient ground could be produced for the contrair. And this I profess and declare, was the only cause, that made me assert the things, that I asserted, and deny the things that I denied. And tho' for the most part such persons [scepticks] are stained, and charged with some great and numerous villanys, and immoralities, which that they may have free liberty to act, without any trouble within or without them, causes them to apostatise or not conform, and to attempt to prove the matter [of religion] vain. But I can charge the world, if they can stain me, or lay any such thing to my charge, so that it was out of a pure love to truth, and my own happiness [that I acted.] And this I proposed to myself, when I was very young, as I remember, about ten years of age, I have been ever, according to my capacity, searching good and sufficient grounds whereon I might safely build my faith, which at first I received, gratis dictum; So that after my general doubting, the first thing or head that I fell to work with was, whether or not man was capable of offending Ens entrum, or of any immorality as the thing which must be the basis (next to the existence of God) in such matters. Which after much and serious reasonings, and ponderings, [upon] I concluded [for] the negative. For I thought first, that a great part of morality (if not all) proceeded 'ex vitio hominum,' as that of kingdoms, commonwealths, or what the most part of men think convenient for such and such ends and purposes, which doth only conclude for such ends, and these ends are always terminal upon being 'nature' congruous. Now we see, that according to men's fancy, things are congruous or incongruous to their natures, if not to the body, yet to the thinking faculty. We also do not know what is good, or what is evil in itself, if not thus. Whatsoever can be attributed to God, that is good, and what not is evil. And we know not what can be attributed to God, but [by affirming of him] these things [that] by such a deduction [as I have mentioned,] we call perfect, and by denying of him, these things we call imperfect that way; and so we most ignorantly commit a circle. Now we can have no other notion of things, in themselves, good or evil. And as for moral good or evil, all will confess that any thing may be morally evil, and any [thing morally] good also, and consequently any thing [may be] decent or indecent, moral or immoral. Nay, tho' there were things evil in themselves, (if we do not apprehend some other thing in stead of them) we can have no inclination to them, otherwise they will could wish evil as evil, and if the fancy apprehend any other thing than the evil, it is only the 'ratio sub qua,' that is appetite [that is if we desire a real evil, it is under the notion of good].

But I thought it yet more strange, that even out of the supposition of a natural law, neither by revelation, nor any other way, than by the mercy of God, (as we are taught by reason and the light of nature,) would men be pardoned of God, for their immoralities. For 1st. if God did not pardon men's sins, there would be no use of his mercies, and certainly if God have mercy (as undoubtedly he has) and if it be infinite, he must of necessity pardon (as the least of its operations) the greatest sins that the highest dependent being can be capable of. And it must not be said, that this overthrows justice, for that is most false, seeing that mercy presupposes justice, and the sentence to be given, and then it steps in and satisfies justice. But if you will have these two inconsistent, you must rather say, that God hath not mercy in all things.

But then if mercy do but little help, we can say that God will not destroy and damn one, that from his heart loves him, prayeth to him, and praiseth him, and doth other acts of natural religion; for thus it would follow that in hell, there were prayers, praises, and the love of God, and such like, yea and that the creature had more love to the creator, than the creator hath to the creature. All which [consequences] are most absurd. And it is impossible for any intelligent being not to love God, seeing that he is with his most appetable attributes, 'ipsissimum bonum.' So then it would follow, that men could be saved and enjoy God by the natural law, otherwise the world were almost damned, and even of those who embrace revelation, very few obey it. And [it would follow too], that there were no need of revelation, or of any other way of salvation, especially such a way as christianism; for God would not do so great a work without necessity, neither can revelation and providence consist, for if there be a generall providence, revelation would be but an effect of providence, (and that ordinary) seeing that every act of providence, as providence, is alike divine, and so no revelation.

• There was another great point which I was in doubt of, to wit that of the Trinity, where I thought that the common distinction of a seeming contradiction could not have place; seeing that 'quicquid est in Deo, est Deus ipse.' I thought nothing more clear than that if 'Paternitas filiationis,' and 'Magis-pneumatos,' be included in the essence of God, it would overthrow the simplicity of the same if they be really distinct among themselves, and that 'paternitas' be not 'filiatio Hagio-pneumatos,' and so the Trinity should differ nothing from the polytheism of the Gentiles, by making three distinct infinities. And many times have I pryed as far as my capacity would follow me, to try that if it were true, how far I could reach in the knowledge of such a thing, but I found always that the more I thought [on it] the further I was from it.

Now these things I have puzzled and vexed myself in, and all that I could learn therefrom, is, that I cannot have such certainty, either in natural or supernatural things as I would have. And so I desire all men, especially ingenious young men, to beware and take notice of these things upon which I have splitted. I declare my abhorrence and detest of any of my failings or offences concerning the forsaid, and its my earnest and only desire and prayer to God for his mercies sake in the name of Jesus Christ, (which way I only expect pardon of my sins, and reconciliation with God) to forgive me my offences and trespasses. As also, I from my very heart and in grief and sorrow thereof, am perplexed and troubled for the base, wicked, and irreligious expressions which I have uttered, altho' that I did the same out of a blind zeal to that which I thought truth. And I profess and declare, that tho' it do not appear much by outward signes and tokens, yet I cannot express how much I detest, abhor and am troubled at the same, withall I acknowledge and confess to the glory of God, that in all he hath brought upon me, either one way or other, he hath done it most wisely and justly, and I hope in his mercy that it will be better for me that he hath afflicted and punished me in this life, and stopt the current of my sins, than that he had suffered me to go on headlong in my own evil ways, into the miseries out of which I should never have recovered. Likeas I bless God I die in the full persuasion of the true Christian Protestant Apostolick faith, according to the tenor of my petitions given into the lords of justiciary and council, which are signed by me and in their clerks hands.

And I cannot, without doing myself a manifest injury, but vindicate my innocence from those abominable aspersions in a printed satyr of Mr. Mungo Craig's, who was an evidence against me, whom I have to reckon with God and his own conscience, if he was not as deeply concerned in those hellish notions, (for which I am sentenced) as ever I was, however I bless the Lord, I forgive him and all men, and wishes the Lord may forgive him likewise.

To conclude, as the Lord in his providence hath been pleased in this exemplary manner to punish my great sins, so it is my earnest desire to him, that my blood may give a stop to that raging spirit of atheism which hath taken such footing in Britain, both in practice and profession. And of his infinite mercy recover those who are deluded with these pernicious principles. And for that end that his everlasting gospel may flourish in these lands, while sun and moon endureth. And now, O Land, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in thy hands I recommend my spirit, begging and hoping for pardon to all my sins, and to be recovered to thy eternal glory, through the only righteous merits of Jesus Christ my Saviour. To whom, with the Father and Blessed Spirit, my Sanctifier, be everlasting praise, honour and glory for now and evermore: Amen.

Being now wearing near the last moment of my time of living in this vain world, I have by the enclosed under my own hand, now when I am stepping into eternity, briefly as my time could only allow, given a true relation to the world in general, for whose use I am to give some copies of the enclosed at my last end to the ministers and magistrats who shall be by me, and to my dear and worthy friends (whom I from good ground may term parents) in particular, for whose use I will order this enclosed principally to be delivered by the bearer, to be present, of the original rise, matter, and manner of my doubtings and inquisitions, for which as I am now to die, so I desired not to live further than might have contribute to the glory of God, and good of his people by my after short time (for which I was demanding a reprieve) and my own soul's eternal welfare, by my more serious and incessant application to the throne of mercy for my great sins, which I hope shall be all forgiven by the mercy of God, through the merits of my Redeemer Jesus Christ, tho' alace my time hath been short since my sentence, so I have trifled away and mispent too much thereof, however, as my time hath allowed me, the enclosed will give satisfaction to you in particular, and to the world in general, and after I am gone, produce more charity than hath been my fortune to be trusted hitherto with, and remove the apprehensions, which I hear are various with many about my case, being the last words of a dying person, and proceeding from the sincerity of my heart.

There is one thing I hear I am aspersed with, which is not in the enclosed, which is, that I am suspected to have practised magick and conversed with devils, which I here declare in the presence of Almighty God, to be altogether false and without any solid ground. I desire you may call for extracts of my petitions to the council and justiciary, which I relate to in my last speech, which I recommend to your care, that I may be vindicated from any false aspersions.

Sic Subscribitur,

THOMAS AIKENHEAD.

Some Animadversions upon Aikenhead's last words, occur in the book, intitled, "Natural Religion insufficient, and Revealed necessary," to Man's Happiness, in his present state," &c. written by Thomas Hallyburton, a man of learning and of piety, who was Professor of Divinity in the University of St. Andrews, from the year 1710, to his death in 1712.

The author, after having set forth the evil of sin, or, as he expresses it, 'having condescended on a few of those considerations, whereon he insists for proving sin to be exceeding sinful, proceeds thus: "The Deists, to evade the difficulties arising from this evil of sin, take different courses. Some plainly deny any such thing as evil, or that there is any thing morally good or bad. Thomas Aikenhead, who was executed at Edinburgh, Jan. 3th, 1697, for his blasphemies, in his paper he delivered from the scaffold, tells us what his thoughts were in this matter, and upon what grounds they were built. When in his rational enquiries he came to consider, whether we were capable of offending God, he tells us; 'that after much pondering and serious consideration he concluded the negative.' The famed Mr. Hobbs was not of a very different mind: for he plainly asserts, 'that there is nothing good or evil in itself, nor any common laws constituting what is naturally just and unjust: but all things are to be measured by what every man judgeth fit, where there is no civil government; and by the laws of society, where there is one.' And elsewhere; 'before men entered into a state of civil government, there was not any thing just or unjust, for as much as just and unjust are the relatives of human laws; every action being of itself indifferent.'" And whether Spinoza was not of the same mind, is left to those to judge, who have time and leisure to trace his meaning, in his obscure and designedly involved way of writing. But surely this proposition in his Atheistical ethicks looks very like it, 'si homines liberi nascerentur (liber autem est juxta Spinozam, qui 'secundum ductum vel ex ducta rationis agit)' nullum boni et mali formarent conceptum, 'quamdiu liberi essent.' Mr. Hobbs has been learnedly confuted by many, such as Dr. Cumberland, Mr. Tyroll, and almost all who write of the law of nature. Spinoza has likewise been examined by Wittichius, and many others. The first, viz. Thomas Aikenhead, his grounds I shall propose and examine.

The first in his own words runs thus, 'I thought,' says he, 'a great part of morality, if not all, proceeded, ex arbitrio hominum,' as of that of a kingdom or common-wealth, or what most men think convenient for such and such ends, and these ends are always terminated upon being congruous to the nature of things; now we see that according to men's fancy things are congruous or incongruous to their natures, if not to the body, yet to the thinking faculty.'

The sum of this confused discourse, which probably he learned from Hobbs, amounts to this: God has fixed no law to our moral actions, by which they are to be regulated. Those, which are called moral laws, are only the determinations of government, or the concurring judgment of men, concerning what they think meet to be done for their own ends. That what some judge meet and congruous, others may find unsuitable to their nature and ends, and so are not obliged to obey. But, 1. Are not all these ungrounded assertions, whereof no proof is offered but the author's deluded fancy? 2. Has it not been irrefragably demonstrated by as many as discourse of moral good and evil, that, antecedently to any government among men, we are under a law, the law of nature, and that this is the will of God. 3. If all these had kept silence, does not the thing itself speak? What can be more evident, than that there is a law of nature, and that this is the law of God. We are certain that we are made of rational natures, capable of laws and government. We are no less sure, that God made us, and made us so. It is self-evident, that to him who made us, it belongs to govern, and dispose of us to those ends for which we were made. And we by our very beings are bound to obey, submit, and subject ourselves to his will and pleasure, who made us, and on whom we every way depend; and therefore his will, if he make it known, is a law, and the highest law to us. Again, it is clear that this reason, if we attend to it, tells us, that some things are to be done, and some things left undone; such as these, that we are to serve, love, obey and honour him that made us, upholds us, and on whom we every way depend; that we are to carry forward our fellow creatures, as it becomes those, who have the same original with us, who are subject to the same rule, are obliged to pursue the same ends; and that we are to dispose of ourselves, as the author of our nature allows us. These are all, if not self-evident, yet next to it, and easily deducible from principles that are so. Further, the reason that is implanted in us by God, tells us so; we are to take what it leads us to, while duly used, as the will of God, and so a law to us. 'For whatever judgement God makes a man with, concerning either himself, or other things, it is God's judgement; and whatever is his judgement, is a law to man; nor can he neglect or oppose it, without sin, being in his existence made with a necessary subjection to God. Such and such dictates being the natural operations of our minds, the being and essential constitution of which, in right reasoning, we owe to God, we cannot but esteem them the voice of God within us, and consequently his law to us.' [Sir Charles Wolseley's Scripture Belief, pp. 32, 33.]

What he tells us, of men's different apprehensions about what is right or wrong, makes nothing to the purpose. That only shews, that in many instances we are in the dark as to what is good and evil, which is granted; but will not infer, that there is no fixed measure of good and evil. In many general truths, all, who apply themselves to think, understand the terms, and have the truths proposed, do agree. And perhaps, all that is knowable of our duty by the light of nature, is deducible from such principles of morality, as all rational men who have them fairly proposed to them, must assent to. And deductions from laws which duly made, are of equal authority with the principles from which they are inferred. And finally, when men, in pursuance of their perverse natures, follow what is cross to those dictates of reason, they are condemned by their own consciences; which shews them under the obligation of a law, and that acting in a congruity to their natures as corrupt is not the standard they are obliged to walk by, since their own reason checks them for doing it. They who would desire to have this matter fully discoursed, may read others who have done it designedly, of whom there is great plenty.

His second reason runs thus; 'Also we do not know, what is good or evil in itself, if not thus, whatsoever can be attributed to God that is good, and what cannot, is evil. And we know not what can be attributed to God, but such things as by a deduction we ascribe to him, we call perfect, and such as we deny to be in him, we call imperfect; and so we most ignorantly commit a circle. There is no other notion of things in themselves good or evil.'

It is much harder to find the sense of these words, if they have any, than to answer the argument. The design of it is to prove, that there is no standard whereby we may judge what is good and what is evil. The force of the argument amounts to this; that there is no way how we come to know any thing to be good, but by this, that it may be ascribed to God. But we cannot know whether it is to be ascribed to God, unless we know that it is perfect or good.

This is thin sophistry, which I might easily expose, were it to any purpose to discover the weakness of that, which its author was ashamed of and disowned.

As to the first proposition, that there is no other way to know whether any thing be good or evil, but this, that it can or cannot be ascribed to God. 1. The complex proposition is false; for there are other ways whereby we may know things to be good or evil. And this holds, whether we take it in a physical or a moral sense. We know that to be morally good, which God enjoins us to do. We know the will of God in some instances, from the natures God has given us; and from these instances, our reason can infer others. As to physical good, we know things to be good or perfect, by acquaintance with the nature of the things, and by the self-evident notions of perfection: for there are some things, such as dependence, subjection, and the like, which, without any reasoning about the matter, we understand to be imperfect, or perfect; as soon as we understand the terms, and know that a perfection is that, which it is better for any being to have than to want; and then what these particular words dependence, subjection, &c. signify. This alone overthrows his whole argument. 2. The maxim which he fixes as a standard; that is good, which may be ascribed to God, and that is not, which may not be ascribed to him, if it is taken in its full extent, it is false as to moral good; of which the only question is: for it is certain, that it is good for man to be a dependent, a subject, &c. which cannot be ascribed to God. If it is taken in a physical sense, it is not to the purpose: and besides, it would, even in this sense, need some caution.

As to his other proposition, that we cannot otherwise know what is to be ascribed to God, than by knowing that it is good or perfect, it can scarce be supposed to speak of good in a moral sense; and in any other sense it is impertinent. If it is understood in a moral sense, it is likewise false; for we may know that things which are not in their own nature moral perfections, belong to God: such as power, omni-presence, &c. if it be understood in any other sense, we have nothing to do with it.

The next head that he adds is, "That all men will confess that any thing may be morally evil and good also, and consequently any thing decent or indecent, moral or immoral. Neither though there were things in themselves evil (if we do not apprehend other things instead of them) can we have any inclination thereunto: otherwise they will could wish evil."

But, 1. Who will grant him (in any other sense, that will be subservient to his purpose) that all actions are indifferent? I know none but men of his own principles. 2. As for what he pretends, that we cannot incline to that which is in its own nature evil, unless it be under the notion of good, I see not what this says for him: it is enough that we can do that action, which is evil and prohibited, yea, and which we know is prohibited, to constitute sin, and make the sinner deeply guilty.

But, not to insist any further on this inconsiderable trifle, (whose undigested notions scarce deserve the consideration we have given them, and much less did they become the awful gravity of the place where they were delivered :) there are others, &c.

Aikenhead's dying Speech appears to have been printed, as Halyburton not only refers to the passage cited above, but also mentions it in his Index of Authors and books quoted in his Treatise.

Wodrow (vol. 2, p. 221.) relates the following case of a convert to Judaism:

"Another lamentable effect of the bearing down of the gospel, and the neglect of instructing of people at this time, was the apostacy of too many from the very profession of religion; and indeed profaneness was now at a terrible height. In the justiciary registers, I find a process against the underwritten person for Judaism, which being the only instance, as far as I know, of this since the Reformation, the curious reader will be content to have a view of it. I give it as it stands in the criminal books, and it is what may be a caution to parents to found their children well in our holy religion, before they suffer them to go abroad.

“Edinburgh, June 15, 1681. Francis Borthwick, second son to James Borthwick of Harelaw, being often called to have appeared before the justiciary, this day and place, in the hour of chase, to have underlien the law, for the crime of blasphemy committed by him, in so far as being born of Christian parents, and baptized and educated in the Christian faith, and continuing in the open profession thereof, and communion of the Christian and Catholic church, until the age of 14 years, he went abroad to foreign places, to follow the trade of merchandize, where he was seduced to make a shameful apostasy from the most holy faith, and to ‘profess and openly declare himself to be a Jew, and was circumcised: and having returned to Scotland, at Edinburgh, Weights-houses, Brandsfield, and Hall-heriot, he did rail against our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, denying him to be God, and affirming him to be mere man, and a false prophet, and outrageously reviling him by such other horrid blasphemies as are not fit to be uttered, renouncing and cursing the holy sacrament and rite of his baptism. And he did with great and horrid execrations wish all manner of judgment to befall him, if ever he should return to the Christian religion, in manner at length mentioned in the criminal letters, raised at the instance of his majesty’s advocate, and James Cockburn in Duddingstoun informer against him thereanent. And being lawfully cited, and not compearing, the lords adjudged the said Francis Borthwick to be outlaw and fugitive, and all his goods and gear to be brought in for his majesty’s use, for his contemtion and disobedience; which was pronounced for doom.’

402. The Trial of EDWARD Earl of WARWICK and HOLLAND, before the House of Lords, for the Murder of Richard Coote, esq.: 11 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1699.

March 28, 1699.

ABOUT 11 of the clock the Lords came from their own House into the court erected in Westminster-hall, for the Trials of Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, and Charles lord Mohun, in the manner following: The lord high steward’s gentlemen attendants, two and two. The clerks of the House of Lords, with two clerks of the crown in the courts of Chancery and King’s-bench. The masters in Chancery, two and two. Then the judges. The peers eldest sons, and peers minors, two and two. Four serjeants at arms with their maces, two and two. The yeoman usher of the House. Then the peers two and two, beginning with the youngest barons. Then four serjeants at arms, with their maces. Then one of the heralds, attending in the room of Garter, who by reason of his infirmity could not be present. And the gentleman usher of the Black Rod, carrying the white-staff before the lord high steward. Then the lord chancellor, lord high steward of England, alone.

When the lords were seated on their proper benches, and the lord high steward upon the wool-pack; the two clerks of the crown in the courts of Chancery and King’s-bench, standing before the clerk’s table with their faces towards the state;

The clerk of the crown in Chancery having his majesty’s commission to the lord high steward in his hands, made three reverences towards the lord high steward, and the clerk of the crown in Chancery on his knees presented the commission to the lord high steward, who delivered it to the clerk of the crown in the King’s-bench, (then likewise kneeling before his grace) in order to be opened and read; and then the two clerks of the crown making three reverences, went down to the table; and the clerk of the crown in the court of King’s-bench commanded the serjeant at arms to make proclamation of silence; which he did in this manner:

Serj. at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes, My lord high steward his grace does straitly charge and command all manner of persons here present, to keep silence, and hear the king’s majesty’s commission to his grace my lord high steward of England directed, openly read, upon pain of imprisonment.

Then the Lord High Steward stood up, and spoke to the Peers.

Lord High Steward. (Lord Somers.) Your lordships will be pleased to stand up, and be uncovered, while the king’s commission is reading.

All the Peers stood up, and were uncovered, while the Commission was read.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships pleasure that the Judges may be covered?—Lords. Ay, ay.

[Then the Judges put on their caps.]

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes! chief governor of the Tower of London, bring forth the body of Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, your prisoner, forthwith, on pain and peril will fall thereon.

[Then the earl of Warwick was brought to the bar by the deputy-governor of the Tower of London, having the ax carried before him by the gentleman gaoler, who stood with it at the bar, on the right hand of the prisoner, turning the edge from him; the prisoner at his approach to the bar making three bows, one to his grace the Lord High Steward, the other to the peers on each hand; and his grace and the peers returned the salute.]

L. H. S. My lord of Warwick, your lordship is brought before this great judicature, in order to your trial. You stand indicted by the grand inquest for the county of Middlesex, as guilty of the murder of one of the king's subjects, for whose blood justice requires a strict inquisition should be made.

Your lordship is called to answer this charge before the whole body of the house of peers assembled in parliament. It is a great misfortune to be accused of so heinous an offence, and it is an addition to that misfortune, to be brought to answer as a criminal before such an assembly, in defence of your estate, your life, and honour. But it ought to be a support to your mind, sufficient to keep you from sinking under the weight of such an accusation, that you are to be tried before so noble, discerning, and equal judges, that nothing but your own guilt can hurt you. No evidence will be received, but what is warranted by law; no weight will be laid upon the evidence, but what is agreeable to justice; no advantage will be taken of your lordship's little experience in proceedings of this nature; nor will it turn to your prejudice, that you have not the assistance of counsel in your defence, as to the fact, (which cannot be allowed by law) and their lordships have already assigned you counsel, if any matters of law should arise.

Your lordship, throughout your whole trial, may assuredly promise yourself, to find all the candour and compassion which is consistent with impartial justice; beyond that nothing is to be expected: their lordships can never so far forget themselves, as to depart from what is right, and to draw the guilt of blood upon their own heads; but if your lordship is innocent you are safe.

My lord, it will be requisite for you to recollect yourself upon this occasion, in the best manner you can. You ought to hear with temper what the king's counsel have to say, without interrupting them; and to hearken carefully to the witnesses produced against you, that you may be ready to cross-examine them if you find cause, and to make your observations upon the evidence when the proper time comes for your lordship to make your defence: of which I will not fail to give you notice; and when that time does come, your lordship may be assured, yourself and your witnesses will be heard with great patience and attention; and when my lords have heard and considered the whole matter, the judgment will unquestionably be according to the rules of justice, and such as will become the honour of this high court.

[Read the Indictment to my lord.]

E. of Warwick. My lord, I beg I may have the use of pen, ink, and paper.

L. H. S. Will your lordships please to allow my lord Warwick, pen, ink, and paper?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. Carry pen, ink, and paper to my lord. (Which was done by the Clerk.)

L. H. S. My lord, your lordship will do well to give attention while the Indictment is read to you. Read it to my lord in English.

Cl. of the Cr. 'Ypur lordship stands indicted by the name of Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, late of the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields in the county of Middlesex; for that your lordship, together with Charles lord Mohun, baron Mohun of Oakehampton in the county of Devon, late of the parish aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, Richard French, late of the parish aforesaid in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, gent. Roger James, of the parish aforesaid in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, gent. and George Dockwra, late of the parish aforesaid in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, gent. not having the fear of God before your eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the 30th day of October, in the tenth year of the reign of our sovereign lord William the Third, by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. with force and arms, &c. at the parish aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, in and upon one Richard Coote, esq. in the peace of God, and of our said sovereign lord the king, then and there being, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that your lordship, the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, with a certain sword made of iron and steel of the value of five shillings, which you the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, in your right hand then and there had and held drawn, the aforesaid Richard Coote, in and upon the left part of the breast of him the said Richard Coote, near the collar bone of him the said Richard Coote, then and there feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice aforethought, did strike, stab, and thrust in, giving to the said Richard Coote, then and there with the sword drawn aforesaid, in and upon the left part of the breast of him the said Richard Coote, near the collar bone of him the said Richard Coote, one mortal wound of the breadth of half an inch, and of the depth of five inches, of which said mortal wound the aforesaid Richard Coote then and there instantly died: and that the aforesaid Charles lord Mohun, Richard French, Roger James, and George Dockwra, then and there feloniously, voluntarily, and of their malice aforethought, were present, aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining you the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, the said Richard Coote, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice aforethought, to kill and murder; and so you the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, and the said Charles lord Mohun, Richard French, Roger James and George Dockwra, the aforesaid Richard Coote, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, that now is, his crown and dignity, &c.' How say you, Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, are you guilty of this felony and murder whereof you stand indicted, or not guilty?

E. of Warwick. Not guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Culpit, How will your lordship be tried?

E. of Warwick. By God, and my peers.

Cl. of the Cr. God send your lordship a good delivrance.

Then at the motion of some lords who sate towards the upper end of the house, and by reason of the distance could not distinctly hear the Clerk, the Indictment was read again, the Clerk standing near the upper end of the house.

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make an O Yes.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes, If any one will give evidence on behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now he stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

L. H. S. Will your lordships give me leave to go down to the Woolpack, that I may hear the better?—Lords. Ay, ay.

Then his grace removed to the Woolpack, and delivered the white staff to be held by the gentleman usher of the black rod, who during the whole trial always received and delivered back the white staff upon his knees.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, are you ready to proceed?

Att. Gen. (Sir Tho. Trevor.) Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. Then begin, Sir.

Serj. Wright. May it please your lordships.

L. H. S. Pray, Mr. Serjeant, raise your voice as much as possible as you can, that my lords towards the upper end of the House may hear.

Serj. Wright. May it please your lordships, this noble lord Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for the felonious killing and murder of one Richard Coote, esq.; and the indictment sets forth, that upon the 30th day of October, in the 10th year of his majesty's reign, at the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, in the county of Middlesex, the prisoner at the bar, the earl of Warwick, together with Charles lord Mohun, baron of Oakehampton, Richard French, Roger James, and George Dockwra, gent. feloniously, voluntarily, and of their malice afore-thought, did make an assault upon the said Richard Coote, in the indictment named; and the indictment chargeth, that the earl of Warwick, at the same time and place, with a sword feloniously, voluntarily, and of his malice afore-thought, did give unto the said Richard Coote, in or upon the left part of the breast of him the said Richard Coote, near his collar-bone, one mortal wound of the breadth of half an inch, and of the depth of five inches, of which said wound the said Richard Coote then and there instantly died; and the indictment further charges, that the said Charles lord Mohun, Richard French, Roger James and George Dockwra, the earl of Warwick, to commit the felony and murder aforesaid, were then and there aiding, assisting, comforting, and abetting; and so the jurors charge, that he the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, Charles lord Mohun, Richard French, Roger James, and George Dockwra, the said Richard Coote, feloniously, voluntarily, and of their malice afore-thought, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, did kill and murder, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. To this indictment this noble lord the prisoner at the bar, Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, has pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon my noble lords his peers here present: we shall call our evidence, and if we prove this fact for the king, we do not doubt but your lordships will give such judgment for the same as shall be just.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordships, I am of counsel in this cause for the king against this noble lord Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, the prisoner at the bar, who stands indicted by the grand jury of the county of Middlesex, has been arraigned, and is now to be tried before your lordships for the felonious killing and murdering of Mr. Coote, in the indictment named; the evidence to make good this charge against this noble lord, it comes to my turn to open to your lordships.

My lords, the case, as to the fact, according to my instructions, is this: Upon Saturday, the 29th of October last, at night, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, Mr. French, Mr. Dockwra, and Mr. Coote, the unfortunate gentleman who was killed, met together at one Locket's who kept the Greyhound-tavern in the Strand, and there they staid till it was very late; about twelve of the clock at night, or thereabouts, a messenger was sent by the company to fetch another gentleman, Mr. James; and Mr. James coming to them, in what condition your lordships will be told by the witnesses; about one of the clock in the morning, on Sunday, the 30th of October, they all came down out of the room where they had been so late, to the bar of the house, and there, as the witnesses will tell your lordships, swords were drawn, and chairs were called for, and two chairs which were nearest at hand came, and two of the company went into those chairs; who they were, and what past at that time, the witnesses will tell your lordships; those that got into those chairs came out again, and more chairs were called for. But I must acquaint your lordships, that my lord Mohun, when the two gentlemen that went into the chairs ordered the chairmen to take them up, and carry them away, spoke to them to stop and go no further, for there should be no quarrelling that night, and that he would send for the guards and secure them; and after this they came out of the chairs again; it will appear there were swords drawn amongst all of them, and some wounds given: more chairs being called for, and brought, this noble lord that is here at the bar, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and the other four gentlemen, went all into the chairs, and gave the chairmen directions whither they should carry them, at leastwise the foremost had directions given them, and the rest were to follow them; it was a very dark night, but at last they came all to Leicester-square; and they were set down a little on this side the rails of the square, and when the chairmen had set them down they went away; but immediately some of them heard my lord of Warwick calling for a chair again, who came towards the rails, and there they found two of the gentlemen that had been carried in some of the other chairs, holding up Mr. Coote between them, and would have had the chairmen carried him away to a surgeon's, but they found he was dying, and so would not meddle with him; afterwards my lord of Warwick and Mr. French were carried by two of the chairs to Mr. Amy's, the surgeon at the Bagno in Long-acre, where Mr. French being wounded, was taken care of particularly by the recommendation of my lord of Warwick, and the master of the house was called up, it being very late; Mr. Coote's sword was brought to that place, but by whom it was brought we cannot exactly say. While my lord of Warwick and captain French were there, and my lord of Warwick had given orders for the denying of himself, and forbid the opening of the door; there came the other two gentlemen, Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra, and upon their knocking at the door they were let in by my lord's order, after he had discovered who they were, looking through the wicket. Mr. James had his sword drawn, but it was broken. My lord of Warwick's hand was slightly wounded, and his sword bloody up to the hilt when he came in, as will be proved by the testimony of the servants in the House. There was a discourse between my lord, Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra, about going into the country; but before they went, the swords were all called for to be brought to them, and upon enquiry, there was no blood found upon Mr. French's sword, but a great deal upon my lord of Warwick's, of which great notice was taken at that time. Mr. Coote, who was killed, had received one wound in the left side of his breast, half an inch wide, and five deep, near the collar bone; he had likewise another wound upon the left side of his body; both which your lordships will hear, in the judgment of the surgeon, were mortal wounds, and the evidence will declare the nature of them.

My lords, the evidence does chiefly consist of, and depend on circumstances, the fact being done in the night, and none but the parties concerned being present at it; we shall lay the evidence before your lordships, as it is, for your judgment, and call what witnesses we have on behalf of the king, against this noble peer the prisoner at the bar, and take up your lordships time no further in opening; and we shall begin with Samuel Cawthorne; he is a drawer at the tavern where those lords and gentlemen were together, and he will give you an account of the time they came there, how long they staid, what happened in the house during their being there, and what time they went away.

L. H. S. Give him his oath. (Which the clerk did.)

Att. Gen. My lords, I doubt the witness is so far off, that it will be difficult for him to hear the questions that we are to ask him, unless we could have him nearer to us.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, my lords seem to be of opinion, that it will be more for your advantage and theirs, that the witnesses stand at the distance they do; which will oblige you to raise your voice so loud, that they may hear the witnesses and you too.

Att. Gen. Is your name Samuel Cawthorne?
Cawthorne. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. Where do you live?

Cawth. With Mr. Locket at Charing-cross.

Att. Gen. Did you live with him at the Greyhound tavern in the Strand the latter end of October last?—Cawth. Yes, I did.

Att. Gen. Well, pray will you acquaint my lords with the time when my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and Mr. Coote were at that house, how long they stayed, what happened while they were there, and when they went away?

Cawth. It was Saturday night, the 29th of October last.

Att. Gen. Pray tell my lords the whole of your knowledge in the matter.

Cawth. There came my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, captain Coote, capt. French, and captain Dockwra, the 29th of October last, in the evening, to my master's house at the Greyhound tavern in the Strand.

Att. Gen. How long were they there, and what time of night came they in?

Cawth. About 8 o'clock at night, my lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, capt. French, and capt. Coote, came in.

Att. Gen. What day do you say it was?

Cawth. Saturday, the 29th of October last.

Att. Gen. How long did they continue there?

Cawth. It was between one and two the next morning before they went away.

Att. Gen. Was any body sent for to come to them there?—Cawth. Yes, Mr. James.

Att. Gen. What time was that?

Cawth. About twelve of the clock.

Att. Gen. Did he stay with them till they went away?—Cawth. Yes.

Att. Gen. What did you observe past in the company while they were there?

Cawth. I did not observe any thing of quarrel, not so much as an angry word amongst them, till they came down to the bar and were going away; when they came down to the bar they ordered me to call them chairs, or coaches; and there were no coaches to be had, and so I went for chairs, and two chairs came; for the porter that went to call the coaches was a great while before he came back; and, as I said, I going for chairs, there came two; but that they said was not enough; so more chairs were called for, and at length there were more chairs gotten; in the first three chairs, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and captain Coote went away in; and my lord Warwick and my lord Mohun bid the chairmen carry them home.

Att. Gen. Were there then any other chairs at the door?

Cawth. There were two more chairs at the door, and another was called for.

Att. Gen. Did you hear any directions given where they should carry them?

Cawth. My lord Warwick and my lord Mohun bid them carry them home.

Att. Gen. Did you hear my lord Warwick or my lord Mohun particularly, and which, say whither they would be carried?

Cawth. I did hear my lord Mohun say, captain Coote should go and lie with him, or he would go and lie with capt. Coote that night, for there should be no quarrelling.

Att. Gen. Did they upon that go away?

Cawth. Mr. French and Mr. Coote were in chairs before my lord Mohun or my lord Warwick, or any of the rest.

Att. Gen. What then happened upon their going into the chairs?

Cawth. My lord Mohun came out to them and swore, there should be no quarrel that night, but he would send for the guards and secure them.

Att. Gen. What happened then?

Cawth. Upon that, both of them came out of their chairs and came into the house, and there they came to the bar, three of them in the passage by the bar, and three of them behind that passage.

Att. Gen. Pray, will you tell what did really pass throughout the whole transaction? What was done after they came in again into the house?

Cawth. After that, I was bid to call for six chairs, if I could get no coaches, and so I did; and when I had brought what chairs I could get, and returned to the bar, I heard the swords chair, when the swords were drawn I cannot say, nor by whom; it might be by all the six, for aught I know, because I was in the street to call the chairs, and when I came back to the house, I was in hopes all had been quieted, for their swords were putting up: and when they went away in the chairs, I did hope they went away friendly.

Att. Gen. Pray, how did they go away? who went together?

Cawth. My lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and captain Coote went in the first three chairs, them three together, and bid the chairmen go home; the sixth chair was not then come.

Att. Gen. When that chair came, pray what directions were given to it?

Cawth. I did not hear them give the chairmen any directions at all.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing more that was done after this time?

Cawth. No, my lord, not after they went away; after I returned with the chairs, it was in two minutes time that they went away.

Att. Gen. My lords, I suppose he knows no more of the matter.

L. H. S. Will you then ask him no more questions, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. No, my lords, unless this noble lord shall ask him any questions, upon which we shall have occasion to examine him.

L. H. S. My lord, has your lordship any questions to ask this witness? For now is your time, the king's counsel having done examining him.

E. of War. I desire to ask him, whether I did not bid the chairmen go home?

L. H. S. If your lordship please to propose your question to me, I will require an answer to it from the witness, and it will be the better heard by my lords.

E. of War. My lord, I desire to know of this man, whether, when I went away in the chair from his master's house, I did not bid the chairmen go home?

L. H. S. Witness, you hear my lord's question, what say you to it?

Cawth. Yes; my lord of Warwick did bid the chairmen go home.

E. of War. My lord; I have another question to ask him, Whether he knows of any quarrel there was between me and Mr. Coote at that time, or any other time; because we both used to frequent that house?

Cawth. No, my lords, I never heard any angry words between my lord Warwick and Mr. Coote in my life.

[Then the lords towards the upper end of the House complaining that they did not hear his Grace, the Lord High Steward was pleased to repeat the question thus:]

L. H. S. When my lord of Warwick bid the chairmen go home, or at any other time, did you observe that there had been any quarrel between his lordship and Mr. Coote?

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may be asked, since we both used that house, Whether that night, when I went away, or before or after, I had any quarrel with Mr. Coote?

L. H. S. The question my lord desires you, that are the witness, to answer, is, Whether you did hear any quarrelling or angry words to pass between my lord Warwick and Mr. Coote that night before or after they came down, or when they went away, or at any other time?

Cawth. No, my lord, I never heard any angry words pass between them then, nor ever at any time before in all my life, but I always looked upon them to be very good friends.

E. of War. I desire he may be asked, Whether Mr. Coote did not come to that house in my company, and whether he did not frequently come to that house?

Cawth. Yes; they used to be there every day almost, and they came that night together in company.

E. of War. I desire he may be asked, whether I have not been frequently in his company there?

Cawth. Yes; I say very frequently, every day almost, sometimes twice a-day.

L. H. S. Would your lordship ask him any other question?

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may be asked this question, whether he knows of any particular kindness between Mr. Coote and me?

L. H. S. Do you know of any particular kindness between my lord Warwick and Mr. Coote, the gentleman that was killed?

Cawth. Yes, my lord, there was always a great kindness between them, as I observed; it ever was so, and I never heard angry words pass between them, but they were very good friends constantly; I waited upon them generally when they were at my master's house, which was every day almost.

E. of War. I desire to know of this witness, whether he does not remember, or can name, some particular kindnesses that passed between Mr. Coote and me?

L. H. S. Can you specify any particular instances of kindness that passed between my lord Warwick and Mr. Coote?

Cawth. Yes; my lord of Warwick used generally to pay the reckoning for Mr. Coote, and he did so at this time.

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may be asked, between whom he apprehended the quarrel to be at this time?

L. H. S. You say, friend, there were swords drawn, and a quarrelling at the bar; can you tell between whom the quarrel was?

Cawth. My lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, and capt. Coote, were all on one side, and the other three were on the other side.

E. of War. Who were the two persons that it was apprehended the quarrel was between? I desire he may be asked.

L. H. S. You say, there were three on the one side, and three on the other; pray, between whom did you apprehend the quarrel to be?

Cawth. I believe the quarrel was between Mr. Coote and Mr. French.

E. of War. My lord, I desire to know of this witness, what words he heard Mr. Coote say after he and Mr. French returned into the house and came out of the chairs.

L. H. S. What do you say to the question my lord proposes?

Cawth. I heard Mr. Coote say, he would laugh when he pleased, and he would frown when he pleased, God damn him.

E. of War. My lord, I desire to know, who he thinks those words were addressed to?

L. H. S. To whom did Mr. Coote speak these words?

Cawth. Whether he spoke them particularly to Mr. French or to the other two gentlemen who were on the other side of the bar, I cannot directly tell.

E. of War. I desire to know of him, whether Mr. Coote was not one of the three that was on the outside of the bar?

Cawth. Yes, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and capt. Coote, were of the outside of the bar.

E. of War. Was capt. Coote with me in the beginning of the night at that house?

Cawth. Yes, he came at the beginning of the night with my lord of Warwick.

E. of Peterb. My lords, I desire to ask this witness one question.

L. H. S. I think it is proper, my lords, in point of method, to let both sides have done before any questions be asked by any of my noble lords.

E. of Peterb. I did apprehend my lord of Warwick had done.

L. H. S. No, my lord, not as yet: pray my lord Warwick, what other questions has your lordship to ask of this witness?

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may be asked particularly this question, whether he perceived any quarrel particularly between me and capt. Coote when we went out of the house?

L. H. S. You hear the question, did you perceive any quarrel between my lord Warwick and Mr. Coote before they went out of the house?

Cawth. No, I did not; nor ever saw any quarrel between them in my life.

E. of War. I desire to know who paid the reckoning that night?

Cawth. The reckoning was called for before I came in to take it; and though I think my lord of Warwick paid for Mr. Coote, yet I cannot so directly tell, because it was collected before I came into the room to receive it.

L. H. S. My lord, have you any thing more to ask this witness?

E. of War. No, my lord, at present, that I think of.

L. H. S. My lord Peterborough, your lordship desire to ask a question, will you please to propose it now?

E. of Peterb. My lord, this witness seems to take notice of two sides, who were on the one side, and who were on the other, and that Mr. Coote and my lord of Warwick were on one side; I desire to know one thing of him, what reason he had to apprehend that they two were of a side?

L. H. S. Friend, you hear that noble lord's question; you seem to say, there were three and three of a side. What reason had you to apprehend, that my lord Warwick and Mr. Coote were of one side? You must explain to my lords how you come to make that judgment, what reason you had to think so?

Cawth. They three, my lord Mohun, my lord Warwick, and Mr. Coote, were on the one side of the bar; and capt. James, capt. French, and capt. Dockwra, were on the other side of the bar.

L. H. S. So you said before; but the question which my noble lord desires to be satisfied in, is this, how you come to speak as if there was a quarrel between three and three? what reason had you to think, that three were on one side, and three on the other?

Cawth. Their swords were all drawn, and they stood three on one side of the bar, and three on the other.

E. of Rochester. My lords, I desire to ask this witness one question; I think he told your lordships at first, that he did not perceive any angry words among them; afterwards he comes to talk of swords drawn amongst them all, three on the outside, and three on the inside of the bar; I desire to know what was the occasion of those swords being drawn on the one side or the other?

Cawth. Whatsoever quarrel there was, was amongst themselves above stairs, and I know no angry words that passed between them when they came down to the bar.

L. H. S. See what you say; how consistent one part of it is with another! You said at first, you did not hear of any angry words that passed between them, and yet you say, all their swords were drawn, and three were on the one side, and three on the other: and when you were examined upon the motion of that noble lord, what you meant by three on the one side and three on the other, you said, my lord Mohun, my lord Warwick, and Mr. Coote, were on the one side; Mr. James, Mr. French, and Mr. Dockwra, were on the other side: how could there be two sides, unless there was a quarrel?

Cawth. I said, I did not hear any angry words pass between them before they came to the bar, or while they were above stairs; but they were three on the one side of the bar, and three on the other.

L. H. S. But you have not given a satisfactory answer to that question which the noble lord, my lord Peterborough, asked you, What reason you had to apprehend that the noble lord the prisoner at the bar, and capt. Coote were of a side?

Cawth. My lord Mohun came to the chair-side, when capt. Coote and capt. French were got into the two first chairs, and told capt.

Coote, that there should be no quarrel that night, but that they three, my lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, and he, should go home together; and I took them three to be of a side, because they were on the outside of the bar together; and when they all went away, their three chairs went away first, all three together.

L. H. S. Is that all the reason you can give why you say, they were three and three of a side?

Cawth. Yes, my lord, I did apprehend it so.

Att. Gen. If my noble lords have done with their questions, I desire to ask this witness another question; my lords, I think this person says, that there was a quarrel at the bar of the house, and swords drawn, and as he apprehended, three were on the one side, and three on the other; but if I take him right, I do not see that he has given your lordships any manner of satisfaction, what reason he had to apprehend there were three and three of a side; or, which will be very material in this case, if your lordships can get to the knowledge of it, which three were on the one side, and which three were on the other; or indeed, whether there were three and three of a side, as your lordships will have reason by-and-bye to enquire a little further into that matter. My lords, I desire he may be asked this plain question, What words or other passages he did perceive, that made him apprehend there was a quarrel between them, and they were three and three of a side?

Cawth. I apprehended it from the words that Mr. Coote said, That he would laugh when he pleased, and frown when he pleased.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, I desire he may be asked, who those words were spoke to, and who they were applied to?

Cawth. They were spoke to Mr. James, Mr. French, and Mr. Dockwra, who were within side of the bar.

Att. Gen. Did he apply those words to all those particular persons?

Cawth. Yes, as I thought, for they three were within the bar; my lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, and Mr. Coote, were without the bar.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, I desire he may be asked this question, Was that before the swords were drawn, or afterwards?

Cawth. It was before.

Att. Gen. Then I desire he may be asked, whether the swords were drawn upon those words?

Cawth. No, my lord; the time of drawing the swords was when I went out to call chairs and coaches; and I know not who drew the swords first, or when they were drawn; but when I came back I found them all drawn, and I heard them clashing.

Att. Gen. Upon the oath you have taken, was those words that you speak of Mr. Coote's, that he would laugh when he pleased, and frown when he pleased, before the swords were drawn, or after the swords were drawn?

Cawth. Before the swords were drawn; for

I did not see the swords drawn till I came back.

L. H. S. Does either side desire to ask this witness any questions; if not, then you may withdraw, and you may proceed, Mr. Attorney, to examine some other witness.

Lord Wharton. My lord, there was a question asked at the bar about the hindering of the quarrel, and my lord Mohun's desire to part them, and make them friends; I desire the witness, before he goes away, may be asked what he knows of that matter.

L. H. S. It has been observed by my lord, that you said, when they came down to the bar, and the quarrel happened, somebody would have prevented it; pray repeat that matter again, Did you observe any of the company were disposed to take up the quarrel, and make them friends, and who they were?

Caw. My lord Mohun and my lord Warwick said they would send for a file of musqueteers; and my lord Mohun did all he could to quiet and pacify them till the quarrel was over; and my lord Mohun particularly had his finger pricked with endeavouring to cross their swords, and keeping them from fighting; which was all he got by it.

L. H. S. Do you know that of your own knowledge?

Caw. His hand was bloody, and he said so at the bar; but I was just coming in again when I heard him say so; but I cannot say that I saw him hurt, for I was without the house at the time when that was done.

Lord Godolphin. My lords, I desire to ask this witness one question; I observe he has told my lords, there was not an angry word passed between them before they came down to the bar: I would fain ask him this question, whether he was in the room all the time till they did come down to the bar?

Caw. I received the reckoning just before they came down to the bar.

Lord Godolphin. And I desire he may be asked, How long he staid in the room when he received the reckoning?

Caw. It was about two or three minutes that I staid in the room, and not longer.

E. of Warwick. My lord, this witness that has been examined, told you, that when we first came down to the bar there were two chairs called for; and when they came, Mr. Coote and the other gentleman, Mr. French, went into the chairs, and afterwards they came out again, and Mr. Coote said some words; I desire the witness may be asked again, when it was Mr. Coote spoke those words; whether it was before or after the time that he came out of the chair; for I take it to be very material.

Caw. It was after Mr. Coote came out of the chair, for the chairmen heard the words as I verily believe.

Att. Gen. My lord, I desire he may be asked, was there any reply made to those words by any of those persons he says he apprehends were on the other side?

Caw. No, not one word that I know of.

E. of Warwick. My lord, I must beg the favour to have the question asked again of him, whether I did not at that time endeavour to prevent any quarrelling, and did not say I would call for the guard if they did?

Caw. Yes; my lord of Warwick did say so, and so did my lord Mohun, and so I think did Mr. James.

L. H. S. How came you not to say so when you were asked that question particularly before? Then you said my lord Mohun endeavoured to prevent the quarrelling, and make them friends.

Caw. Yes, my lord Warwick did so, and so did Mr. James.

L. H. S. I cannot tell whether any body else desires to ask him any questions.

Att. Gen. My lord, he speaks of what this noble lord, my lord of Warwick, said; but he does not tell you the particular expressions, nor the time when my lord said them.

L. H. S. You say, my lord, the prisoner at the bar, endeavoured to pacify the quarrel between them; but you do not tell my lords who the quarrel was between; nor when the endeavour was made by my lord Warwick to pacify it.

Caw. My lord of Warwick did say he would have the guards sent for.

L. H. S. What time was that, before or after my lord Mohun said so?

Caw. Truly, my lord, I do not know but that it was at the same time.

L. H. S. Was it when the swords were drawn, or before?

Caw. They spoke it both before and after the swords were drawn, as I remember; for the swords were not drawn while I was in the house, till I came back.

L. H. S. Were the swords drawn when my lord Warwick spoke of sending for the guards?

Caw. Surely, my lord, it was before the swords were drawn, when I was sent for the chairs.

L. H. S. You said there was no angry words or quarrel between them?

Caw. Not above stairs, my lord: but I apprehended when they came down to the bar, there were three on one side, and three on the other.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, let him be asked this question, Was it after they were three on the one side, and three on the other, that my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick spoke those words?

Caw. I apprehend the words were spoke by Mr. Coote, That he would laugh when he pleased, and frown when he pleased, before the swords were drawn.

L. H. S. But that which my lords desire to know is, What the time was when my lord Warwick and my lord Mohun declared their desire to part them and make them friends; whether before or after the swords drawn?

Caw. Before and after; for I was absent when the swords were drawn.

Earl Rivers. He says, that after my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick threatened to send for the musqueteers, they promised to be quiet. I desire to know who he means by they?

Caw. Mr. James called to me, and said, I need not go and call for the guards, for the quarrel was over. There is one thing more that I forgot, my lord: After my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick were gone away in their chairs, and Mr. Coote, I heard Mr. Dockwra say to capt. James and capt. French, they did not care a farthing for them, they would fight them at any time.

L. H. S. Who were together then?

Caw. Capt. James, Mr. French, and Mr. Dockwra, after my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick were gone with capt. Coote.

L. H. S. Then Mr. French was with them? Mr. Dockwra said so?—Caw. Yes, my lord.

Lord Wharton. If I apprehend him aright, as to what he says now, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and capt. Coote, were gone away at that time.

Caw. Yes, they were gone away in the three first chairs, which my lord Mohun bid go home.

Lord Wharton. Who does he say spoke those words?

L. H. S. You hear my noble lord's question, who spoke those words? Repeat them again.

Caw. When my lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, and capt. Coote were gone, I heard Mr. Dockwra say to Mr. French and Mr. James, we don't care a farthing for them, we will fight them at any time.

Att. Gen. I desire to know, whether this witness testified any thing of this matter when he was examined before the coroner?

Caw. No; I forgot those words when I was examined before the coroner.

Att. Gen. How soon after your examination did you recollect yourself as to what you now speak?—Caw. The next day after.

Att. Gen. I pray, my lords, that he may be asked, whether he did in general give the same evidence before the coroner that he now does?

Caw. Yes, as to all but only those words, of Mr. Dockwra's declaring he did not care a farthing for them, they would fight them at any time.

Att. Gen. My lord, I beg he may be asked, how long it was after the fact was done that he was examined before the coroner?

Caw. It was the next day, in the afternoon.

Att. Gen. Then I have this question further to ask, if your lordships please, was he at the trial of Mr. Dockwra, Mr. James, and Mr. French?—Caw. Yes, I was.

Att. Gen. Did he then give any evidence of those words of Mr. Dockwra's, after when my lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, and capt. Coote were gone?—Caw. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. My lord, I have one question to ask him then more, how he came not to swear this matter at that trial?

Caw. It was out of my mind at that time, and I had like to have forgot it now.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have done with this witness: Is it your lordships' pleasure that we go on to call our other witnesses?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

Att. Gen. Then our next witnesses, my lords, will be the chairmen that carried my lord Mohun, my lord of Warwick, and captain Coote: We shall begin with Thomas Browne and John Gibson; one of them carried Mr. Coote, the other my lord of Warwick.

[Thomas Browne was sworn.]

L. H. S. What question do you ask this witness, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. That he would acquaint your lordships, whether he carried Mr. Richard Coote, the person that was slain, upon the 29th or 30th of October, from the Greyhound tavern in the Strand, and to what place he carried him?

L. H. S. You hear the question; pray speak so loud that my lords may all hear what you say.

Browne. My lords, I was between the hours of one and two in the morning, on Sunday the 30th of October last, with my fellow and our chair, at the Ruffler's Head tavern at Charing-cross, and I heard some people at Locket's, at the Greyhound in the Strand, calling coach, coach, a pretty while; but there were no coaches in the street, nor that came to them; when they could not get coaches, then they called out for chairs; and we coming to the door with our chair, there were four other chairs there, and six gentlemen stood in the passage; and then it was said, there was not chairs enough, and there wanted one more, and they stood discoursing; and the first man came into my chair, who was capt. Coote; and my lord of Warwick he got into another: When the door of the chair was shut up, we asked whither we should go; but my lord Mohun came and bid open the chair again; and we did so, and he returned into the house, and there was some discourse between them standing at the bar in the entry. Mr. Coote came out again and came into my chair, and my lord Mohun and my lord of Warwick went into two others; Mr. Coote bid me carry him into Leicester fields, and to make all the haste I could; my lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun being in the next chairs, asked him, Whither are you a-going, and called out twice, and he said, To Leicester fields; pray do not, says my lord of Warwick, but come along with us, and let it alone till to-morrow; but he bid us go on; and as we were turning up St. Martin's Lane, by the Cross Keys tavern, my lord Mohun, and my lord Warwick called out to us to stop, and their chairs came up to the back door of the Cross Keys tavern, and there all the three chairs were set on a-breast in St. Martin's lane, and while they were talking together, there came by three chairs of the other side of the way; and Mr. Coote bid us take up and make all the haste we could before them into Leicester fields, so taking up the chair again, Mr. Coote bid us make haste, and if we could go no faster, he swore, damn him, he would run his sword in one of our bodies: There were two chairs before me, and my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick followed in two chairs after me; and when we came to the corner of Leicester fields, at Green street end, all the three chairs were set down a-breast again, and Mr. Coote put his hand in his pocket, and took out half a guinea to pay, and said he had no silver; and my lord of Warwick spoke to my lord Mohun, who took out three shillings out of his pocket, who said, there was for my lord Warwick, capt. Coote, and himself; and when they were gone out, I took my box and my pipe, and filled my pipe, and took the lanthorn and lighted it, and by that time I had lighted my pipe, I heard a calling out, Chair, chair, again, towards the upper end of the square; so I took my chair, and there was one of the chairs that was not gone; and so we came up to the upper end of the fields, and they called to us to bring the chairs over the rails; we told them we did not know how to do that, for we should not be able to get them back again; at last we did get over the rails, and made up close to the place where we heard the noise, for we could see nothing, it being a very dark night; and when we came up close to them, by our lanthorn there were two gentlemen holding up Mr. Coote under their arms, and crying out, My dear Coote, My dear Coote!

Att. Gen. Pray, who were those two gentlemen?

Browne. I did not know them, one was in red cloaths, and the other had gold lace, and they would have had me have taken Mr. Coote into my chair; but seeing him bloody, and not able to help himself, I said I would not spoil my chair, and so would not meddle with him; but they said they would make me any satisfaction for my chair, and desired me to take him in; but he gave himself a spring from them, and we found he was too heavy for us to lift over the rails, and all we could do could not make him sit in the chair, but the chair was broken with endeavouring to place him there; and they said, if we would carry him to a surgeon's, they would give us 100*l.* security; but we finding it impossible, the watch was called for, but nobody would come near, for they said it was out of their ward, and so they would not come anigh me; and I staid about half an hour with my chair broken, and afterwards I was laid hold upon, both I and my partner, and we were kept till next night eleven a'clock; and that is all the satisfaction that I have had for my chair and every thing.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, I desire he may recollect himself; for we do apprehend it is very material, who it was that desired to take Mr. Coote into the chair?

Browne. I cannot tell who they were, it was so very dark I could only see their cloaths.

Att. Gen. Did you see the earl of Warwick there?

Browne. No, Sir, he was not there; one of them, I tell you, had officers' cloaths on, red lined with blue, and the other had gold lace on; there was nobody there that held him up but them two.

M. of Norm. He says he saw two persons holding up Mr. Coote; it would be very well to have that matter very well settled, who those two persons were; I desire to know how he is sure my lord of Warwick was not one of them two?

Browne. I know my lord of Warwick very well, and I am sure he was neither of the two.

D. of Leeds. I would know what light he had to discern it so well by, that he can be sure my lord of Warwick was not there; for he says, it was a very dark night, and yet he describes the particular persons that held Mr. Coote up.

Browne. Yes, my lord, I am sure my lord of Warwick was none of them.

D. of Leeds. How could you distinguish in so dark a night, the colours of people's cloaths?

Browne. With the candle that I had lighted in my lanthorn.

D. of Leeds. He could not know any of the persons unless he held a lanthorn to their faces, or knew them very well before.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will your lordship ask this witness any questions?

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether I did not bid him stop at St. Martin's-lane end, and do all that I could to hinder Mr. Coote from going any further, but to go home?

Browne. The earl of Warwick, and my lord Mohun, as they turned up the lane, asked Mr. Coote, whither he was going? And when he said to Leicester-fields, they desired him to let it alone till to-morrow; and my lord Mohun said he should go home with him; but the other bid us go on, and said he would not go to his lodgings, but that they would make an end of it that night; still they called to him again, dear Coote, let us speak a word with you; and as the chairs came to the back-door of the Cross-keys tavern, there they stood all of a breast, and they both of them spoke to him, and stood a pretty while there, and in the mean time three chairs passed by on the other side; he commanded us to take up, and carry him away to Leicester-fields immediately, and overtake the other chairs, or he would run one of us into the body.

L. H. S. Would your lordship ask him any more questions?

E. of War. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. My lord, I observe, he says they discoursed some time together while they stopped in St. Martin's-lane; I desire that he may be asked, Whether he can tell what that discourse was?

Browne. I could not well hear, they whispered together, but I could hear my lord Mohun and my lord of Warwick, desire capt. Coote to go home, and let the business alone till another time.

Att. Gen. I desire he may explain himself, what that business was that they would have put off till to-morrow.

Browne. I know not what it was; I heard of no anger betwixt them, but they were as good friends, for any thing I know to the contrary, as ever they were in their lives, or as ever I see any men.

L. Jefferys. He says there were two went into chairs at the door of the house, and afterwards went out again, and went into the house, and there was discourse at the bar of the house, I would desire to know what that was?

Browne. I did not hear the discourse that was in the house, I was at the door of the house.

Att. Gen. Our next witness is William Crippes. [Who was sworn.]

L. H. S. What do you ask this man, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Pray, will you give my lords here an account who you carried to Leicester-fields the 29th or 30th of October, and what happened in your knowledge at that time?

Crippes. Captain Coote was the first man that went into the chair when we came to the Greyhound tavern; afterwards he came out again, and when we took him up the second time, he was the first man that set out; and he bid us carry him to Leicester-fields; and when we came to the corner of St. Martin's-lane, we turned up that way; and my lord of Warwick, and my lord Mohun, called to us, being in chairs behind, to know whither we were going, and desired to speak with captain Coote; and he said he was going to Leicester-fields; and when they asked, what to do? He said, to end the business: they desired him to put it off till to-morrow; and while they were discoursing about it in St. Martin's-lane, there passed by other three chairs, which, when captain Coote saw, he bid us take up and overtake them, and go faster, or he would run one of us into the body: so we went on, and at the lower end of Leicester-fields we set him down; and the other two gentlemen, my lord Warwick and my lord Mohun, were there set down, and went lovingly together, for any thing that I saw, up the pavement of the square, towards the upper end; and in a little time we heard a noise of calling for chairs towards the upper end, and when we came there with the chair, we were bid to lift over the chair within the rails; and when we said it was hard to be done, they insisted upon it, and we did come in; and when we came there we saw two gentlemen holding up captain Coote, and would have had us taken him into the chair; we saw there was a great deal of blood, but I never heard how it came, and they would have had us carried him to a French surgeon's, and proffered any money.

Att. Gen. My lord, I desire to know, who they were that desired him to be carried to the surgeon?

L. H. S. You hear the question, what say you?

Crippes. I cannot tell, my lord; one of them had something of lace upon him, but it was so dark that I could hardly see my hand, and therefore I cannot tell who they were; and when there was an objection made, that the chairs might be spoiled, they said, we need not question our chair, they would give us 100*l*. security to answer any damages, if we would but carry him; so we endeavoured to put him into the chair, but could not; and so we called out to the watch, to have had some help; but they said it was none of their ward, and so they would not come to us; so the gentlemen went away, and we left them, and went and called a surgeon, who, when he came, said, he was a dead man, and we were secured till the next day.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, I desire he may be asked, Were there not other chairs in that place at that time?

Crippes. There was one in the Field besides, and no more that I could see; they all went away but us two.

Att. Gen. What distance of time was there between their setting down in Leicester-fields, and their calling the chairs again?

Crippes. Not a quarter of an hour.

Att. Gen. What became of the three chairs that passed by you in St. Martin's-lane?

Crippes. They got before us; but what became of them afterwards I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Did they come from the same place, the tavern in the Strand that you were at?

Crippes. Yes, I believe they did, my lord; for capt. Coote bid us follow them, and threatened us if we did not make greater haste.

Att. Gen. Do you know my lord of Warwick?

Crippes. Yes, he had whitish cloaths on; and none but he had such clothes on as those were.

L. H. S. Will your lordship ask this witness any questions?

E. of Warwick. My lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether I did not bid him stop? and, whether I did not say, they should not go to quarrel that night?

Crippes. Yes; both he and my lord Mohun would not have had captain Coote gone any where, but home to his lodgings.

Att. Gen. My lord, I desire to know of him, directly and downright, Whether my lord of Warwick was not one of them that held him when he was within the rails in the fields?

Crippes. No, he was not; he was neither of them; for the one of them was too big for him, and the other was too little for my lord Mohun.

Att. Gen. Now we call the chairman that carried the earl of Warwick into Leicester-fields, James Crattle. (He was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Will you tell my lords what you know of any person that you carried the 29th or 30th of October last, from the Greyhound tavern in the Strand, and who it was, and whether you carried him?

Crattle. I was going along Charing-cross, between one and two in the morning, the 30th of October last, and I heard a chair called for at Locket's at the Dog tavern; and thither I and my partner went, and we took up the gentleman, and carried him to Leicester-fields.

Att. Gen. Who was that gentleman?

Crattle. It was my lord of Warwick.

Att. Gen. What time of night do you say it was?

Crattle. It was about one or two in the morning.

Att. Gen. What day of the week was it?

Crattle. It was Saturday night and Sunday morning.

Att. Gen. Whither did you carry him?

Crattle. Into Green-street, towards the lower end of Leicester-square.

Att. Gen. What chairs were there more there?

Crattle. There was one that captain Coote was in, and another that my lord Mohun was in, and we went away all together.

Att. Gen. Were there no other chairs?

Crattle. I did not know who went in the other chairs, but there were three other chairs that passed by us at St. Martin's-lane, and we followed after them to Leicester-fields.

Att. Gen. Pray what became of you after you had set down your fare?

Crattle. We were discharged and paid; the other three went up towards my lord of Leicester's; but we were coming away, and in a little time we heard the noise of calling chairs! chairs! again, and there were two chairs did come up, Thomas Browne's and our's; my lord of Warwick called our chair, and we took him into it, and he bid us carry him to the Bagnio in Long-acre; and when we came there we knocked at the door, and his hand was bloody, and he asked us if we had any handkerchief to bind up his hand.

Att. Gen. Was there any other chairs at the door of the Bagnio, at the same time when you came there?

Crattle. Yes, there was another chair there at the door at the same time, and we set down both together.

Att. Gen. Pray whence came that chair?

Crattle. Indeed, I do not know.

Att. Gen. Who were the chairmen that carried that chair?

Crattle. Indeed, my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick were the only persons that I knew of all the company.

Att. Gen. What sort of gentleman was the other, that went out of the other chair into the house?

Crattle. He was a pretty tall man; when he was in we went away; I only can say, I saw my lord of Warwick go into the house.

Att. Gen. Did you take any notice of any sword that my lord of Warwick had in his hand at that time?

Crattle. No; I cannot say I did take any notice of any sword, only that there was a handkerchief desired.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you hear no noise at all in the field, till you heard chairs called for again?

Crattle. No; I cannot say I heard any noise in the field.

Att. Gen. Did you apprehend there was any fighting?

Crattle. No, I knew nothing at all of it; but upon the calling of chairs again, and my lord Warwick coming along, we took him in, and he bid us go to the Bagnio, and thither we went.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have done with this witness.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will you ask this witness any questions?

Earl of Warwick. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, our next witness is John Gibson; he was another of those chairmen that carried my lord of Warwick to the Bagnio afterwards. Pray, will you give my lords an account what you know; who you carried the 29th and 30th of October last, and whither you carried them? (Who was sworn.)

Gibson. My lord, I was at Charing-Cross with my partner the 29th of October last, at night, and about one or two o'clock in the morning chairs were called for to the Grey-hound-tavern in the Strand; and when we came there, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and Mr. Coote got into the three first chairs, and we got my lord Warwick into our chair, and when we had him there, we were bid to go towards Leicester-fields, as I apprehended, for thither the chairs that went first was to go; and indeed my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick did call to stop at the end of St. Martin's-lane, and asked Mr. Coote whither he was going? and he said, he was going to make an end of the business; and they said it should not be to-night; but presently after three other chairs coming along, and passing before us, the chair that captain Coote was in was bid to go on, and we were ordered to follow, which was done accordingly; just at the turning of Green-street we set down our three chairs; and, I think, just about the turning of Green-street end we staid till there came another chair again; and we and the other chair, upon my lord Warwick's coming into us, went away from thence, and carried him to the Bagnio in Long Acre.

Att. Gen. You talk of another chair; pray, whose chair was that?

Gibson. There was another chair that was got there just before us; but indeed I do not know whose it was, nor indeed can I say who it was that was in it; but this I am sure, we went to the same place; and we met and lit just at the same time; and my lord of Warwick asked for a handkerchief to bind up his hand, which was bloody; which was given him.

Att. Gen. Did you not know who was in the other chair at that time?

Gibson. No, indeed, I did not know, I will assure you.

Att. Gen. Pray did you not know where that other chair took the other gentleman up?

Gibson. No, indeed, sir, I did not.

Att. Gen. Pray, what time of the night was it?

Gibson. It was between one and two in the morning.

Att. Gen. You talk of his hand being hurt, and that he called for a handkerchief: Did you see his hand bleed; and pray, in what nature was his wound?

Gibson. My lord, all I can say is, there was blood, and he wanted a handkerchief, and had one, for he said his hand was hurt; but in truth I did not take any notice what that hurt was, I did not see it; if my partner took notice of it, so; but else I can say nothing to it; but the handkerchief was afterwards asked again, and could not be had.

L. H. S. Would my lord of Warwick ask this witness any questions?

Earl of Warwick. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, our next witnesses are Robert Applegate and Peter Catro, who will give your lordship an account who they carried at this time.

L. H. S. Whom do you call first?

Att. Gen. Robert Applegate. (Who was sworn.)

L. H. S. What questions do you ask him, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. I desire that he would acquaint your lordship, what he knows of what passed at the Greyhound-tavern in the Strand, the 29th of October last, whom he carried, and whither he carried them?

Applegate. My lord, about one or two in the morning, a Sunday, the 29th or 30th of October last, I was going home with my partner and my chair, and I heard them calling at the Greyhound tavern in the Strand, Mr. Locket's, for coaches and chairs; there was no coach to be had that could be heard of; but coming up to the door, they said they wanted six chairs; and when we were there at the door, there came out first my lord Warwick, capt. Coote, and my lord Mohun; capt. Coote got into the first chair, and what directions he gave them I cannot tell; my lord of Warwick got into the next; and into ours, which was the third, my lord Mohun came in, and bid us take him up and carry him towards Westminster, and he ordered us to follow the chairs before: just as they turned at St. Martin's-lane, my lord Mohun called out and desired to stop, and at the Cross Keys tavern back-door all the three chairs came up together; and then my lord of Warwick and capt. Coote and my lord Mohun talked together; and I could hear my lord Mohun and my lord of Warwick desire capt. Coote to defer it, and put it by till another day; what it was, indeed I cannot tell: but while they were talking there, three chairs more came up on the other side of the way; and capt. Coote would needs go forward, and my lord Mohun and my lord of Warwick went with him; and so they were all set down at the lower end of Leicester-fields, at Green-street end. But in truth I did not see where the other three chairs set down those they carried.

Att. Gen. What then happened afterwards, can you tell?

Applegate. I cannot tell whether I had lighted my pipe, or just lighting it, when I heard chairs called again; upon which we run up with our chair towards the upper end of the fields, and there I did see my lord of Warwick within the rails, who bid us put over our chair into the fields; but we told him, if we did, we could not get it over again; and so we went with our chair to the corner of the fields; and when we came there, there came out captain French, who bid us open our chair, and let him in, for he did believe he was a dead man; and upon that we did take him in, and he bid us carry him with all the speed we could to the Bagnio in Long-Acre, and my lord of Warwick got into another chair behind; so we went to Long-Acre; and when we came to the door of the Bagnio, and captain French came out of the chair, he was so weak that he fell down upon his knees; and when he came out, I asked who should pay me, and desired to be discharged; and the earl of Warwick said, Damn ye, call for your money to-morrow; so they both went in at the Bagnio door together.

Att. Gen. Pray, who called for the chair first, captain French, or my lord of Warwick, in the fields?

Applegate. I cannot tell; but when I brought up my chair, I first saw my lord of Warwick, and he would have had me lifted the chair over the rails, and I told him we could not get it over again, and so went up to the upper end of the fields.

Att. Gen. If you first spoke with my lord of Warwick, why did you not carry my lord of Warwick?

Applegate. Indeed I cannot tell; but I suppose it was because he did not come so soon out of the fields as captain French, or did not come the same way.

Att. Gen. Pray, do you remember any thing that happened just at their carrying capt. French away?

Applegate. Before he went into the chair, he stopped, and would have pulled off his cloaths, but we would not let him.

Att. Gen. Did you see any sword capt. French had?

Applegate. I did see no sword that I can say directly was a sword; but capt. French had something in his hand, but what it was I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. What was it that he said to you, when he first went into the chair?

Applegate. He desired to be carried to the Bagnio; for he said he believed he was a dead man.

Att. Gen. Pray friend, recollect yourself, if you heard him say any thing at all when he first went into the chair at the Greyhound tavern?

Applegate. I did not hear him mention any thing at all.

Att. Gen. Pray what did you hear my lord of Warwick say at that time?

Applegate. Truly, I cannot say I heard him mention any thing at all neither; but I did hear my lord Mohun say, when he could not prevail, in St. Martin's-lane, with captain Coote to go home, that if they did go he would go and see it.

Att. Gen. If they did go; who did he mean by they?

Applegate. My lord Warwick and captain Coote that were in the other chairs; there was nobody else to speak to.

Att. Gen. Was there any talk of fighting or quarrelling?

Applegate. No, indeed, I do not know of any difference there was between them.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will your lordship ask this witness any questions?

Earl of Warwick. My lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether I did not endeavour to put off the going into Leicester-fields, and to have all things let alone till to-morrow.

Applegate. My lord, I cannot say any thing of that; but I did hear my lord Mohun beg heartily of captain Coote to go home, and let the business alone till another time; and indeed I think, I never heard a man beg more heartily for an alms at a door, than he did, that they might not go into the fields then; but I cannot say that I heard any thing that my lord of Warwick said about it.

L. H. S. Will your lordship ask him any other questions?

Earl of Warwick. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Did my lord of Warwick express any inclination to go on?

Applegate. Indeed I know not any thing one way or other.

L. Jeffreys. My lords, if I am not mistaken, he did say, that he did not see any thing of inclination in my lord of Warwick to go on; but I desire, if your lordships please, that he may be asked this question, Whether he did see any thing in my lord of Warwick that shewed any inclination to the contrary?

Applegate. All that I can say is, I heard my lord Mohun say, Pray let's go home and lie all together, and let us put off this business to another time; but indeed I do not remember that my lord of Warwick said one word of going any way backward or forward.

Att. Gen. Pray, who did my lord Mohun speak these words to?

Applegate. My lord Mohun spoke to my lord of Warwick and captain Coote, both.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness?

Att. Gen. Peter Catro. [Who was sworn.]

L. H. S. What do you ask him, Sir?

Att. Gen. He was the other chair-man that carried my lord Mohun; Pray, will you give my lords an account what you know passed at the time when you carried my lord Mohun to Leicester-fields?

Catro. I and my fellow carried my lord Mohun from the Greyhound-tavern in the Strand, till we came to the turning up of St. Martin's-lane, where my lord Mohun desired that our three chairs might stop, and that they might go down to Westminster, and that my lord Warwick and capt. Cooté would go thither, and he would wait upon them to their lodging; capt. Cooté made answer again something, but what I cannot tell, and his chair went on; and my lord Mohun did say, if they went forward, he would follow them, and see what would come of it.

Att. Gen. What did you see happen while you were in St. Martin's-lane?

Catro. There were other three chairs that went by while we stood at the Cross-Keys tavern-door, and captain Cooté's chair going forward, we followed and went to the end of Leicester-fields, at Green-street end; and there all three went out of their chairs and walked tip the paved stones of the square; my lord of Warwick asked my lord Mohun if he had any silver, and three shillings were given for the three chairs, and they went from us, and bid us go about our business; and in a little while after we heard a noise from the upper end of the fields, calling chairs, again.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any thing of quarrel or difference between them, or any clashing of swords?

Catro. Indeed I heard nothing of any quarrel, for we were at the lower end of the square, at Green-street end; and when we heard them call for chairs again, we went up towards the upper end of the fields; and when we came there, we heard one bid us bring up the chair over the rails.

Att. Gen. Who was that?

Catro. Indeed, my lord, I cannot tell, for I was behind the chair, and could not see who it was; but we saying that we could not get it over again if we did, we went up to the upper end of the fields, and there was capt. French, I think it was, for I did not perfectly see him, being at the hind-part of the chair; and we went on to the bagnio in Long-Acre; and I did see my lord Warwick come out of his chair at the bagnio door, for there they were set down.

Att. Gen. You say you saw my lord of Warwick at the bagnio door; did you see any sword as my lord of Warwick had, or capt. French?

Catro. No, I did not see any sword at all of either of them.

Att. Gen. What do you know of capt. French his declaring he was wounded?

Catro. I think it was either when he went into the chair, or in Newport-street end, he called out to have the chair opened; for, says he, I think I am a dead man, and would have pulled off his cloaths; and when we were at the bagnio door, we tarried a pretty while till they got them up to let them in; and asking if we should wait, my lord of Warwick bid us come to that house to-morrow morning for our money; and they went in together into the house, but I never heard any one word of quarrel or dissatisfaction passed between them.

Att. Gen. This witness speaks to the same purpose as the other did; and I think we need not trouble your lordship any further as to that.

L. H. S. Would my lord of Warwick ask him any questions?

Earl of Warwick. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then our next witness is one John Palmer. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Pray, will you give my lords an account, who it was you did carry in your chair the 29th or 30th of October last, and whither you carried him?

Palmer. About one o'clock in the morning, the 30th of October, we were called to the Greyhound Tavern in the Strand, to Mr. Locket's, and there we took up a gentleman, one captain French.

Att. Gen. Whither did you carry him?

Palmer. He bid us go to Leicester-fields.

Att. Gen. What did he particularly say to you?

Palmer. There were three other chairs that were just gone before from the same door, and he bid us get before all those chairs; and just as we come to St. Martin's-lane end, we saw there were three other chairs set down before us over against the Cross Keys tavern back door.

Att. Gen. Well, what did you do then?

Palmer. So we went before, according as we were bid, unto Leicester-fields, and at the upper end of the fields, by Leicester-house, we opened the door, and captain French came out, and he gave us a shilling, and we went away about our business.

Att. Gen. Were there any more chairs there that went with you?

Palmer. There were two more chairs that set down two other gentlemen by Leicester-house, and we came away when we were paid; that is all I know.

Att. Gen. Did you see any other chairs besides your three when you came down again, or any other gentlemen?

Palmer. We did see some gentlemen walking up about the middle of the square when we came down, but we made what haste we could away home, it being late on Sunday morning.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any fighting when you were in the field?

Palmer. I did not hear or discern any fighting while I was there.

Att. Gen. Did you hear of any quarrel, or any thing between any of them, and whom, before?

Palmer. No, I did not know of any quarrel, or hear of any thing at all, I do assure you.

Att. Gen. All that he says then, my lord, is, That he carried capt. French to the upper end of Leicester-fields, and there he left him.

L. H. S. Would my lord Warwick ask this witness any questions?

E. of War. I desire he may be asked, whether he knows, who were in the chairs that were in St. Martin's-lane, when they passed by?

L. H. S. You hear the question, What say you to it?

Palmer. There were three chairs, but who they were that were in them I cannot tell directly ; but as they said, when they set them down at Leicester-fields, they were my lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, and Mr. Coote.

Att. Gen. Who was it that said so ?

Palmer. Some of the other chairmen when I came by.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness ?

Att. Gen. We shall call next the chairmen that carried Mr. Dockwra and Mr. James : Call Jackson the chairman. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. This man carried capt. James : Pray acquaint my lords, who you did take up at Locket's in the Strand on the 29th or 30th of October last, and whither you carried him ?

Jackson. I carried capt. James from Locket's in the Strand into Leicester-fields.

Att. Gen. How many chairs were you that went ?

Jackson. There were two more that went when I went ; there were six in all that took up gentlemen there, and we were the last but one.

Att. Gen. Can you tell who were in the other three first chairs ?

Jackson. I do not know who were in the other chairs, but I heard my lord Mohun at the door of the house desire, that the business might be deferred till to morrow morning : there were six gentlemen at the door, but truly who they all were I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Who did my lord Mohun speak that to ?

Jackson. Indeed I do not know who he spoke it to.

Att. Gen. What answer was made to my lord Mohun ?

Jackson. Truly, there was no answer that I heard, but we all went away soon after that, and we were bid to go to Leicester-fields to follow the other chairs ; and when we came to the other end of Leicester-fields, we set down captain James by the Standard tavern, and he gave us a shilling, and bid us go our ways ; so we went our way, and I heard nothing afterwards, but came away down the fields, and there were three chairs that stood at the bottom of the fields ; and we asked them, what they stayed there for ? And they said, to fill a pipe of tobacco : And presently after, we heard call chairs again ; but it was late, and it was Sunday morning, and my partner said let us go away home ; and we did so, we went directly home.

Att. Gen. Did you carry nobody back ?

Jackson. No, we carried nobody back.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have done with this witness ; our next witness is one Richard Edwards, and he was one of the chairmen that carried Mr. Dockwra. (He was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Pray will you acquaint my lords, Whether you carried any body from Locket's the 29th of October, and who it was, and whither you carried him ?

Edwards. I do not know who I carried, but they were, calling coaches at the Greyhound tavern in the Strand, and no coaches coming, they called for chairs, and so our chair was brought up.

Att. Gen. When you came there, who did you see there ?

Edwards. Indeed I did not know my lord of Warwick, nor my lord Mohun, nor any of them.

Att. Gen. Well, what do you know ? tell my lords what happened.

Edwards. When we were there, there went two into two chairs ; and my lord Mohun said, or another gentlemen, I cannot tell which, that the chairs should not go away, that they would kill any man that should go away ; and they went out of the chairs, and went into the house again.

Att. Gen. And what happened after they went into the house again ?

Edwards. After they went out of the chairs into the house again, as I was told, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and Mr. Coote, went into three chairs, and went away from the door ; and there were three chairs of us that went last.

Att. Gen. Whither did you go with your chair ?

Edwards. We went to the Standard tavern at the end of Leicester-fields, and when we came to the tavern door, we asked him if we should knock at the door ; he said no ; but he gave us a shilling, and bid us go about our business, and so we did, for we went sheer away to Charing-Cross.

Att. Gen. Pray can you tell who were in the other chairs ?

Edwards. Truly I cannot tell any man that was in our three chairs, for I was the hind-chairman, and did not know any of them.

Att. Gen. My lord, I desire to know what he means by hind-chairman ?

Edwards. My lord, ours was the last chair that went to Leicester-fields, and I was behind the chair, and never could see any of them, it being so very dark after they took the chairs, till we came to Charing-Cross, at St. Martin's-lane ; and then I could not see who the particular persons were that were in the chairs ; nor indeed, whose the chairs were that carried them.

Att. Gen. What hour was it ?

Edwards. It was very late, between one and two in the morning ; it was past one before we were called out.

Att. Gen. You say you went to the upper end of Leicester-fields with two other chairs ; pray did you see any other chairs afterwards, and where ?

Edwards. We saw three chairs at the lower end of the square, as we came down by Green-street end, and we asked them, what they stayed there for ; and they said, to light a pipe of tobacco.

Att. Gen. Pray, who had been carried in those chairs, can you tell ?

Edwards. I did not see them set down any body, and I cannot tell who they carried ; and as for the person that we carried, I did not so much as see him to know him, nor know who he was ; but we went away as soon as ever we were paid.

Att. Gen. I have one question more to ask you ; you say, that my lord of Warwick at the tavern door bid you stay, and that none should go away, and swore he would run any man through that should go away ?

Edwards. It was my lord Mohun ; and then two that had gone into the chairs, went into the house again.

Att. Gen. Did not you say that there was some talk of going to Westminster ?

Edwards. My lord Mohun did talk of going to Westminster, when they went into the chairs the second time ; and I think I heard Mr. Coote say, he would make an end of it then, and he would kill any man that would not go forwards to Leicester-fields.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will you ask this witness any more questions ?

Earl of Warwick. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, have you any more evidence to call ?

Att. Gen. My lord, the next piece of evidence that we should apply ourselves to, will be to what happened at the Bagno in Long-acre, after my lord Warwick and capt. French came there : and the witness that we shall call is Pomfret, and he is a servant at the Bagno in Long-acre, and he will acquaint your lordships who came thither the 30th of October last, and what happened there.

L. H. S. What is his name ?

Att. Gen. Henry Pomfret.

L. H. S. Is he sworn ?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. What is it that you examine him about ? What questions do you ask him, Mr. Attorney ?

Att. Gen. Who came to his master's house, and at what time they came ?

Pomfret. My lord, on Sunday the 30th of October last, between two and three in the morning, there came to my master's door the earl of Warwick, and knocked at the door, and there was capt. French with him ; and when they were let in, my lord of Warwick told me that capt. French was wounded, and he himself had a wound, and he desired that my master might be called up for to dress the wounds ; especially, because capt. French was very much wounded ; which accordingly was done in about a quarter of an hour after they were brought in.

Att. Gen. Did he desire to be concealed when he was come in ?

L. H. S. Of whom do you speak, Mr. Attorney ?

Att. Gen. My lord of Warwick.

Pomfret. He did desire, that if any body asked for him, it should be said he was not there.

Att. Gen. Pray in what condition did my lord of Warwick seem to be in at that time ?

Pomfret. He seemed to be very much concerned at that time, and his right hand, in which he had his sword, and which was drawn, was very much bloody.

Att. Gen. Was the sword bloody that he had in his hand ?

Pomfret. The blade was bloody ; but whether it was all over bloody, I cannot tell ; there was besides some blood upon the shell ; it was very near all over bloody, as I remember.

Att. Gen. Pray, friend, consider what you swore at the Coroner's Inquest about the blood upon the sword.

Pomfret. Indeed I cannot say it was bloody all along the blade ; but there was blood upon the shell, and there was blood upon the inside ; it was so, to the best of my remembrance.

Att. Gen. What condition was Mr. French's sword in ?

Pomfret. He had a drawn sword in his hand, but I did not perceive it had any blood upon it : it was a large blade.

Att. Gen. How do you know what sort of sword Mr. French's was, and in what condition it was ?

Pomfret. He desired me to take notice of it next morning, and I did so ; and there was no blood upon it.

Att. Gen. How came you to be desired to take notice of what passed there about the swords ?

Pomfret. My lord, there was three of them the next day, and one, it was said, was Mr. Coote's, and another of them was my lord of Warwick's, which I do believe was bloody from the point upwards, very near ; but I cannot directly say but that was afterwards.

Att. Gen. Who brought in that sword that you say was Mr. Coote's ?

Pomfret. To the best of my remembrance, capt. Dockwra brought it in ; it was almost half an hour after my lord Warwick and capt. French came into the house, when they came thither.

Att. Gen. They, who do you mean ?

Pomfret. Captain James and he.

Att. Gen. Were they let in presently ?

Pomfret. No, My lord of Warwick had desired that they might be private there ; but when they knocked at the door, my lord of Warwick desired to know who they were ; and when it was understood that they were Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra, they were let in by my lord's order.

Att. Gen. Pray, which of all the four brought in any sword in a scabbard ?

Pomfret. It was captain Dockwra.

Att. Gen. Pray, did they appear to be all of a party ?

Pomfret. They were glad to see one another ; and they talked a pretty while together ; but indeed I cannot say I heard what they talked.

Att. Gen. Pray, do you remember my lord of Warwick's sword, and what there was upon it ?

Pomfret. It was a steel sword, water-gilt, and as near as I can remember, there was blood upon it for the most part from the point upward.

Att. Gen. And what did appear upon Mr. French's sword?

Pomfret. There was water and dirt, but there was no blood at all.

Att. Gen. How long did they stay there?

Pomfret. They all continued about half an hour; and then went away, all but Mr. French, who staid there.

Att. Gen. What then became of the others?

Pomfret. Mr. James, Mr. Dockwra, and my lord of Warwick went away; and my lord of Warwick desired particularly, that we would all take care of Mr. French, for he was his particular friend; and Mr. French continued there till Sunday about one of the clock.

Att. Gen. Was there any discourse at that time about Mr. Coote?

Pomfret. Not that I heard of, one word.

Att. Gen. Was there any notice taken of any quarrel that happened between any body, and who?

Pomfret. No, indeed, I did not hear them take notice of any quarrel at all between any body.

Att. Gen. You say Mr. French, when he came into your house, was wounded, and there was care particularly taken of him because he was wounded.

Pomfret. Yes; my lord of Warwick desired to take care of him.

Att. Gen. Then pray, was there no discourse how he came to be wounded?

Pomfret. Indeed I do not know how he came to be wounded; nor did I hear one word of discourse about it; indeed I cannot say any thing who wounded him.

Att. Gen. Pray will you recollect yourself, and tell my lords what sort of handle had my lord of Warwick's sword when you saw it.

Pomfret. It had a steel handle.

Att. Gen. Pray, can you tell whether the shell was open or close?

Pomfret. I cannot tell justly; I saw it, and that was all.

Att. Gen. If I apprehend you, you say my lord had a wound in his hand.

Pomfret. Yes, my lord, he had so.

Att. Gen. Pray, in what hand was it that he was wounded?

Pomfret. To the best of my remembrance, it was in his right hand.

Att. Gen. Pray, did there appear much blood there?

Pomfret. Yes, my lord, indeed there did.

Serj. Wright. You talk of Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra's swords; pray in what condition were they?

Pomfret. Mr. Dockwra's sword was by his side, and not drawn.

Serj. Wright. What did you observe of captain James's sword?

Pomfret. His sword was naked, and he had lost his scabbard; but how that came I cannot tell; and there was dirt on one side of the sword; and he said he had left his scabbard behind him.

Att. Gen. Was there any blood upon his sword?

Pomfret. No, there was no blood that I did see upon it.

Att. Gen. Pray did you see any blood upon Mr. Dockwra's sword?

Pomfret. No, indeed, I did not see Mr. Dockwra's sword, it was in the scabbard by his side.

D. of Leeds. My lords, there has been notice here taken of several swords that this witness saw; and he takes so far notice of my lord of Warwick's sword, that he tells you what sort of hilt it had, and how it was bloody from the point to the hilt; I desire he would give you an account of the length and breadth of the other men's swords, Mr. French, Mr. James, and Mr. Dockwra's.

L. H. S. You said just now, that you took notice of my lord of Warwick's sword, that it was bloody from the point to the hilt; what sort of sword was it?

Pomfret. It was a pretty broad sword.

L. H. S. Did you take notice of the other swords, what breadth or length they were of?

Pomfret. No, my lord, I did not.

Att. Gen. Which was that sword that was dirty, as you say?

Pomfret. That was captain French's.

Att. Gen. Was that a broad sword or not?

Pomfret. No, it was not.

Att. Gen. Pray, was it over night or next morning that you saw the swords?

Pomfret. It was in the morning about three a'clock.

Att. Gen. What time did my lord of Warwick, and Mr. James, and Mr. Dockwra go away?

Pomfret. My lord of Warwick and they were gone several hours before Mr. French; and to the best of my remembrance, Mr. James broke his sword upon the floor after he came in.

Att. Gen. Pray, what swords were there in all that you saw there?

Pomfret. There was capt. French's, capt. James's, my lord of Warwick's, and one Mr. Coote's, as Mr. French said when it was brought in.

L. H. S. Have you done with this witness, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord, we have.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will you ask him any questions?

E. of Warwick. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Then, Mr. Attorney, call your next witness.

Att. Gen. Our next witness is Thomas Goodall, who is a servant at the Bagnio in Long Acre, as well as this man that was last. (He was sworn.)

L. H. S. What questions do you ask him, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. My lord, I desire he would acquaint your lordships, what time it was my lord of Warwick and capt. French came to his master's house?

Goodall. It was between one and two o'clock in the morning.

Att. Gen. My lord, I desire he would acquaint your lordships what he saw and knows, that passed at that time?

Goodall. All that I can say is, that I did see my lord of Warwick's sword bloody, and it was naked in his hand, and I did see a wound on his hand: indeed I did not see him when he first came in, for he had been there a pretty while before I saw him.

Att. Gen. Pray, in what condition was my lord when you saw him?

Goodall. He had his sword in one hand, and it was bloody at the blade and at the hilt; but whether it was bloody all over, indeed I did not take notice of it, and so cannot give an account.

Att. Gen. Pray, what sort of sword was it?

Goodall. Indeed I cannot give an account what sort of sword it was, but it was either steel or silver gilt, as I remember; but I did take notice that there was blood upon the hilt, that is, upon the shell.

Att. Gen. Was it an open shell, or a close one?

Goodall. I think it was a close one.

Att. Gen. Pray, did my lord of Warwick give any order to be denied in the house, or for any concealment there?

Goodall. Indeed I did not hear of any orders given for concealing of any body there; but my lord walked up and down very much concerned.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. French come in with him?

Goodall. I do believe he might: but I cannot say I saw him when he came in.

Att. Gen. Can you tell when Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra came in? How long was that after my lord of Warwick was there, and Mr. French?

Goodall. To the best of my remembrance and knowledge, it was half an hour after my lord of Warwick and Mr. French came, that Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra came: I am sure it was so before I saw them in the house; but indeed I cannot say directly when they came in, or when they went out.

Att. Gen. Pray, which hand of my lord of Warwick was it that was hurt, the right or the left?

Goodall. Indeed, I cannot positively say; but I think it was the right hand.

Att. Gen. You talk of my lord of Warwick's sword; did you take any notice of Mr. French's sword?

Goodall. No, indeed; I was busy about the affairs of the house; I did see my lord of Warwick's sword, but that was by chance, and it was bloody at the hilt, and upon the blade; but whether it were all over bloody, indeed I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. I desire to ask him, Whether he can tell who brought in Mr. Coote's sword thither?—Goodall. Indeed I cannot.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney-General, have you any more questions to ask him?

Att. Gen. No, my lord, not I.

L. H. S. My lord of Warwick, will you ask him any questions?

E. of Warwick. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness?

Att. Gen. My lord, our next witness is Mrs. A. Goodall, this man's wife. [Who was sworn.]

L. H. S. What questions do you ask this gentlewoman?

Att. Gen. I desire that she would acquaint your lordships, whether she was at the Bagnie in Long-acre when my lord of Warwick and capt. French came in?

A. Goodall. I was there when my lord of Warwick came in.

Att. Gen. Was capt. French with him?

A. Goodall. Yes, captain French was with him.

Att. Gen. About what o'clock was it that they came there?

A. Goodall. It was about two o'clock, as near as I can remember.

Att. Gen. In what condition were they when they came in, pray?

A. Goodall. Mr. French was very much wounded.

Att. Gen. Pray, how was my lord of Warwick?

A. Goodall. My lord had his sword in his hand, and it was very bloody, both at the hilt, and upon the blade.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any wound that my lord had?

A. Goodall. I think, to the best of my remembrance, my lord had his hand wrapped up in a handkerchief, which was bloody; but I was busy up and down in the house, and I cannot so well tell what hand it was; I was indeed up and down there while they were there.

Att. Gen. Do you know of any orders that were given by my lord of Warwick to be concealed while he was there?

A. Goodall. He did desire the door might not be opened to any body that asked for him, and that it might not be said that he was there; and when the other two gentlemen came to the door, he went to the door himself, and when he saw who they were, he ordered them to be let in.

Att. Gen. What was the occasion of his going to the door himself?

A. Goodall. There was a knocking at the door, and he had a mind to know who it was; and when it did appear it was Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra, he himself ordered them to be let in.

Att. Gen. How came the door to be open to them?

A. Goodall. Indeed I think he opened it himself.

Att. Gen. How long was that after he and capt. French came in?

A. Goodall. It was about half an hour.

Att. Gen. When they first came in, what posture were they in? Had they any swords in their hands?

A. Goodall. I did not positively take notice, whether they had any swords in their hands, nor what they had when they came in.

Att. Gen. What became of them afterwards?

A. Goodall. My lord of Warwick, Mr. James, and Mr. Dockwra, went away within a little while, and my lord of Warwick ordered particular care to be taken of Mr. French, as his friend, and he was put to bed after his wounds were dressed; but I cannot tell what afterwards became of my lord Warwick, and the other gentlemen.

Att. Gen. I think you were saying, that my lord of Warwick was wounded in the hand; which hand was it?

A. Goodall. I cannot positively say, whether it was the right or the left.

L. H. S. Will you who are of the king's counsel, ask this witness any further questions?

Att. Gen. No, my lord, we shall ask her no other questions.

E. of Warwick. No, my lord, nor I.

Att. Gen. Then our next witness is Henry Amy, who is a surgeon, and lives at the Bagnio in Long-acre; and he will give your lordship an account what passed within his knowledge at this time within his house, and who came thither wounded, and what particular care was ordered to be taken of Mr. French, and by whom.

(Mr. Amy was sworn.)

Att. Gen. I desire you will give an account to my lords what happened at your house early in the morning, the 30th of October last?

Amy. The 30th of October last, about two of the clock, I was knocked up out of my bed to attend two gentlemen, my lord Warwick and captain French, who came then into my house.

Att. Gen. In what condition were they?

Amy. They were both wounded; Mr. French very much, and my lord of Warwick in his hand.

Att. Gen. Did you see any swords?

Amy. Yes; they had both swords in their hands, and my lord of Warwick's sword was very bloody.

Att. Gen. Well, Sir, when they came into your house, what directions was given by my lord Warwick?

Amy. He gave directions, if any body should ask for him, they should say he was not there.

Att. Gen. Did any body come and ask for him?

Amy. While we were taking care of Mr. French, and dressing his wound, there were some persons came and knocked at the door, and my lord of Warwick did order, that nobody should be let in; but he himself went to the door, and when he found that it was Mr. Dockwra and Mr. James, my lord Warwick ordered that they should be let in.

Att. Gen. Pray tell my lords what followed after that?

Amy. After we had dressed Mr. French—

Att. Gen. By the way, was there any particular directions, and by whom, to take care of Mr. French?

Amy. Yes, my lord Warwick desired me to take care of him as his particular friend.

Att. Gen. Well then, after you had dressed Mr. French's wound, what happened?

Amy. I dressed my lord Warwick's wound.

Att. Gen. Pray, whereabouts was my lord of Warwick's wound?

Amy. It was near the first joint of his forefinger.

Att. Gen. Pray, how long did they stay there?

Amy. After Mr. Dockwra and Mr. James came in, and my lord's hand was dressed, they stayed a little while, and they three went away.

Att. Gen. What was said when they went away?

Amy. My lord of Warwick desired to have great care taken of Mr. French; and they said, Now let us go away; and they went away.

Att. Gen. Pray, what time did they stay in your house?

Amy. When they went away, I think it was about half an hour after they first came in.

Att. Gen. Did you take notice of no sword but my lord of Warwick's?

Amy. No, not then.

Att. Gen. Did you afterwards?

Amy. Afterwards in the morning, Mr. French called for his sword, and I looked upon it.

Att. Gen. Pray, in what condition was his sword? Was it bloody?

Amy. It was without blood, only a little dirty.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you observe that they talked of any quarrel that had been between capt. French and my lord, when they came in?

Amy. No.

Att. Gen. Did you ask them any questions about it, the one or the other of them?

Amy. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. Did you hear them say, how they came by their wounds?—Amy. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. Did you hear them talk of any body being killed, particularly Mr. Coote?

Amy. I did not know of any body being killed till next day.

Att. Gen. Did you take any notice of James's and Dockwra's swords?

Amy. Truly, I took no notice of any swords but my lord Warwick's, while my lord Warwick was there in the house; but the next morning Mr. French gave me his sword, and there was another sword there, which Mr. French told me was capt. Coote's sword.

Att. Gen. When was that? How long after my lord of Warwick, and James, and Dockwra, were gone away?

Amy. It was some hours after.

Att. Gen. When did you hear of Mr. Coote's being killed?

Amy. About nine o'clock next morning I heard of Mr. Coote's being killed.

Att. Gen. Whom did you hear it from?

Amy. From Pomfret, my servant.

Att. Gen. Did you hear no discourse between my lord of Warwick, capt. French, Mr. James, and Mr. Dockwra about it?

Amy. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. Did they not talk how those wounds came they had; nor did not you ask who gave them?

Amy. No, I did ask no question of either of them: and in half an hour after they came in, my lord of Warwick and the other two gentlemen went away.

Att. Gen. When they left French there, what orders were left about him?

Amy. Only to take care of him, my lord of Warwick desired that.

Att. Gen. What reason did my lord give for that?

Amy. I heard nothing of reason, only that he was his particular friend.

Att. Gen. Did you hear them talk any thing, whither they would go, when they went away?

Amy. I did hear some talk about going into the country.

Att. Gen. Do you know whither they went, when they went away from your house?

Amy. No, indeed I did not.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have done with him.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will your lordship ask this witness any questions?

E. of War. I desire to have him asked, whether I was not wounded in the hand.

Amy. His hand was very bloody, the handkerchief that was about it was wet with the blood.

E. of War. I desire to ask him, when it was that he saw capt. French's sword?

Amy. It was not before the morning; it was about nine o'clock, as I remember.

M. of Norm. Before this witness goes away, I desire he may be asked one question, whether he can tell the size of Mr. French's sword?

L. H. S. Here is a noble lord that desires to know, if you can tell about capt. French's sword, what sort of sword it was?

Amy. As to the blade, it was a middle-sized sword.

M. of Norm. Was it a broad blade or no?

Amy. No, my lord, it was not a broad blade.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness?

Att. Gen. Capt. Loftus Duckinfield. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. This gentleman will acquaint your lordships what discourse past between these gentlemen the next day; pray, Sir, acquaint my lords what you heard about Mr. Coote's death, and when and where.

Capt. Duck. Early in the morning I was told of this accident.

Att. Gen. By whom?

Capt. Duck. One of the company, I cannot tell who, I think they were all together then, my lord of Warwick, capt. James, capt. Dockwra, and nobody else.

Att. Gen. What was their discourse?

Capt. Duck. They said, they believed captain Coote was killed.

Att. Gen. Did they tell you by whom?

Capt. Duck. By Mr. French, every body did say he was his adversary.

Att. Gen. What account was given of the action?

Capt. Duck. They said it was done in the dark, and capt. French was his adversary.

Att. Gen. Was there any notice taken of any duel?

Capt. Duck. Yes, there was, between those two, and the other persons on both sides; and it was said my lord of Warwick was friend to Mr. Coote, and my lord Mohun.

Att. Gen. Who were on the other side?

Capt. Duck. Mr. Dockwra and Mr. James.

Att. Gen. Was there any discourse, who actually fought?

Capt. Duck. It was said, that capt. French fought with capt. Coote, as they believed, and Mr. James with my lord of Warwick.

Att. Gen. Did you see my lord of Warwick's sword?

Capt. Duck. Some time of the day I did; but I cannot tell whether it was in the morning, or no.

Att. Gen. In what condition was it? Was it bloody or not?

Capt. Duck. It was a steel sword.

Att. Gen. How long did they stay with you?

Capt. Duck. About half an hour.

Att. Gen. Did they come publicly?

Capt. Duck. We went away in a hackney coach together.

Att. Gen. Pray, what discourse was there about consulting to go into the country together?

Capt. Duck. That might be discoursed, but by whom I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Did my lord of Warwick talk of going into the country?

Capt. Duck. Whether the company talked of it, or my lord of Warwick in particular, and the rest assented to it, I cannot well tell.

Att. Gen. Whither did they go?

Capt. Duck. I cannot directly tell.

Att. Gen. What time of the day was it?

Capt. Duck. It was about six of the clock.

Att. Gen. Cannot you tell whither they went?

Capt. Duck. Capt. James and capt. Dockwra went to the Ship and Castle in Cornhill about five o'clock or six, as near as I can remember.

Att. Gen. Can you tell what time my lord of Warwick went away?

Capt. Duck. No, I cannot tell what time he went away, not directly.

Att. Gen. Can you tell of any agreement amongst them, whither they were to go?

Capt. Duck. No, I cannot.

Att. Gen. What discourse or concern did you observe past between them, concerning capt. Coote?

Capt. Duck. My lord of Warwick shewed a great deal of concern for his friend Mr. Coote.

Att. Gen. Had you any notice of Mr. Coote's death amongst you?

Capt. Duck. We had notice before we went away ; but I cannot tell whether it was before my lord of Warwick was gone.

Att. Gen. Was it after the discourse of going into the country, or before ?

Capt. Duck. Indeed, I cannot directly say when it was.

Att. Gen. Pray, what reason was there for their going into the country before he was dead ?

Capt. Duck. They believed he was dead.

Att. Gen. Cannot you tell the reason why they would go into the country ?

Capt. Duck. No, indeed, I cannot tell the reason.

Att. Gen. Did you observe my lord of Warwick's sword ? Was there any blood upon it ?

Capt. Duck. I cannot say his sword was bloody at the point ; the whole blade and shell was bloody, to the best of my remembrance.

Att. Gen. What sort of a sword was it ?

Capt. Duck. It was a pretty broad blade, a hollow blade, and a hollow open shell.

Att. Gen. Was there any discourse concerning capt. French ?

Capt. Duck. Yes, they thought he was very ill wounded.

Att. Gen. Was there any, and what discourse, who should give my lord of Warwick his wound ?

Capt. Duck. It was said, they believed capt. James gave my lord his wound.

Att. Gen. Pray, was there any blood upon Mr. James's sword, or was he wounded ?

Capt. Duck. I saw no wound upon capt. James, that I know of.

L. H. S. Do you believe that my lord Warwick's sword was bloodied with the hurt of his own hand, or any otherwise ?

Capt. Duck. I cannot tell ; it was a cut shell, and the outside bloody as well as the in.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will your lordship ask this witness any questions ?

E. of War. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, if you have any other witness, pray call them.

Another Witness was produced, that belonged to the Ship and Castle in Cornhill.

Att. Gen. This man will give you an account what passed at his house at that time, and between whom ; pray, will you tell my lords who was at your house the 30th of October last, and what past there then ?

Witness. My lord of Warwick, capt. James, and capt. Dockwra ; and when my lord of Warwick came in, I thought my lord was in a very great concern, and called for pen, ink, and paper, and I feared there was some quarrel in hand ; but they said no, the quarrel was over, and says my lord of Warwick, I am afraid poor Coote is killed.

Att. Gen. Did you observe any desire to be private ?

Witness. No, indeed, I cannot tell that.

Att. Gen. How long did they continue there ?

Witness. About six a'clock my lord of Warwick, and capt. James, and capt. Dockwra, and capt. Duckinfield went away.

Att. Gen. Can you tell who went with my lord Warwick ?

Witness. No, indeed, I cannot tell who went with my lord Warwick ; there came in a gentleman in black, whom I knew to be my lord of Warwick's steward, and he came and spoke some words to my lord of Warwick, about a quarter of an hour after they came in, and then they went away, for after that I did not hear any farther discourse.

Att. Gen. What became of the rest of the company ?

Witness. They went away ; I do not know what became of them, nor whither they went ; some of them went in and out of one room into another several times, two or three times, and came out again.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have done with this witness.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, will you ask him any questions ?—E. of War. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness ?

Att. Gen. Mr. Salmon, the surgeon, who by the coroner's order searched the wound. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, was you ordered by the coroner to view the body of Mr. Coote ?

Salmon. Yes, I was ordered by the coroner to inspect the body of capt. Coote, and to give the jury an account of the nature of the wounds.

Att. Gen. Pray, upon the view of the body, what wounds had he ?

Salmon. There was two wounds ; one on the breast near the collar bone, running downwards very deep.

Att. Gen. Pray, what part of the breast was it, and how deep was it ?

Salmon. It was on the left part of the breast near the collar bone, and it penetrated four or five inches.

Att. Gen. Can you guess at what sort of sword it was that made the wound ?

Salmon. No, indeed, Sir, I cannot.

Att. Gen. Was it a broad sword, or a little sword ?

Salmon. The orifice was about the length of half an inch, and about the depth of five inches.

Att. Gen. Was that made with a broad sword, or with a narrow sword ?

Salmon. Indeed, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. You say he had another wound ; where was that ?

Salmon. That was on his left side too, near unto the short ribs, under the last rib ; which was about the length of an inch, and of the depth of six inches, and it ran through the diaphragma.

Att. Gen. Did you take one of these wounds, or both of them to be mortal ?

Salmon. I did look upon either of them to be mortal, and to be the occasion of his death.

Att. Gen. Can you tell, whether they were both made with one and the same sword ?

Salm. Indeed I cannot tell that, whether they were made with one sword, or two.

Att. Gen. Cannot you tell how they appeared to be? I suppose you probed them.

Salm. Yes, I probed them both; one was quite through the diaphragma.

Att. Gen. What time was it that you viewed the body by the order of the coroner?

Salm. I saw the body at seven a-clock on Sunday night.

Att. Gen. If my lord of Warwick desire to ask him any questions, he may.

E. of War. My lord, I desire to ask him, whether any of the wounds were large enough to be made by a sword run up to the hilt?

Salm. No, my lord, sure they were not.

E. of War. My lord, I desire to know of him, whether both these wounds were given before or behind?

Salm. I can only tell you the length and depth by following of the probe; the one was downwards, and the other upwards.

Att. Gen. Do you suppose both those wounds were given when the person was standing, backward or forward?

Salm. It is impossible to tell how they were given, because of the variety of the postures of the body in the divers capacities thereby of receiving the wounds.

Att. Gen. Pray, can you tell whether they were given by one and the same sword, or no?

Salm. Indeed I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing to the contrary?

Salm. I cannot say any thing for it or against it.

E. of Kingston. My lords, this witness, if I apprehend him right, says, the wound on his side was a large wound.

Salm. Yes, a very large wound, of the length of about three quarters of an inch at the orifice, and five or six inches deep.

E. of Kingston. I desire he may tell whether that wound could be given by any other than a broad sword?

Salm. I cannot tell that.

E. of Rochester. Indeed, my lords, I would have him asked this question again; I know not whether he can answer it or no; but I cannot but think it is proper to have some account of this matter. In all enquiries before the coroner, there is a judgment to be made of the nature of the wound, in order to form the indictments, and that the jury may know with what sort of weapon it was made; and it is his profession as a surgeon to know such matters.

L. H. S. Mr. Salmon, you hear what is required of you by my noble lords, and the observation which is made. You are the surgeon sent for by the coroner on purpose to inspect this body; and when you did so, it was incumbent upon you to consider and give information, as well with what sort of instrument the wound was given, as the length and depth of the wound, that the jury might consider upon all the circumstances of the occasion, and manner of the party's death: and my lords would know, whether by the orifices of the wounds, when you inspected them, you can make a judgment, if they were made by several swords, or the same sword?

Salm. I cannot say that I saw any difference between the orifices, as to the nature of the instrument they were given with, nor whether they were made by one and the same sword or no; only the one orifice was bigger than the other; that of the side was bigger than that at the collar-bone.

L. H. S. Then so far we have light (if I apprehend you rightly), the orifice of the upper wound was not near so wide as that of the lower; but it seems to be much, in one of your profession, not to be able to judge whether the wounds were given with the same sort of sword when there was such a difference in the orifices.

Salm. That below was a deeper wound; and there was a considerable difference between the largeness of one and the other.

Lord Audley. My lords, I desire he may tell your lordships how far backward the wound in the side lay.

Salm. It was directly on the left side, immediately under the two last ribs, and past through the diaphragma.

M. of Normunby. Pray, my lords, let him point with his finger whereabouts it was.

L. H. S. My lords would have you shew them with your finger, whereabouts it was. (Which he did.)

E. of Warw. It is a very material question for me, that he should answer, whether he did believe that one and the same sword might not give both wounds.

Salm. I cannot say any thing of it one way or other; but one wound went much further than the other, because it was in a fleshy part; and in such a case, the further the sword goes in, it makes the wound larger.

Att. Gen. Then our next witness is Stephen Turner, who was Mr. Coote's man; and he will give you an account what sword his master had, and where he found it.

[He was sworn, a sword was shewn him.]

Turtler. This was my master's sword, Mr. Coote's; and I never saw it after he went out in the morning, till I saw it in the hands of the constable, and afterwards before the coroner.

Att. Gen. What time did you hear of your master's death?

Turner. It was about nine a-clock next morning that I heard he was dead.

Att. Gen. Where was your master's body?

Turner. It was in St. Martin's-lane.

Earl of Tankerville. I would desire he might be asked, whether his master used his left hand or his right?

Turner. I do believe he was a right-handed man. I did never see him fence. It was on the Sunday morning that I went to the Round-house, where I found my master dead.

E. of Warw. I desire he may be asked, whether he has not observed a particular kindness and friendship between his master and me?

Turner. Yes, my lord; I have several times waited upon my master, when my lord and he was together, and they were always very civil and kind one to another; and I never heard one word of any unkindness between them.

E. of Warw. Whether he knows of any quarrel that was between us?

Turner. No, I never did.

E. of Warw. Whether he did not use to lie at my lodgings sometimes?

L. H. S. You hear my lord's question: what say you? Did your master use to lie at my lord of Warwick's lodgings at any time?

Turner. Yes; very often.

Att. Gen. Pray call Pomfret again, and let him see the sword.

[Then he came in, and two swords were shewn him.]

Att. Gen. I desire he may acquaint your lordships what he knows of those two swords.

Pomfret. These two swords were brought in by some of the company that came to my master's house; and when they were shewn to captain French in the morning he owned this to be his, and the other to be Mr. Coote's; and he desired that notice might be taken, that his sword was dirty but not bloody; and there was some blood upon the other.

Att. Gen. Who brought in Mr. Coote's sword?

Pomfret. Indeed I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Then our last piece of evidence, my lord, will be that of Mr. White the coroner. (Who was sworn.)

L. H. S. What do you ask him, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. From whom had he these swords?

[The swords were shewn him.]

White. May it please your grace, these swords were delivered to me by the constable.

Att. Gen. My lords, I desire he may be asked, Whether, upon his view of the body, he looked upon the wounds; and, whether he did apprehend they were given by one and the same sword.

White. May it please your grace, when I had sworn my inquest, I sent for the surgeon that was here before, and gave him order to probe the wounds, that the jury might know the nature of them, in order to the drawing up the inquisition; and I did expressly ask him, whether he found any such distinction between them, that they were given by one and the same weapon, or different weapons: he said, as he says now, that he could not tell, whether the wounds were given by two swords, or by one; but he did apprehend there was a great difference between them, and so did I; but generally the orifice of a wound does close up when the body is cold: one of the wounds were nearer the left side than the other; to the best of my remembrance, it was almost behind him.

Att. Gen. We have done with our evidence, until we hear what my lord of Warwick says to it.

L. H. S. My lord of Warwick, will you ask this witness any questions?

E. of War. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Make proclamation for silence.

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes! His grace, my lord high steward of England, does strictly charge and command all manner of persons here present to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

L. H. S. My lord of Warwick, the king's counsel have made an end of giving evidence for the king; now is the proper time for you to enter upon your defence.

E. of War. May it please your grace, and you my noble lords, my peers,

I stand here before your lordships, accused of the murder of Mr. Coote, of which I am so innocent, that I came and voluntarily surrendered myself so soon as I heard your lordships might be at leisure to try me; and had sooner done it, but that the king was not then here, nor your lordships sitting, and had no mind to undergo a long confinement; and now I think I might well submit it to your lordships' judgment, even on the evidence that has been offered against me, whether there hath been any thing proved of malice prepense, or my being any actor therein, so as to adjudge me guilty. And I think I may with humble submission to your lordships say, that my innocence appeareth even from several of the witnesses who have been examined against me, which I will not trouble your lordships to repeat, but submit to your memory and observation.

But, my lords, the safety of my life does not so much concern me in this case, as the vindication of my honour and reputation from the false reflections to which the prosecutor has endeavoured to expose me; and I shall therefore beg your lordships' patience to give a fair and full account of this matter: in which the duty I owe to your lordships, and to justice in general, and the right I owe to my own cause in particular, do so oblige me, that I will not in the least prevaricate, neither will I conceal or deny any thing that is true.

My lords, I must confess I was there when this unfortunate accident happened, which must be a great misfortune in any case, but was more so to me in this, because Mr. Coote was my particular friend; and I did all I could to hinder it, as your lordships may observe by the whole proceedings.

It was on the Saturday night when my lord Mohun and I, and several other gentlemen, met at Locket's, where the same company used often to meet; and in some time after several of us had been there, Mr. Coote came unexpectedly, and for some time he and we were very friendly, and in good humour, as we used to be with each other: but then there happened some reflecting expressions from Mr. Coote to Mr. French, who thereupon called for the reckoning; and it being paid, we left the upper room, and I proposed to send three bottles of wine to my own lodging, and to carry him thither to prevent the quarrel. But while the company stopped to call for a glass of ale at the bar below, Mr. Coote (whose unfortunate humour was sometimes to be quarrelsome) did again provoke Mr. French to such degree, that they there drew their swords; but we then prevented them of doing any mischief: then Mr. Coote still insisting to quarrel further with Mr. French, my lord Mohun and I proposed to send for the guards to prevent them: but they had got chairs to go towards Leicester-fields; and my lord Mohun and I, as friends to Mr. Coote, and intending to prevent any hurt to him, did follow him in two other chairs; and as he was going up St. Martin's-lane, stopped him, and I extremely there pressed him to return and be friends with Mr. French, or at least defer it, for that the night was very dark and wet; and while we were so persuading of him, Mr. French in one chair, and Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra in two other chairs past by us, (which we guessed to be them) on which Mr. Coote made his chairmen take him up again, and because the chairmen would not follow Mr. French faster, threatened to prick him behind; and when we were gone to Green-street, and got out of our chairs, Mr. Coote offered half a guinea to be changed to pay for all our three chairs, but they not having change, he desired lord Mohun to pay the three shillings, which he did. And in a few minutes after, Mr. Coote and Mr. French engaged in the fields, whither I went for the assistance and in defence of Mr. Coote, and received a very ill wound in my right hand; and there this fatal accident befel Mr. Coote from Mr. French, whom Mr. Coote had dangerously wounded, and I must account it a great unhappiness to us all who were there: but so far was I from encouraging of it, that I will prove to your lordships that I did my utmost endeavours to prevent it; so far from any design upon him, that I exposed my own life to save him; so far from premeditated malice, that I will, by many witnesses of good quality and credit, prove to your lordships a constant, good and uninterrupted friendship, from the first of our acquaintance to the time of his death; which will appear by many instances of my frequent company and correspondence with him, often lending him money, and paying his reckonings; and about two months before his death lent him an hundred guineas towards buying him an ensign's place in the guards, and often, and even two nights before this, he lodged with me, and that very night I paid his reckoning. And when I have proved these things, and answered what has been said about the sword, and what other objections they have made, I doubt not but that I shall be acquitted to the entire satisfaction of your lordships, and all the world that hear it.

Before I go upon my evidence, I will crave leave further to observe to your lordships, that at the Old Bailey, when I was absent, Mr. French, James, and Dockwra, have been all tried on the same indictment now before your lordships; and it was then opened and attempted, as now it is, to prove it upon me also; and by most of them the same witnesses who have now appeared; and they were thereupon convicted only of manslaughter, which could not have been, if I had been guilty of murder. And on that trial it plainly appeared that Mr. French was the person with whom he quarrelled, and who killed him. And now I will call my witnesses.

L. H. S. Will your lordship please to go on to call your witnesses, for the proof of what you have said; that is the method, and then you are to make such observations as you please.

E. of War. My first witness is capt. Keeting, who was with me at Locket's, but went away before capt. Coote or any of them came; and he will tell you I was with him a while.

[Then captain Keeting stood up.]

L. H. S. Capt. Keeting, you are not upon your oath, because the law will not allow it. In cases of this nature the witnesses for the prisoner are not to be upon oath; but you are to consider that you speak in God's presence, who does require the truth should be testified in all causes before courts of judicature; and their lordships do expect, that in what evidence you give here, you should speak with the same regard to truth as if you were upon oath; you hear to what it is my lord of Warwick desires to have you examined, what say you to it?

Capt. Keeting. My lord, I will tell your lordship all the matter I know of it. I met with my lord of Warwick that evening at Tom's Coffee-house, and we continued there till about eight at night; I went away to see for a gentleman that owed me money, and afterwards I went to Locket's; and while I was there, the drawer came up and told me, my lord of Warwick desired to speak with me; and when he came up into the room, he said he was to meet with my lord Mohun there, and capt. Coote, and he asked me if I knew where capt. French and capt. James were; I told him I dined with capt. Coote at Shuttleworth's; and in a while after, capt. Coote came in, and about an hour and an half, I think, I continued there, and capt. French came in; capt. Dockwra and we drank together for an hour and an half, and they admired, about ten o'clock, that my lord Mohun was not come; and I paid my reckoning, not being very well, and away I went home; Mr. James came in just before I went away; but there was no quarrelling, nor any thing like it before I went away.

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may be asked, Whether we did not usually meet there as friends, especially capt. Coote and I?

Capt. Keeting. Captain Coote and my lord of Warwick used to be almost every day together at that place.

E. of War. Pray, did he ever know or observe any difference or quarrel between capt. Coote and me?

Capt. Keeling. No, my lord, I never saw any thing but the greatest friendship between my lord of Warwick and captain Coote that could be; I was with them, and saw them together almost every day.

L. H. S. Have you any thing further to examine this witness to?

E. of War. No, my lord, I have no other question to ask him.

L. H. S. Who is your next witness, my lord?

E. of War. My lord, I suppose I shall not need to trouble you to examine the chairmen over again; your lordships have heard what they can say: I desire colonel Stanhope may be called.

[Who it seems stood by the Chair of State, and it was some while before he could get round to come to the place where the witnesses were to stand.]

L. H. S. While this witness gets round, if your lordship has any other witness ready to stand up, pray let him be called.

E. of War. To prove the kindness between capt. Coote and me, I desire col. Blisset may be called. [Who stood up.]

L. H. S. What is it your lordship asks this witness, or calls him to?

E. of War. To testify what he knows of any kindness or unkindness between capt. Coote and me; whether he has not been often in our company?

L. H. S. Have you been often in company with my lord of Warwick and capt. Coote?

Col. Blisset. Yes, my lord, I was very well acquainted with both of them for a twelve-month past before this accident, and I have often been in their company, and always observed that there was a great deal of friendship and kindness between them.

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may tell any particular instance that he knows or can remember.

Col. Blisset. I remember when capt. Coote had his commission in the regiment of guards, he was complaining of the streightness of his circumstances; he was to pay for his commission 400 guineas, and said he had but 300 for to pay for it; and my lord of Warwick did then say to him, 'do not trouble yourself about that, or let not that disturb you, for I will take care you shall have 100 guineas, and he said he would give order to his steward to pay him so much; and I was told afterwards that he did so.

E. of War. I desire he may tell, if he knows of any other particular instances of my friendship to Mr. Coote?

Col. Blisset. Once when he was arrested by his taylor for 13l. my lord lent him five guineas, and used very frequently to pay his reckoning for him.

E. of War. I desire he may tell, if he knows any thing else; and whether he has not lain at my lodgings, and particularly but some small time before this accident happened.

Col. Blisset. About ten days before this unhappy accident happened, I was at my lord of Warwick's lodgings, and when I came there I found capt. Coote a-dressing himself; and I asked him how that came to pass, and they told me they had been up late together, and that he had sent home for his man to dress himself there; upon which I did observe that they had been a rambling together over night; and there was a very great familiarity between them.

E. of War. Did you observe any quarrel between us?

Col. Blisset. No, none at all; I never knew of any quarrel between my lord of Warwick and capt. Coote, but I observed there was a particular kindness between them; and a great deal of friendship I know my lord of Warwick shewed to him, in paying of reckonings for him, and lending him money when he wanted.

E. of War. My lord, I desire he may be asked, whether he does not know that capt. Coote was straitened for money?

Col. Blisset. I did hear capt. Coote say, that he had not received any thing from his father for 13 months, and his father was angry with him, and would not send him any supply, because he would not consent to cut off the entail, and settle two or three hundred pounds upon a whore he had.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, will you consider with yourself, and though you are not upon your oath, answer the questions truly, for you are obliged to speak the truth, though you are not sworn, whenever you come to give your testimony in a court of judicature; pray, acquaint my noble lords here, whether you did never hear my lord Warwick complain of capt. Coote?

Col. Blisset. No, I never did hear him complain of him.

Att. Gen. Did you never hear the least word of any quarrel between them?

Col. Blisset. No, indeed, I did never hear of any quarrel between them.

Att. Gen. Did you never hear of any unkindness at all?

Col. Blisset. No, indeed, my lord, not I: I never so much as heard of the least unkindness whatsoever.

L. H. S. Well then, my lord, who do you call next?

E. of War. Now colonel Stanhope is here, I desire he may be asked the same question, whether he does not know the particular friendship that was between capt. Coote and me, and what instances he can give of it?

L. H. S. You are to consider, Sir, though you are not upon your oath, you are in a great court, and under no less strict obligation to testify the truth, and nothing but the truth: You hear what my noble lord asks you.

Col. Stanhope. My lord, I have known my lord of Warwick and capt. Coote for about a twelvemonth, and I did perceive that they did always profess a great kindness for one another.

E. of War. I desire to know of him, whether he observed any particular friendship between capt. Coote and me, much about the time of this business?

Col. Stanhope. About eight or ten days before this unhappy accident, I went to wait upon my lord of Warwick twice at his lodgings: Once I found capt. Coote there, one of them was in bed, and the other was dressing of himself; I thought they were very good friends that were so familiar, and I had good reason to think so, because of that familiarity: Both the times that I was there, when I found them together, was within eight days before the accident happened.

E. of War. The next witness I shall call will be Mr. Disney.

Att. Gen. But before colonel Stanhope goes, I desire to ask him this question, whether he did never hear or know of any unkindness between my lord of Warwick and capt. Coote?

Col. Stanhope. No, indeed I did not; I always thought them to be very good friends.

L. H. S. Will your lordship go on to your next witness?

E. of War. Yes, my lord, there he is, Mr. Disney; I desire he may be asked what he knows of any expressions of kindness and friendship between me and capt. Coote.

Mr. Disney. About the time that capt. Coote was to have his commission in the guards, my lord of Warwick received a letter from him, wherein he desired him to lend him the 100 guineas, according to his offer, for he had but 300 by him; and he said his father was unkind to him, and he could have no money from him, and he would be honest to him, and pay it again as soon as he could; my lord sent for his steward, and ordered him to provide 100 guineas for capt. Coote while I was there; and all the times that ever I saw them together, which was very frequently, there was the greatest kindness between them that could be; and several times I have seen my lord of Warwick pay capt. Coote's reckoning for him, and lent him money when he wanted money.

Att. Gen. I desire to ask you, Sir, this question, though you are not upon oath, yet you are obliged to speak the truth in a court of justice as much as if you were upon oath: did you not know or hear any thing of a misunderstanding or quarrel about the time that this business happened?

Mr. Disney. No, indeed: I was with them together but the day before, and frequently, and I heard nothing of any unkindness between them in my life, nor never knew of any quarrel between them, or any reason for it.

L. H. S. My lord, who is it you call next?

E. of War. Colonel Whiteman. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What do you call this gentleman for?

E. of War. It is to the same effect, to acquaint your lordships with what he knows of the conversation between captain Coote and me.

Col. Whiteman. My lord, I know my lord of Warwick and capt. Coote were constant companions together; they dined together almost every day for half a year's time almost; and as to this time, when this business had happened, I went to my lord of Warwick, being sent for by him, and found him at a private lodging, where he expressed a great deal of concern for the death of his dear friend Mr. Coote; and he shewed me the wound he had received in his hand, and he desired he might be private, and he told me he believed people would make worse of it than it was, because he did not appear; but he did but intend to keep himself out of the way till he could be tried; and I took what care I could to get him a convenience to go to France.

Att. Gen. Pray, what reason did he give for his going away?

Col. Whiteman. The king being at that time out of England, and so the parliament not sitting, he said he did not love confinement, and had rather be in France till the parliament should meet, and he might have a fair trial, which he thought he should best have in this House.

Att. Gen. But pray, Sir, consider, you are bound to tell truth, and the whole truth, in such a case as this: are you sure there was no unkindness or quarrel between my lord Warwick and capt. Coote about this time?

Col. Whiteman. No; I never knew of any quarrel or unkindness between them in all my life.

L. H. S. My lord, have you any more witnesses?

Earl of War. I have a great many witnesses more to the same purpose, but I think I need not trouble your lordship with them; only I would call a person that has been mentioned, that is my steward.

L. H. S. What is his name?

Earl of War. Edmund Raymund. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What questions do you ask him?

Earl of War. I desire he may tell what he knows of any friendship between capt. Coote and me, and what particular instances he can give of it.

Raymund. My lord, I know that my lord sent for me, and said capt. Coote had occasion for 100 guineas to pay for a commission in the guards, which he had not money to make up; and I know that they were constant companions every day, did eat together, and often did lie together, and I did provide the 100 guineas for him; and I always did observe that there was a very great friendship between them.

Earl of War. My lord, the next witness I shall call will be Mr. French, who, I hope, having been tried, and had his clergy allowed him, will be a good witness; I should be sorry to interpose any thing that would be a hindrance to your lordships' giving judgment in this case presently; he is able to give your lordships an account of the whole matter; and though I hope I have no need of calling him as a witness, yet I humbly offer it to your lordships.

L. H. S. What say the counsel on the other side?

Earl of War. My lord, I do not insist upon it; I think I have no need of it.

L. H. S. Your lordship must judge for yourself, how far it is for your advantage to desire that this matter should be debated.

Earl of War. I do not desire to take up your lordships' time, though I am very well advised, that he is a good witness in law.

Earl of Roch. I apprehended it the duty of the king's counsel to make objection against any witness that should be produced by the prisoner; I am loth to give your lordships any unnecessary trouble, yet I own, that I am not satisfied that a witness should be offered and rejected, though the objection be not made and argued, by my lord the prisoner at the bar: if a witness be offered, and they think they have an objection against him, if they do insist upon it, it will occasion a debate, and then we must adjourn into the House of Lords.

L. H. S. It is not insisted upon by my lord, as I apprehend. My lord of Warwick, have you any other witness you would have called?

Earl of War. I desire to ask Mrs. Amy a question or two. (Then she stood up.)

L. H. S. What does your lordship ask her?

Earl of War. What she remembers passed at her house about my sword, or any thing.

Mrs. Amy. My lord, when I came into the room where my lord of Warwick and capt. French were, in our house, I stood by capt. French while his wounds was dressing, and I saw my lord of Warwick's sword, and looked upon it, and the hilt and all the shell was full of blood, and it ran down to the bottom of the sword blade.

Earl of War. I desire she may be asked, how soon that was after my coming in?

Mrs. Amy. It was a quarter of an hour after my lord came in.

Earl of War. I desire she may speak what sort of sword it was at the hilt, whether it were open or close?

Mrs. Amy. Indeed, I cannot say; but the hilt was full of blood, the shell of it, and it ran down to the bottom of the blade.

L. H. S. Has your lordship done?

Earl of Warwick. My lord, I will only take notice, that the three gentlemen that were on the other side were tried at the Old Bailey, and found guilty only of manslaughter; but now I being on his side, and not having any malice to him, but always a great deal of friendship, I submit it to your lordships, whether I can be thought any ways guilty of his death; and I humbly hope your lordships will hear my counsel, if you make any doubt of that.

L. H. S. What is it your lordship would have counsel heard to?

Earl of Warwick. To this case, my lord, whether there being six persons, three of a side, one is killed, and I being engaged on the side of him that was killed, the three on the other side have been tried for the death of that man, whether I, who was of his side, be equally guilty with them who were on the other side, especially, I engaging particularly with another of the three, that were of the other side: that question I desire my counsel may argue, whether I be equally guilty with them that were on the other side, and who, notwithstanding death happened in the case, yet were found guilty only of manslaughter?

L. Godolphin. My lords, it has been moved by my noble lord at the bar, that his counsel should be heard about Mr. French's being witness, whether he should be a witness or no; I think it would be much for the clearing of the fact one way or other, if the evidence of that witness could be heard; but whether he can be heard, or not, according to law, is a question that must be debated amongst your lordships, after your lordships have heard the counsel on both sides, and perhaps the opinion of the judges upon their arguments; and therefore I think we must adjourn, to consider whether this matter shall be argued or no.

L. H. S. What say you to this matter, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. My lords, I should agree with the motion that is made, if there were any thing insisted upon by the prisoner at the bar, that would bear a question or argument; but my lord of Warwick himself has waved the objection, and so I think there is no need for any argument on our side.

L. Godolphin. I would agree with the motion that was made for adjourning, in order to debate; but I desire to be thus understood, if he thinks it for his advantage, that this witness should be heard for him, which he knows best, whether it be or be not; then I do suppose your lordships will adjourn, to consider of it in your own house amongst yourselves; it will not be proper to enter into the debate here, nor there neither, till you know what objection the counsel for the king make against this man's being an evidence; and therefore we won't know, it is fit to be known, whether my lord's waving, or not insisting upon this man's testimony, be free and voluntary, and absolute; or whether it be only in respect to the trouble it may put the house to for the debate.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, some of my noble lords observe you have desired Mr. French should be examined, and that your counsel may be heard to that point, whether he be by law a witness, or not? Several of my lords think it reasonable, counsel should be heard, whether he be a witness or not; or at least, that that question should be considered amongst themselves, if insisted upon; therefore your lordship is to declare, whether you do insist upon it, or desire to wave it.

Earl of War. I wholly submit myself to your lordships; but as I am advised by my counsel, I hope he is a good witness, and I desire my counsel may be heard to that point.

Att. Gen. My lords, in truth I acknowledge, according to the method of law, the objection ought to come of our side; for I think we have very good reason to oppose that gentleman's being a witness in this case, even upon that objection which my lord has made himself, upon the consideration, that he has been found guilty of manslaughter for the death of this very person. It is true, upon his prayer, clergy was allowed him, but the burning of the hand was respited, and he was not burnt in the hand, and he is not pardoned; and how far can he be a witness in this case, is the objection: if a man convicted of felony, that is within clergy, prays his clergy, and it is allowed him, but he is not burnt in the hand, nor pardoned, we apprehend he is no witness; and that is the objection we make against his testimony to your lordships.

L. H. S. My lord of Warwick, you hear what is said by way of objection against this man's being a witness. What say you to it?

Earl of War. For matter of law, my lords, I am not capable of speaking to it, but I desire my counsel may.

L. H. S. That which Mr. Attorney proposes by way of objection is matter of fact, and the matter of law does not arise till the fact be settled, which must fall within your lordship's own knowledge, who produce him as a witness, and therefore you must answer to that fact yourself.

Earl of War. I desire to know of your lordships, if a man be convicted of felony that is within clergy, and prays his clergy, and it is allowed him, but the burning of the hand is respited, and there is a warrant for his pardon; whether he cannot be a good witness: that his clergy was allowed, and the burning of the hand respited, I have the record here to shew.

L. H. S. My lords, my noble lord at the bar insisting upon a warrant for a pardon, I must acquaint you with something that happened during your lordships' sitting here this day; since I came hither a privy seal was delivered to me, in order to pass a pardon for the burning in the hand of Mr. French, for the manslaughter for which he was convicted at the Old-Bailey; so far I can acquaint your lordships as to matter of fact.

Earl of War. My lord, I am advised by my counsel, that he is a good witness without a pardon, or without burning in the hand.

L. H. S. What say you, Mr. Attorney, to the law? Now you understand what the fact truly is.

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord; and I do apprehend, with submission to your lordship's judgment, that a man convicted of felony, though he prays his clergy, and has it allowed him, but is not burnt in the hand, nor has any pardon, can be no witness.

L. H. S. That is the case upon which you are to form your objections: here is a man produced as a witness, who has been convicted of felony within the benefit of clergy, has craved his clergy, has had it allowed, but has not been burnt in the hand, nor pardoned.

Att. Gen. Then, my lords, with humble submission, upon the matter of fact so stated, I make this objection, That he is no witness in point of law: he has been convicted, in our respect, for the very offence for which the noble lord, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted: Though not in the same degree as the indictment sets it forth, yet it is for the same fact. Upon this indictment Mr. French was indicted at the sessions at the Old Bailey, and there he was found guilty of manslaughter; upon which he prayed the benefit of his clergy, which was allowed him, but he was not burnt in the hand: thus stands the case in fact. Now, my lords, the allowance of clergy of itself, does not discharge the party from the offence, so far as to set him 'rectus in curia,' and make him in all respects a person fit to have the benefit and privileges of a 'probus et legalis homo,' till he has passed through those methods of setting himself right in the eye of the law, that the law hath prescribed; and in order to set this matter in its true light before your lordships, it will be necessary for me to open to your lordships, as far as I can, the nature of this benefit of clergy, and what advantage did accrue to the party, by having that benefit allowed him, and likewise what benefit he had by the act that enacted the burning in the hand, which was the statute of the 4th of H. 7. And by that act the burning in the hand was to be of no more effect, but only to shew that he had had his clergy allowed him; and that unless he were within orders, he should have it no more than once. Before that act of parliament, a person might have had the benefit of clergy several times, but that act limits it as to time, that it shall be but once: and therefore, in order to the having of it known, whether a man once had his clergy allowed him, that did not produce his orders, that act provides there shall be a mark set upon him at the time of the allowance of this clergy, as a token that it was allowed him, and he was never to have it allowed afterwards, but even at that time he was to be delivered over to the ordinary to make his purgation; but since that act several statutes have been made about this matter. I shall mention one that relates to your lordships, and that is the statute of Edward the 6th, which indeed does enact, That in case where a peer is convicted of felony within the benefit of clergy, he shall be discharged without being burnt in the hand; but theft and thus the law stood till the statute of 18 Eliz. cap. 7, by which it is enacted, That after the burning in the hand the prisoner shall be delivered to the ordinary, but he shall be discharged; by virtue of which act, after burning in the hand, the prisoner hath made full satisfaction to the law, without that sort of purgation which was before requisite to be made; but till he be burnt in the hand, or has his pardon, he is not to be discharged; it may be, he may be bailed out by the judge, in order to get a pardon; but still he remains in statu quo, as to his being a witness, or any thing of that nature; his credit is gone till it be restored by the king's pardon, or his undergoing the punishment that the law requires; and no man would say, that where one who under a conviction of felony, undischarged by burning in the hand, or pardon, that he can be a witness; he remains just as he was before, the conviction remains upon him, which disabled him to be a witness; and that we submit to your lordships as the case of this person, captain French.

Sol. Gen. My lords, if your lordships please to spare me one word of the same side: sure at common law there would be no difficulty at all, that a person convicted of felony within the benefit of clergy, unpardoned and undischarged, could be no witness; and since those several statutes that have been mentioned by Mr. Attorney, unless there be an actual burning in the hand, or a pardon for that burning in the hand; sure it cannot be pretended, that one convicted of felony can be admitted as a witness. If my lord of Warwick does insist upon his evidence as matter of right, we, for the king, do insist upon it, that there is no right at all in the case; for French must be taken to be one convicted of felony, and not discharged without either burning in the hand, or pardon; and then we are sure it cannot be pretended in law, that he can be a witness.

L. H. S. My lords, the king's counsel have stated their objection, what is your pleasure to have done in it?

Earl of Rivers. I suppose, my lords, that it will be necessary to hear what answer my lord of Warwick gives to this objection.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships' pleasure, then, that the counsel assigned for my lord Warwick be heard what they have to say to this matter?

Lords. Ay, ay, ay.

[Then sir Thomas Powys came to the bar, and stood by the earl of Warwick, and spoke thus.]

Sir T. Powys. May it please your lordships, I am by the order of this honourable house assigned of counsel for this noble lord at the bar, in point of law; and, my lords, as to the present question that has been spoken to by the king's counsel, I am a little surprised to hear it should be wondered at, that my lord of Warwick should insist upon it, that this gentleman should be examined for him as a witness, because, with humble submission to your lordships, I think the authorities of law will make for the opinion on the other side. Mr. Attorney General says true, The first statute that was made for burning in the hand, was that in 4 H. 7. Before that time the benefit of clergy, even for murder, was used to be allowed upon the prayer of the party, and he was thereupon delivered over to the ordinary to make his purgation; and that not only once, but folies quotes, let him demand it as often as he would, and as often as he offended it was allowed. This was thought such a privilege as ought to be restrained; that statute of the 4th of Hen. 7, takes notice, that an ill use was made of it, and therefore does ordain, that it should be allowed no more than once, unless to persons within orders: And as a means to know, whether it had been before allowed, or not, the act does direct, that the party convicted shall be burnt in the hand, that is all the act does appoint, it does no otherwise alter the case; it does not impose it upon the party as a punishment for the offence, but only as a mark of distinction, that if ever he came again before the court, and being convicted of the like offence, should pray the benefit of clergy, then upon inspection it might be known, whether before he had been allowed his clergy or not; and so stood the law without alteration as to the manner of delivery of the criminal over to the ordinary to make his purgation, with which the temporal law, in the manner of doing thereof, did not intermeddle; and therein consisted, with respect to this matter, the benefit of clergy. Afterwards, by the statute of Edward the 6th, the peers were exempted from the burning in the hand; and then comes the act that we rely upon, which is, that of the 18th of Eliz. that takes notice of the former act of the 4th of H. 7, which only ordered the burning of the hand for the purposes aforesaid, but left the party to be delivered over to the ordinary to make his purgation; which was found to be a matter attended with many abuses, and upon the reformation thought fit to be abolished, and taken away, because it was only an outward appearance and shew of purgation, and was often the occasion of very great perjuries; therefore it is taken totally away, and by this act the party shall have the benefit of clergy without making purgation, as fully as if he had actually made it. But, say they, there is still left something that the law requires, which is, that he should be first burnt in the hand; and if he be not burnt in the hand or at least pardoned, he is not in that condition that the law calls for in such a case, to set him Reclus in Curia: If he be burnt in the hand, or pardoned by the king, they agree on the other side, that he may be a very good witness. My lords, that act of parliament of queen Eliz. does empower the court that tries the criminal, and before whom he is convicted, not only to burn him in the hand, pursuant to the act of Hen. 7, but also to detain him in prison for a year after; but yet I think that doth not signify anything one way or other to restore him, or not restore him to his credit; for I think the burning in the hand, which is a mark of infamy, was never intended as a means, any more than imprisonment for a year, of restoring a man to his credit; it was only to show he had his clergy once, and should have it no more. The allowance of clergy by the statute of Eliz. operates as a pardon; only, since the statute, he shall not be delivered out of prison before he is burnt in the hand, according to the statute of Hen. 7. Nobody can say, that the continuing in prison for a year, when the court may order, though burnt in the hand, would, as to restoring of credit, have operated one way or other: but that we insist upon is, that the allowance of clergy sets him right in court, since purgation is abolished, and is the same thing as if he had undergone the ceremonial part of a formal purgation. It is the allowance of clergy that makes the alteration or operation in this case, by virtue of this last act of the 18th of Eliz. for we take it, that he is to have the same benefit of his clergy, as if he had been delivered to the ordinary, and purgation had been made; and now the allowance of clergy by this act, gives the same benefit to the party, as purgation would have done before the act; and he is in the same state and condition as he would have been in case of a purgation, or of a pardon by the king. The authorities are all with us. There is a case that is very well known among the men of the law, in the fourth report of my lord Coke, Holcroft's case, who was indicted and convicted of manslaughter, and he prayed the benefit of his clergy; the judges thought fit to respite their judgment therein, but his prayer was entered upon record; and then an appeal being brought against him, it came to be a question, how far he had had his clergy: For by the statute of the 3d of Hen. 7, an appeal will lie notwithstanding a conviction, if the party have not had his clergy; and in this case it was adjudged, that the party having prayed his clergy, he should have the same benefit as if the court had ordered every thing to be actually executed, which ought thereupon to be done: And surely then it can be no question, whether a man shall be a witness or no, who has had his clergy allowed? It is so entered upon record, That the book was administered to him, and that he read as a clerk; for the party has done as much as he can, prayed the benefit of his clergy, and had it allowed, and so it is entered upon record. The respiting of the burning of the hand till the king's pardon be obtained, shall not, sure, put him in a worse condition than he would have been, if he had actually been burnt in the hand. My lords, I have in my hand a book which is of very great esteem, and that is, The Reports of my lord chief justice Hobart, wherein he declares his opinion in this point, and for whose opinion every one of our gown ever hath testified a very great veneration and respect; the case is that of Searle and Williams, wherein my lord Hobart has spoken so fully to this matter, that I think it ought to put an end to the question: He says, the statute of Eliz. appointing the burning in the hand without purgation, does operate as a statute pardon to all intents and purposes, and the party having now the benefit of his clergy allowed, is in all respects in the same condition as if he had been acquitted: that is the opinion that he holds throughout that case: I need not trouble your lordships with reading all the particular words that he uses, but only those which relate to the thing now in question, immediately before your lordships. He delivers his opinion, "That whosoever speaks words of accusation, reflecting upon a man for any offence for which he was indicted and convicted, and had had his clergy allowed, an action lies as if he had been totally acquitted from it; it is not the burning in the hand, but the allowance of clergy, that sets him right in the credit in the eye of the law, and he is thereby in the same condition in that respect, that he would have been, if he never had had any conviction upon him.* Towards the end of the case his very words are these: "Though the statute saith, after burning in the hand according to the statute in that behalf made, he shall be discharged, and there is no burning in the hand, that makes nothing; for though it be a case where the hand ought to be burnt, yet it is not so essential but a man may have the benefit of the statute, though he be not burnt; the king may pardon the burning; for the burning, even in an appeal, is no part of the judgment, nor so much as in the nature of punishment, but rather a mark to notify that he may have his clergy but once." These are his very words in this case; so that the statute of Eliz. doth abolish purgation, but gives the party all the benefit thereof, as if he had gone through it, and instead of delivering the party to the ordinary to make his purgation, it says he shall be delivered out of prison; but lest it might seem to repeal the statute of Hen. 7, as to burning in the hand, it adds, "Being burnt in the hand, according to the statute in that behalf provided:" By the statute of Hen. 7, he was first to be burnt in the hand, and then delivered to the ordinary to make his purgation; but by the statute of Eliz. he is first pardoned his crime by being allowed the benefit of his clergy, without making his purgation, and afterwards to be burnt in the hand before he be delivered out of prison; so that the burning in the hand is only a condition precedent to his getting out of prison, not to his being restored to his credit: the king may pardon the burning in the hand undoubtedly, and he has gone a great way in this case, for he hath given a pardon as far as the privy seal, and that is sufficient to shew his gracious intention of pardoning it throughout; and if there be need, we hope it may pass yet forward. What we insist on, is not only the opinion of my lord chief justice Hobart, but he is followed therein by the opinion of a man of very great authority, one no less eminent than he in his profession, and that is my lord chief justice Hale, in a book of his that is intitled, his Pleas of the Crown, which is but an abridgment of what he intended upon that subject under the title of clergy: when he comes to treat of the consequences of the allowance of clergy, and what the several effects of clergy allowed shall be, he says, it gives him a capacity to purchase goods, and retain the profits of his lands, and restores him to his credit, according to the case I have mentioned before in Hobart, of Searle and Williams; for that case is particularly in that book mentioned and referred to: therefore I hope your lordships will make no difficulty of hearing this witness; for we think the having his clergy allowed him, is that which restores him to his credit. If they have any other objections against him, I hope we shall hear it from the king's counsel: but if this be stood upon in point of law as an objection, that though clergy was allowed, he was not burnt in the hand, nor pardoned; I would have objected to your lordships, that my lord high steward has told you it is so far gone towards the pardon, that the king has shewn his intention to pardon by the privy seal; and we hope your lordships will not let this noble lord at the bar suffer any prejudice by the not perfecting of the pardon by actual passing of the great seal.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney General, what say you to the matters which have been urged?

Att. Gen. My lord, we have stated our objection; we think there is nothing given as an answer to it, and we submit it to your lordship's judgment.

Marq. of Halifax. My lords, I desire that the question that is to be decided before your lordships may be settled truly, what it is.

L. H. S. If there be six in company, and one of them is killed, the other five are afterwards indicted, and three are tried, and found guilty of manslaughter, and upon their prayers have their clergy allowed, and the burning in the hand is respited, but not pardoned, Whether any of the three can be a witness upon the trial of either of the other two?

Sir T. Powys. My lords, with submission, though he were convicted of the felony, yet upon prayer of his clergy, that being allowed him, that restores him to all the capacities, we say, that he had before the conviction, and particularly to his credit; and for that we submit ourselves to your lordship's judgment.

Marq. of Halifax. I suppose your lordships will have the opinion of the judges upon this point; and that must be in the presence of the prisoner.

L. H. S. It must certainly be in the presence of the prisoner, if you ask the judges opinions.

Marq. of Halifax. But in these cases, my lords, it is usual to hear the king's counsel to make a reply: I desire to hear what they would say to what has been offered by the counsel for the noble lord the prisoner at the bar.

Serj. Wright. My lords, I did apprehend that the very stating of the objection would have set this matter in its true light: For in the first place, it is agreed on all hands, that this Mr. French, that is desired to be a witness, does stand convicted of felony; and by the law of England, while that conviction remains upon him, till he be either purged or pardoned, he cannot be a witness: by the conviction his credit is lost; and till he be restored to his first condition, he stands not so clear in the eye of the law that he can be an evidence. The counsel for the prisoner have objected, that if he either be pardoned, or clergy allowed, he is put in the same condition as if he had been acquitted.

My lords, I must admit a pardon restores to credit; and I must likewise admit, that allowance of the benefit of clergy, and burning in the hand upon it, amounts in law to a pardon, or is equivalent to a pardon in this matter: but the fact here is not so; for here is neither actual pardon, nor any burning in the hand; the benefit of clergy was prayed, and allowed; but that alone is not sufficient; there must be an actual burning in the hand, or a pardon of that burning in the hand, otherwise it cannot be a satisfaction in law, such as should put him in the same condition as if he were acquitted. Your lordships have heard what was said by his grace my lord high steward, That as to the burning in the hand, the king has been pleased to proceed so far as to grant a privy seal for the pardon of the burning in the hand: But your lordships very well know, and it cannot be insisted on to the contrary by the counsel on the other side, That it is no pardon until it be past under the great seal of England; so that here is no actual pardon; nor is the bare allowance of clergy, without burning in the hand, equivalent to a pardon. My lords, it must be agreed, That at the common law, persons that were convicted of felony, were not restored to their credit merely by allowing the benefit of clergy to them; there was something further to be done to regain credit; the party convicted must undergo another trial before the ordinary, which was commonly called purgation; when any man was convicted of felony, he was, upon his prayer of the benefit of clergy, to have it allowed to him, and if he could read as a clerk, his life was saved. He was not discharged of the felony, and therefore was delivered over to the ordinary to be kept in prison until he had, by a sort of trial before the ordinary, made his innocence appear, and purged himself of the fact charged upon him; and if he could not make his purgation, he was to lie perpetually in prison; and notwithstanding the allowance of clergy, and delivery over to the ordinary, yet was not the credit restored, nor his former capacities; he was not a legal witness until he had purged himself of the crime: It was the clearing themselves of the guilt, that restored such persons to their reputation and credit, not the bare allowance of clergy: Some criminals were delivered to the ordinary generally; those might make their purgation: Others were specially delivered, or delivered with a special charge to the ordinary, not to admit them to purgation, 'Absque purgatione facienda': These latter could never be restored to credit, except by the king's pardon; for the liberty of purgation, which was the means of regaining their credit, was taken from them; their guilt occasioned their loss of credit; taking away that guilt doth consequently restore credit again; and this benefit of clergy was to be allowed as often as any man had occasion for it.

Thus the matter of benefit of clergy stood in common law in respect of purgation and restoring of credit, till the statute of 18 Eliz. c. 7, which was cited on the other side by sir Thomas Powys; by which statute purgation is absolutely taken away and set aside: and the party being burnt in the hand, according to the statute of 4 H. 7, is appointed by this statute, 18 Eliz. to be discharged, and not to be delivered over to the ordinary, as was before that time used. The delivering over to the ordinary, was in order to purgation, and that by the last statute is quite taken away, and the party is to have the same benefit by the having the benefit of his clergy and burning in the hand, as if he had made his purgation; he shall be discharged: it is not his reading as a clerk, and that pronounced by the ordinary, that gives him the benefit of a discharge, as if he had been purged of the crime; but there must be the burning in the hand, that is the very terms of the statute upon which he is to be discharged; that must actually be done before he can be put into the same condition that he was in before the conviction, and consequently make him capable of being a witness. As for the case of Searle and Williams, that was cited by sir Thomas Powys, that case doth not oppose in this matter; there it was not needful to burn the person convicted; he was a clerk in holy orders, and by law exempt from burning in the hand: so it was not needful to burn him, the statute of 18 Eliz. not requiring any person to be burned in the hand that were not so liable before then. The most that is said in that case by the chief justice Hobart is, that in case where the hand ought to be burnt, it is not essential; but the party may have the benefit of the statute, i. e. be discharged without burning, and the king may pardon the burning; and no doubt if the king pardons the burning, it is as good and effectual as if the hand had been actually burnt. The king might pardon the whole, and consequently any part; the pardon of the punishment supplies the effect of it; no question but a pardon may supply the want of burning in the hand. Chief justice Hales in his book of Pleas of the Crown, fol. 240, which I have here, says expressly, that burning in the hand is now, since the statute 18 Eliz. the consequent upon the allowance of clergy, which hath this effect: First, It enables the judges to deliver him. Secondly, It restores him to former capacities. Thirdly, It restores him to his credit; and so it puts him in the same condition as if he were acquitted. What is it that hath this effect? The allowance of clergy, and burning in the hand: There is not to be a delivery of the criminal till all be done which is required by law: The law requires that the party be burnt in the hand; or that the king do pardon the burning in the hand, before the party be discharged; and, with humble submission, it was never yet pretended, that any person could have the full advantage of the benefit of clergy, since the statute of 4 H. 7, till he was burnt in the hand; or the burning in the hand was pardoned. Now, my lords, to apply this to the case in question, it is on all hands admitted, That Mr. French was convicted of felony and manslaughter, and is neither burnt in the hand, nor pardoned; but he has prayed the benefit of the clergy; and has had the book given to him, to try if he can read, and he certified he can read; this is all that is done. I think it cannot be pretended he ought to be discharged until he is burned in the hand, or that burning pardoned, as the act requires; and if the reading as a clerk without burning in the hand, or pardon of it, be not sufficient in law to entitle him to be discharged, why should it be sufficient to restore his credit? The whole together works the discharge and restores the party. In the case of Burroughs and Holcroft that has been cited, there a man was convicted of manslaughter, and prayed his clergy; the court did not allow his clergy, but did advise upon it. This was held sufficient to bar an appeal; for if clergy had been allowed it had clearly been a good bar; and the act of the court in advising upon the prayer, and not allowing clergy where it ought to be, shall not prejudice the party convicted, but he shall be in the same state as if the clergy had been actually allowed; but that has no likeness to the case now before your lordships; for here it is not pretended that Mr. French ever desired to be burnt in the hand, but that was resented in favour to him, which was done with intention, it seems, to get the king's pardon for the burning of the hand, which is not yet obtained; and consequently I take it he is not entitled to that benefit which the law would give him, if he was either pardoned or burned in the hand; he is not fully discharged of the conviction, and therefore I think he ought not to be admitted as a witness.

L. H. S. What is the resolution your lordships please to take upon this matter? Is it your lordships' pleasure to have the opinion of my lords the Judges, who are here present, upon this point?

Lords. Ay, ay, by all means have the judges opinions.

L. C. J. Treby. Two things have been mentioned at the bar, which, I think, ought to be laid out of the question.

1. The consideration of a peer, with respect to burning in the hand.

I suppose it is not (I am sure it ought not to be) insinuated; that if any of your lordships' degree should have the misfortune to fall into the like condition as the gentleman now produced, viz. to be once convict of a clergyable felony, there could be any doubt of receiving such peer as a witness, without his having been burnt in the hand. Certainly there could not; for the statute of 1 E. 6, exempts the peers from such penalty, and virtually repeals the statute of 4 H. 7, as to so much. And the statute of 18 Eliz. requires burning in the hand only, according to the statute in that behalf (before) provided. And there being no statute then or now in force, to subject peers to such brand; they are, in such case, upon the allowing the benefit of the said statute of E. 6, which is as much as clergy without reading or freed from discredit and other penal-(the felony, as much as Commons are by having clergy formally allowed, and being burnt.

2. Here hath been mention of a pardon of the burning this gentleman in the hand; and, it seems, the proceeding hath been so far as to pass the privy seal. I do not question the king's pardoning of the burning's being as effectual as the party's undergoing it. But, I say, here is no pardon (though great preparation for one). For the sign manual, the signet, the privy seal, are but warrants in such cases, and countermandable. But it is the great seal that speaks the king's last and irrevocable intent, and passeth the pardon (or other like thing) to be granted. And that hath not been obtained here.

Now the question is cleared, I take it to be this: Whether this commoner, being convicted of felony, and having his clergy allowed, but being unburnt and unpardoned, shall be received and allowed to be a witness?

I am of opinion he ought not.

For (whatever quality or credit he might personally be of) he is, by being and remaining a felon convict, rendered infamous in the eye of the law. Upon the conviction, he lost, by the interment of law, that credit which is necessary to a witness; and is not restored to it by the bare allowing of clergy; but is in the state as a felon convict would have been, before purgation, at common law.

Clergy or (more properly called) benefit of clergy, is an ancient privilege, whereby a clerk charged with felony was dismissed from the temporal judge, and delivered in custody to his ordinary, before whom he was to purge himself, if he could, of the offence; and if he failed in his purgation, he was to remain in the ordinary's prison.

I mean generally; and I think it not proper to this occasion, to discourse of the special cases wherein the delivery to the ordinary was absque purgatione.

This privilege took its root originally from a constitution of the pope, exempting the persons of the clergy from this secular jurisdiction.
This the canon-law is full in. But that law was not thoroughly received here in England.
And this matter was moulded, ordered, and altered by our common and statute law.

For instance: The canon-law gives the privilege only to men in holy orders: our law, in favour to learning, and the desire of the English bishops, extended it to lay clerks,* as an old statute calls them, i. e. any layman, that, by reason of his ability to read, was (other circumstances concurring) in a possibility of being made a priest. On the other side; that law would not suffer the clergy to be tried before secular judges: but ours hath, for several hundred years, subjected them to such trial.

* As to Benefit of Clergy, see in this Collection, the Case of Cavenagh and others, vol.
12, p. 630; and the Cases there referred to.

But the common law was ever clear in this,
That when a man was convicted of felony, though by the allowing of clergy, his life, land, and blood were saved, yet, that conviction laid him under divers penalties and forfeitures, some absolute, others limited and determinable.

He forfeited all his goods and chattels, which he had at the time of his conviction, absolutely;
not to be restored by purgation or pardon.

He also forfeited and lost, 1. His liberty, being to continue a prisoner. 2. His capacity of purchasing more goods or chattels, and of taking and retaining the issues and profits of his freehold land to his own use. 3. His credit, so as not to be a witness, juror, &c. Under these three penalties he remained till his purgation: but by that they were determined. As soon as he had made his purgation, he was restored to his liberty, capacities, and credit.

Purgation was the convict's clearing himself of the crime, by his own oath; and the oath or verdict of an inquest of twelve clerks (as com-purgators). The proceeding was before the ordinary. And, for the manner of it, old books speak of their making proclamation for persons to come in against his purgation, and of their enquiring into his life, conversation, and fame, and of other formalities. In all which, several other statutes say, there were great abuses.
But it is certain, that, upon his acquittal, the ordinary pronounced him innocent, and absolved from infamy. And thereupon he was discharged from the imprisonment, incapaci-ties, and discredit incident to the felony.

The statute 4 H. 7, brings in a new thing, appointing that every person convict of felony, should be marked in the hand by the gaoler in open court, before he should be delivered to the ordinary. And this was partly that they might taste of corporal punishment; but, principally, to notify that they had had their clergy. For the same statute, taking notice that men were emboldened to commit murder, rape, robbery, and other felonies, because they had the benefit of clergy toties quoties, ordains that no person, who was once admitted to that benefit, should ever have it again for a following offence, unless he were within orders, and produced his letters of his orders, or a certificate of them.

For this Act, Perkin Warbeck, in his Declaration against H. 7, brands him as an execrable breaker of the liberties and franchises of holy church.

Then comes the statute 18 Elis. c. 7, which, for so much as concerns this question, I desire to read. It is in these words, "For the avoiding of sundry perjuries and other abuses in and about the purgation of clerks convict, delivered to the ordinaries, he enacted, that every person which shall be admitted and allowed to have the benefit or privilege of his clergy, shall not thereupon be delivered to the ordinary, as hath been accustomed, but after such clergy allowed, and burning in the hand according to the statute in that behalf provided [meaning that of 4 Hen. 7], shall forthwith be enlarged and delivered out of prison by the justices before whom such clergy shall be granted, that clause notwithstanding.

Then there follows a proviso to this effect: "Provided nevertheless, and be it enacted, that the justices before whom any such allowance of clergy shall be had, may for the further correction of such persons, detain and keep them in prison for such convenient time as the same justices in their discretions shall think convenient, so as the same do not exceed one year's imprisonment."

This statute refers to that of H. 7, and follows the order of it; as that appointed that the convict should be burnt before he should be delivered to the ordinary to have the benefit of purgation, so this of 18 Eliz. appoints that he should be burnt before he shall be discharged by the justices, and have the benefit thereby intended (instead of purgation).

The council for the noble lord at the bar say, that the allowance of clergy by virtue of this act, freeth this man, and makes him rectus in curia; as if he had made his purgation: and that by this statute he is first pardoned his crime, by being allowed the benefit of clergy, without making his purgation; and afterwards to be burnt in the hand before he be delivered out of prison; and so the burning is a condition precedent to his getting out of prison, not to his being restored to his credit.

But I am to seek for any ground for this notion in this statute. It doth not require clergy to be allowed, nor give any new virtue or operation to it, when allowed. It supposeth such a thing to be by virtue of the common law: but there it leaves it, if there be nothing more done. It is one clause consisting of two parts; 1. Negative; he that is allowed his clergy, shall not be delivered to the ordinary. 2. Affirmative; but after that, and burning in the hand, shall be delivered by the justices.

Now, if it had stopped at the first part, it had been so far from pardoning, or restoring any clerk convict, that it had put all into the same condition that those were who were without purgation, viz. to be perpetually imprisoned, and infamous. Indeed, it had not been reasonable to take away such a privilege from the subjects, without some recompence; and therefore it did not stop there: but proceeds to the 2d part, and provides that those who before were delivered to, and by the ordinary, shall now be delivered by the justices. But withal, it declares when, and upon what terms, viz. After clergy allowed, and burning in the hand. And this is a satisfaction to be given to the law, before they shall have the benefit of it.

I agree, if this convict had made that satisfaction to the law, he might have been a witness; for in that case, he would have been freed from his discredit by virtue of the last words of the said clause. It is true, the words are only, "Shall forthwith be enlarged and delivered out of prison by the justices," which literally imports nothing but restoring his liberty. But under this prime instance, are implied and intended all other particulars which a convict might be discharged of by means of purgation. It was never the intent of the statute merely to set him at large, and leave him a felon convict: but when it is said delivered, it is meant delivered free, freed from all incident further penalties, as he might have been if delivered upon purgation. This is a reasonable construction; to a man that observes the position in the words, the sense will appear to be as if the law-makers had said, that instead of being discharged 'a culpa et pœna' by the ordinary upon a tedious proceeding to purgation, he shall now be so discharged by the justices forthwith.

And this also is necessary to vindicate the justice of this law; for, since it takes from him the means he had of regaining his credit, it is but just it should restore to him by this way.

It is objected, that it may as well be said that he shall not be restored to credit till he have suffered imprisonment, not exceeding a year, as that he shall not be restored till burnt. But that receives an easy answer; for, if it were so, it would not avail this person. But I take it to be otherwise. A convict is discharged from imprisonment and all other penalties incident to the conviction, forthwith upon the burning in the hand: but if there be a commitment made by virtue of the proviso, it is a collateral and a new thing, and the party is not then in prison by virtue of his conviction, but by a fresh express order of the judges, made upon the heinousness of the circumstances appearing on the evidence. They may, and generally do, forbear to commit at all: and when they do, it may be for a month or two, at their discretion. The proviso calls it a further correction.

As to the manner in which this statute works this full discharge, it hath been disputed, whether it be by supply of purgation, or rather by a kind of statute-pardon. But, I think, that by force of the statute the party is purged and freed of the felony, and all penalties incident to it, in nature of a pardon.

In what manner soever the statute works it, it is manifest that it doth it not but upon a condition precedent, viz. After clergy allowed, and burning in the hand. Now, this person hath his clergy allowed, but is not burnt in the hand, (nor has any pardon for it) and therefore is not yet intitled to the benefit of this statute. My lord's counsel say he is, because he hath his clergy allowed. But that is claiming the advantage upon the performing of one part of a joint condition, which ought not to be had but upon performing both. They might as well have pretended to it before the performance of either; the statute says, after both clergy and burning. They say also, that this burning is no part of the judgment, as hath been held in the case of an appeal. Be it so: but, I say, it is a part of the condition in this statute.

There is no case in our books against this opinion. (But, on the contrary, there are authorities for it.) Holcroft's case is in no sort applicable to this case; as was truly observed by the king's serjeant. The opinion of my lord chief justice Holt, in Searle and Williams's case, rightly considered, confirms this. I have borrowed the book from the gentleman at the bar, and read it. He saith expressly, that where a convict is liable to be burnt in the hand, he is not discharged and restored without it; because the statute says, after burning: but from thenceforth the statute frees him from all further punishment. But, he saith, that where he is not liable to burning, he shall have the same benefit immediately upon the allowance of clergy only. So it was in the case before him; which was that of a clerk in orders: for, Searle was a clergyman, parson of Heydon German, in Essex, and convicted of manslaughter. So it is, he says, in case where the king pardons the burning. And the last words in the case clearly shew his meaning; viz. where the statute says, after burning, it imports where burning ought to be, &c.

To me the law is evident. A peer shall have this benefit, without either clergy or burning. A clerk in orders, upon clergy alone, without burning. A lay-clerk, not without both.

As I remember, there hath been but one authority more mentioned, and that is of my lord chief justice Hale, in his Summary of the Pleas of the Crown; I have got hither that book also. To my understanding, he plainly declares the same opinion, and cites the before-mentioned case of Searle for proof of it. His words (so far as they relate to this matter) are these:

What the effect of clergy allowed?

In ancient time the consequent was delivery to the ordinary, either to make purgation, or absque purgatione, as the case required.

But by stat. 18 Eliz. c. 7. Now only burnt in the hand, which hath these effects,

1. It enables the judge to deliver him out of prison.

2. It gives him a capacity to purchase goods, and retain the profits of his lands. Foxley's Case, 5th report.

3. It restores him to his credit. Hob. Searle's Case.

The word [which] used here (whatever else it do, or do not refer to) doth certainly refer to the next antecedent, that is, burning in the hand; and the two books which this most learned judge cites, are full authorities that it is this burning which enables the court to deliver him, and that that delivering which is then due to him is, by good construction, in lieu of a pardon, which restores him to his said capacity and credit.

To conclude: this condition precedent, upon which the restitution of this person's credit depends, is not performed (by his undergoing the said punishment,) nor discharged (by the king's pardoning it;) and therefore it is not a legal witness.

Earl of Rochester. If the rest of my lords the judges be of the same opinion, so; and I hope you will not oblige them to deliver their opinions at large, to take up your lordships time with arguments of any length; for the matter has been, I think, sufficiently debated.

L. Chief Baron. (Sir Edward Ward.) My lords, I am of the same opinion.

Just. Nevill. And so am I.

L. H. S. My lord of Warwick, have you any thing more to say to this question?

Earl of War. No, my lord.

L. H. S. Then what is your lordships' pleasure? Is this man to be admitted a witness or not?

Lords. No, no; we think, by law, he cannot be a witness.*

L. M. S. My lord of Warwick, my lords are of opinion, That this person cannot be admitted as a witness for you.

Earl of War. My lords, I submit to your lordships' judgment in the matter.

Earl of Nottingham. My lords, I am very glad your lordships have had this matter debated by the counsel, that so it might be settled: All my lords the judges that are here, it seems, are of opinion, that this man can be no witness, and therefore his testimony must be rejected. But there is another proposal that I have to make to your lordships, of a point that I think ought to be considered of: My noble lord at the bar did suppose that he had proved before your lordships, that he went into the field to fight on the side of the party that was killed, but not on the other side; and indeed, that he went not to fight, but to prevent a quarrel; and thereupon he did start a question, whether it should not be a presumption in point of fact and law, that he, being on the side of the party that was killed, should not be reputed innocent of his death? Now, I confess, upon the starting of this objection, I doubted of it, whether, if any one were present at the killing of a man, where several people were engaged in fighting; on what side soever such a person were, either on the side of the party that was killed, or on the other side, yet what-soever crime it was in those that killed him, it was the same crime in those that were present at the action. My lord of Warwick did desire, that his counsel might be heard upon that point; if there be any question with your lordships in that case, and my lord desires his counsel may be heard to that matter, it may occasion a matter of debate, which cannot be in this place openly, but must be between your lordships among yourselves; Indeed, I think it reasonable that counsel should be heard upon the case.

L. H. S. My lords, I think you are not arrived at that question yet; you are not to take for granted any part of the fact, but are to debate among yourselves, after the proof is over, what that proof does amount to.

* See Mr. Hargrave's notice of this Case in his learned Discourse on the effect of the King's Pardon of Perjury. See, too, Rockwood's Case, and the authorities referred to in the Note, p. 187, of this Volume.

Earl of Rochester. Indeed, my lords, I hope you will not suppose any thing, and so take it for granted, that may occasion any debate, because that is not to be done here in this place, but we must adjourn to another place for it: The bare putting of a case by a prisoner at the bar, does not make that to be the case truly in point of fact, for as far as I heard and understood the noble lord's proposal at the bar, what he desired to have his counsel heard to, was, that he being one of six that went into the field, but going with a design to part them, and not with an intention to promote the quarrel, could not be in equal degree of guilt with those that were on the other side, who killed the party; but now, my lords, I take it, it is far from being granted on the other side, that that is the state of the fact; nay, my lord himself owns that he was in the field, and that he was engaged in the combat with Mr. James; and then the question must be that is to be debated, whether a party that is concerned in a quarrel where a person is killed, is in equal degree guilty with those that were on the other side against the person that was killed? And then the question would be far different from what it would be otherwise, and as his lordship did propose it; and if there be a doubt in matter of fact, that ought to be settled here in this place, that afterwards it may be considered in another.

Earl of Nottingham. My lords, I cannot but agree with that noble lord, that the matter of fact ought to be settled, and then if any debate arises thereupon, your lordships are to return to your own house, and there to debate what is your judgment upon that matter of fact: But whatsoever motion is made by the noble lord at the bar, wherein he desires to have his counsel heard, that I suppose may be considered here; and this point having been started by my noble lord at the bar, as a point of law, and not of fact, I desire to remind him of it, to know whether he does insist upon it; if he does not move to have the matter argued, then there is an end.

L. H. S. My lords, I do not think you will hear counsel upon a matter of fact, and therefore it is not ripe (till the fact be settled) for you to hear counsel.

Earl of War. My lords, I humbly pray, that you will hear my counsel as to that point.

L. H. S. My lord, this is a matter of fact undetermined, and not a matter of law: what opinion their lordships will be of, when they have considered the proofs as to the fact, is one step; when that is over, it will be the proper time, if any doubt be remaining with their lordships, in point of law to hear counsel; but upon bare matter of fact counsel is not to be allowed.

Earl of Rochester. My lords, if there be any debate among the lords, whether it be a matter of fact, or a matter of law, we must go up to our own House; but upon any point of law, where counsel is to be heard, it must be in this place, in the presence of the prisoner, and afterwards your lordships will debate it among yourselves.

Earl of Nottingham. I hope, my lords, the counsel would not state the case otherwise than as it is really in point of fact; nor can this noble lord hope, that any thing will make an impression upon my lords, but what from the fact rightly stated, is supported from the evidence; and that which my lord proposes, is to have his counsel heard to a matter of law, which your lordships will be judges of after you have heard it, whether there be any weight in that which he supposes to be his case, that a person assisting in a combat on the side of him that is killed, is in equal degree of guilt with them that are on the other side; that possibly, if the fact be agreed, may be a point fit to hear counsel to, before your lordships go to debate it among yourselves.

Duke of Devonshire. If I am not mistaken, my lord of Warwick owns his being one of them that fought, for he has offered witnesses to prove, that he received a wound in his hand by fighting: if my lord of Warwick thinks, that there is a difference between his being on Mr. Coote's side, and theirs that were on the other side, and would have his counsel heard, how far it will difference his guilt, and the nature of the crime, from what it was with them on the other side, I cannot think that can be to any great purpose to have that argued; but if your lordships' please, you may hear his counsel what they have to say to that matter; but otherwise, I cannot think, but that his lordship will acknowledge the matter of fact, that he was engaged in the quarrel.

Earl of Peterborough. My lords, I desire, if this be a point that my lord's counsel should be heard to, that it should be stated as a point of law, and then your lordships will consider of it.

L. H. S. As well as I could apprehend it, as it was offered by my lord of Warwick, this was what he desired to have his counsel heard to: though the persons engaged in the quarrel on the opposite party to Mr. Coote have been tried and found guilty of manslaughter, yet he is not in equal degree of guilt with them, he being engaged on Mr. Coote's side, and therefore his lordship's case differs from theirs who fought against Mr. Coote. This point he would have argued by his counsel before your lordships as a matter of law founded upon the fact; now the fact of the case must arise from the evidence as it has been given, which has not yet been debated or settled by your lordships; and till that be agreed to be the case, no question of law does properly arise.

Duke of Leeds. My lords, if possible, I would put this matter into its true method; for indeed I think we have been all this while out of the way. The noble lord at the bar has desired to have his counsel heard; this House has allowed him counsel in matters of law; I would desire that the counsel would state the case so to your lordships, that it may appear to be a case fit to be argued, that so it may receive your lordships' judgment thereupon. My lord's own bare proposing of such a thing, will not be enough to incline your lordships to be of opinion, perhaps, one way or other; but I would pray your lordships, that you would direct the counsel that are assigned for my noble lord at the bar, to propose that to your lordships as a point of law that he ought to insist upon. I think it is apparent to every body, that no point of law can arise but upon matter of fact, which is agreed to be proved in any case; now the proofs of the fact we have heard; now, that which I would propose to your lordships is, that instead of hearing his counsel to argue in point of fact, what is not yet agreed upon to be the fact, they should state such a point of law as they would argue upon; and then whether you would think it a point of law, or not a point of law, we must go into another place, where it may be debated, whether it be such a point of law as that counsel should be heard to it.

Earl of Peterborough. My lords, I hope you will forgive me for interposing in this matter, but that which I have to say to it is this: I am far from giving any opinion as yet, as to the matter of fact, whether my lord of Warwick was Mr. Coote's friend or his enemy; I know it is not a proper place for that matter to be debated in: but my noble lord at the bar desires to have his counsel heard upon that point, as if the fact was agreed: truly, till the fact be agreed, I question whether we can give any judgment or opinion one way or other. If I observed aright, the evidence for the king aimed at somewhat else: I shall not say what my opinion now is, till we come to debate it among ourselves; but here is a desire of having counsel heard, but there is no question of law stated, but it depends upon a matter of fact which is not yet determined by your lordships, before whom the consideration of both fact and law doth lie, whether a person that is engaged on the side of the party that is killed in a quarrel, where several persons on both sides are concerned, be as much guilty as those that are concerned on the other side?

Marq. of Norm. My lords, I do suppose that you may hear the counsel to state the question, without your determining any thing upon it, as to your opinion one way or other; for your hearing of counsel is only in order to prepare your lordships for the debate among yourselves, if there remains any doubt with you. It seems, my noble lord at the bar has proposed that his counsel should be heard: If the counsel will state the point to be argued upon, your lordships may here consider, whether it be such a one as it is fit to hear counsel to; then, no doubt, you will hear counsel to it. This, I suppose, you will hear from them, or otherwise your lordships will not think fit to give yourselves the trouble to go and debate that which is no settled question to be debated of.

E. of Rochester. My lords, I am afraid, of necessity, you must adjourn to your own house, for I find my lords are here arguing one with another; some are of opinion, that the counsel should state the question, that they should be heard upon; others of my lords are of opinion, that it is only a matter of fact, not a matter of law, upon which counsel should be heard; then it must be debated between your lordships, which is not proper for to do here; therefore I would humbly move your lordships, that you would adjourn to your own house.

E. of Peterborough. I suppose your lordships will be pleased to enquire of the counsel, whether they do insist upon this point.

L. H. S. My lord Warwick, if your lordship insist that your counsel should be heard upon the point which you have offered, it seems there is such a difference of opinion among my lords, that for the debating of what shall be done in the case, my lords must adjourn; but if you do not insist upon it, they will go in the ordinary method, to consider of the evidence that has been given, after it is summed up on both sides; for if you have no more evidence to offer, you are to make your observations upon the evidence that has been given.

E. of Warwick. I submit it, upon the whole matter to your lordships, whether my counsel can be heard, or not, to that point; how far, I being of Mr. Coote's side, can be guilty of his death.

L. H. S. That is a matter of fact, which is not yet determined; and therefore the question which you suppose to arise upon it, is not yet ripe to be resolved. If you have no other witnesses to produce, that which remains, for I think I may properly acquaint you with the method of proceeding, is, that you are now on your part to sum up the evidence that has been given, which is your own work, as not being allowed counsel as to matter of fact; you are at liberty to make such observations as you may think for your advantage upon the evidence, and so to close your defence.

E. of Warwick. My lord, I submit it upon the whole matter to your lordships.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney General, my lord of Warwick submits the matter, as it has been proved, to their lordships; without any summing up of the evidence; you who are of the king's counsel, if you think fit, will sum up the evidence on yours, in order to their lordships consideration of it: This you know is the time for doing it. Make Proclamation for Silence.

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make Proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes, my lord high steward of England, his grace, does straitly charge and command all manner of persons here present, to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

L. H. S. Gentlemen, you that are of the king's counsel, now is your time to sum up the evidence for the king.

Then Mr. Solicitor, (Mr. John Hawles) began to sum up the evidence, but his voice was so low, that he could not be heard by the lords that sat at the upper end of the house.

Duke of Leeds. My lords, I think it of so great importance to have a true state of the fact and evidence laid before us, and that we may hear what the king's counsel do say at the summing up of the evidence, that if my lords be of any opinion, we shall be very defective to know what judgment we give when we come to give judgment, unless we are thoroughly apprised of the matter of fact and the proofs. I confess I am going to move that, which is a thing not according to the orders of the house; but much without the rules of the house, that the counsel should be heard in any other place but where they are, at the bar of the house; this is contrary indeed, I acknowledge, to the orders of the house, and so my motion is irregular; but yet, in order to our satisfaction, that we may be enabled to hear what the king's counsel do say to us, especially in summing up the evidence, I cannot but offer this to your lordships; for we can no more hear the counsel here, than if we were quite out of the house: Whether, therefore, your lordships will please to order, that any person that has a stronger voice should sum up the evidence; or whether you will dispense with the orders of the house so far, as that Mr. Solicitor may come to the clerk's table, or some other place within the house, where he may be heard by all, I must submit it to your lordships. It would be a great satisfaction for us to hear him, in order to our judgment; but I acknowledge in this I do make an irregular motion, as to the orders that are usually observed by your lordships: but I know not how to help it, in regard, without hearing, it is impossible for us to form our judgment.

E. of Roch. My lords, I have a very great respect for every motion that that noble lord who spoke last does make, and I am of his opinion, that it will mightily tend to the satisfaction of my lords who are to give their judgment in this case, to hear both the evidence and the counsel, and what observations are made on both sides; and that it is a great disadvantage that the counsel should have so low a voice, that all my lords should not be able to hear him; but yet I hope that may be remedied some other way than what is proposed by that noble lord? For if what he desires were done, it will be obvious, that in point of precedent many inconveniences will occur upon breaking the orders of the house, to comply with a motion which is acknowledged by the noble lord himself to be irregular; for it would be impossible to hear any body, if it be permitted to make such a great noise without; and it is that which renders the difficulty of hearing the greater. If that were ordered, your lordships might hear this gentleman as well as those of the other counsel; or if this gentleman's voice will not so well reach your hearing, then there are other gentlemen of the king's counsel that have stronger voices; and if any of them would sum up the evidence, I believe it would be better heard, and consequently better apprehended by your lordships; for I had rather any expedient should be found out to comply with the orders of the house, and preserve them, than that any irregular thing should be done for the breaking the orders of the house upon any account whatsoever.

VOL. XIII,

L. H. S. Make another proclamation for silence.

Clk. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes, my lord high steward of England, his grace does strictly charge and command all manner of persons here, present to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

E. of Bridgewater. Truly, my lords, the noise about the court is so great, that we who sit much nearer to the bar, than the noble lord who made the motion for the removal of the council into another place, cannot hear Mr. Solicitor what he says; and therefore I think some of the guard should be sent out to clear all the passages about the court, that there may be no noise; for it is the noise of the people without, that makes it so difficult to hear the king's counsel.

L. H. S. Let some of the guard without take care that there be not that noise made; and whosoever does make a noise, let him be taken into custody.

[Then another proclamation was made for silence; upon which there was a greater quietness in the Hall.]

L. H. S. Mr. Solicitor, there is hopes now, since there is not so great noise as there was, that you may be heard by my lords: you must use the best endeavours you can, that you may be heard.

E. of Roch. If that gentleman cannot speak out so well that he can be heard, those of the king's counsel that have better voices, must sum up the evidence.

Sol. Gen. My lord, I speak as loud as I can.

E. of Roch. There are others of the king's counsel, pray let them do it then; Mr. Attorney, he being nearer and within the bar.

L. H. S. I know not whether Mr. Attorney be prepared for the summing up of the evidence, because he examined the witnesses, and the king's counsel usually allot to themselves the particular parts which they intend to take.

E. of Roch. Then let Mr. Solicitor go on.

Sol. Gen. I would shortly observe to your lordships what evidence hath been given to you on behalf of the king in this case, against that noble lord, the prisoner at the bar, for the offence for which he stands indicted. The first witness that was produced was the drawer at the Greyhound Tavern in the Strand, where this quarrel, that was the occasion of the death of this person that was slain, happened; and he tells you, that that night there was at his master's house my lord of Warwick, my lord Mordaunt, capt. French, capt. Coote the person that was killed, and Mr. Dockwra; and after they had been there some time, that other person, that was the sixth concerned in the scuffle, Mr. James, was sent for, and he came in when it was pretty late; there they continued till one or two o'clock, and then they came down to the bar, and orders was given for to call witnesses; but it being so late, and being morning, they could not find coaches, and then there was orders for the getting of chairs; when some chairs were brought, Mr. Coote and Mr. French went into two of the chairs, but my lord Mohun interposed, and said there should be nothing done that night, and that if they went away he would call for a file of musqueteers from the guard, and secure them; and thereupon they came out of the chairs, and went into the house, and there was the noise of swords clashing heard at the bar; captain Coote said he would laugh when he pleased, and frown when he pleased, and they parted; three were on one side, and three on the other of the bar; my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and captain Coote, were on one side; captain French, captain James and Mr. Dockwra, were on the other side. Indeed he says my lord Mohun and my lord of Warwick did what they could to pacify them, and threatened to send for the guards; but away they went. The next witness was Thomas Browne, and he was the chairman that carried Mr. Coote, and he says, that there was an endeavour by my lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun to put off the business at that time, and that they did what they could to have put it off, and that even after they were in their chairs, when they were turned up St. Martin's lane, there they stopped at the back door of the Cross-Keys-tavern, and that while they stood there with their three chairs, three other chairs came by, and then captain Coote bid them put up, and follow after those chairs as fast as they could to Leicester-fields.

The next witness is William Crippes, who was the other chairman that carried captain Coote, and he gives your lordships much the same account that Browne gave before, and his evidence was just to the same purpose, that my lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun endeavoured to pacify the matter, and that there should be an end of the business for that night, and let it alone till another time; and that my lord Mohun threatened to send for the guards, and secure them, and would have had them gone home, that is Mr. Coote either with him to his lodging, or he would go to Mr. Coote's; but he could not prevail. Then my lord Mohun said, if he would go on, his lordship would go and see an end of the business.

The next witness was one Crattle, who was one of the chairmen that carried my lord of Warwick, and he says, that my lord Mohun and my lord of Warwick did endeavour what they could to put off the matter till the next morning, but that they could not prevail; that afterwards, when he carried my lord from Leicester-fields to the Bagnio, my lord borrowed a handkerchief of him to wrap his hand in, for he said he was wounded, but by whom that wound was given does not appear, nor how he came by that wound, any otherwise than as his lordship himself says, that it was given him by Mr. James.

The next was the other chairman that carried my lord of Warwick, which was John Gibson, and his testimony need not be repeated, because it did not differ from the others. The next witness was Robert Applegate, who was the chairman that carried my lord Mohun; and he says, that there was an endeavour used by my lord upon his setting down in St. Martin's-lane, to quiet captain Coote, and prevent any quarrel at that time; but he says, when they would go on, my lord Mohun said, he would go and see the end of it; and thereupon they went on towards Leicester-fields to the end of Green-street, which is at the lower end of the square.

The next witness was Palmer, who was one of the chairmen that carried Mr. French to the Bagnio in Long-Acre; and he tells your lordships what happened upon his carrying him thither; how, immediately after his coming there, my lord of Warwick came thither, and they knocked at the door at the same time, and that captain French was very much wounded, and they went into the house together, and that French would have had them pull off his cloaths to see his wounds, for he believed he was a dead man.

The next witness was the chairman which carried Mr. James, and he only tells your lordships that he carried a gentleman into Leicester-fields; that my lord Mohun endeavoured to put off the business for that night; but who the person was that he carried he cannot so well tell, nor give an account of; but when he had set him down at the further end of the square, there he left him, and he knows no further.

Then there was the surgeon at the bagnio in Long Acre, who gives your lordships an account, that about two o'clock in the morning on the Sunday, my lord of Warwick and captain French came in there; captain French was wounded in the body, and my lord Warwick was wounded in the hand, and my lord Warwick did take extraordinary care of captain French, and would not have the door opened to any body, nor his lordship known to be there; that afterwards captain James and Mr. Dockwra came to the door, and my lord came to the door himself, and when he saw who they were, he ordered them to be let in; and that there was a discourse about going into the country, and that there was a fear that Coote was killed. This is the effect of the testimony both of the surgeon and his servants; and it is to be observed, that when captain French came in, his sword was not bloody, but my lord of Warwick's sword was bloody almost all over, and that was taken notice of the next day; and there are several witnesses, both men and women of that house, that give your lordships an account much to the same purpose. Then there was captain Luckinfield, who says, that my lord of Warwick came to his lodgings, and they went in a coach together to the tavern in Cornhill, and then there was a discourse of going into the country, and my lord said that he was afraid his friend Coote was killed; but that they had no absolute news of his being killed at that time ; for it should seem my lord of Warwick forsook the field as soon as the fatal stroke was given, which, by whom it was given, is left to your lordships' consideration. Indeed it is pretended by my lord, that the wound that he had in his hand was given him by Mr. James ; but nothing of that is made apparent to your lordships upon the proofs.

Then we came to give your lordships an account of the nature of the wounds that Mr. Coote had in his body ; and for that we produced both the surgeon that did probe the wounds by the order of the coroner, and the coroner himself. Indeed we could not get a positive answer from either the surgeon or the coroner, whether the wounds were given by one and the same sword, or by different swords ; but then your lordships have the testimony of Mr. Turner, who was captain Coote's servant, and who knows his master's sword, and it hath been shewn to him, and he says, that it is his master's sword that he went out with ; and it can be easily judged whether he could give himself those wounds by that sword.

And your lordships have likewise had brought before you another sword, which was left at the bagnio in Long Acre, that was captain French's, that had no blood at all upon it ; but my lord of Warwick's, it seems by all the evidence, had a great deal of blood upon it.

Then came the witnesses for the prisoner at the bar, this noble lord, my lord Warwick ; and the sum of the testimonies that they have given, is of a great deal of kindness between my lord Warwick and captain Coote ; that my lord lent him a hundred guineas to purchase his commission in the guards, when he had but three of four hundred guineas which was necessary to make the purchase ; and there are several of them that do testify, that they always looked upon captain Coote and my lord of Warwick to be very good friends, and that there never was any quarrel between them ; and that is the sum of what the evidence on that side did testify. And this, my lords, I take to be the sum of the evidence that has been given on either side ; and when I have laid it thus before your lordships, I must submit it to your lordship's judgment, what opinion you will be of upon the whole matter ; only there is this one observation that I would make to your lordships upon this evidence, That there is not one witness that has given you an account satisfactory, by whose hand these wounds were given to Mr. Coote ; and therefore, though it is apparent my lord of Warwick was in the place where the mortal wound was given, yet by whose hand it was given is not yet known ; until that can be known, every person that was there must remain under the imputation of the same guilt, as having a hand, and contributing to his death ; it is certain, and cannot be denied, that this noble lord, my lord at the bar, was in the field, wherein there was actual fighting ; for he does not deny it himself, but says, that he was engaged particularly with captain James, when captain Coote was engaged with capt.

French, between whom, as it is alledged, the quarrel was ; but that is no way, in point of fact, made appear to your lordships ; and there being such suspicious and circumstances of the blood upon my lord of Warwick's sword, and the great concern that he was in when he came to the bagnio, and desiring to be concealed, and that nobody should know that he was there, and the care he took of Mr. French, who is the pretended person that did the fact, is that which is to be submitted to your lordships ; and it is to be observed, that Mr. French's sword was not bloody, but only dirty ; but my lord of Warwick's sword was very bloody from the hilt to the point, and he was in a great consternation when he came into the house.

There is likewise a circumstance which your lordships will please to observe, that even Mr. Coote's sword was brought into the house by some of the company that were there ; and whatsoever this noble lord pretends of his friendship to Mr. Coote, yet, it seems by his care that he took of captain French, he had as much friendship for him.

There is another circumstance that has been testified, which it will be fit for your lordships to take into consideration, and make some observation of ; that is, the nature of the wound : It seems, he had two wounds, one on the left side of the breast, near the collar bone, and that was downward ; and yet his man, that was here produced as a witness, does testify, that he was one that used his right hand, and then it is a wonder that he should receive such a sort of a wound in that part ; and the other wound was on the left side too, but it was upward, and how that could be given to one that was a right handed man, is certainly a very great wonder ; and the wounds being both given upon the same side, it cannot but be concluded, that they were given by one and the same sword.

Another circumstance which relates to my lord of Warwick is, that when he came into the Bagnio, after the fact was over, he would have himself denied to be there, and went to the door when James and Dockwra came in ; and his declaring his desire of going into the country ; these, we say, are circumstances that do induce a doubt, that my lord of Warwick had a concern upon him, of great guilt of having a hand in this man's death : it is indeed pretended by my lord of Warwick, that Mr. Coote was a person that my lord of Warwick had a kindness for ; but it is plain by the evidence, that he left him dead in the field, and did not take any care of him, but took a great deal of care of captain French, who, it is pretended, was the person that fought with Coote, when he came to the Bagnio ; and there is nothing of kindness at this time pretended, nor any thing of a defence to this matter offered by my lord of Warwick, but only what the chairmen say, that he endeavoured to put it off to another time. These, my lords, are all the observations that I shall make upon the evidence in this case ; how far this evidence, upon consideration, will weigh with your lordships, I must submit it to you. If my lord of Warwick did do the fact, as these circumstances, we think, may incline your lordships to believe he did, it will surely be murder; but how far the evidence comes up to the proof of that, we most humbly submit to your lordships, who are the judges of it; and we leave it intirely to your consideration upon what you have heard.

L. H. S. Then it seems you have done on all sides.—Counsel. Yes, my lords.

Lords. Then adjourn, adjourn.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships' pleasure to adjourn into the House of Lords?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. This House is adjourned into the House of Lords.

Then the Lords went back to their own House in the same order they came into the court in Westminster-hall, and debated the matter among themselves, what judgment to give upon the evidence that had been heard; and in about two hours time they returned again into the court, erected upon a scaffold in Westminster-hall; and after they were seated in their places, the Lord High Steward being seated in his chair before the throne, spoke to the lords thus:

L. H. S. Will your lordships proceed to give your judgment?—Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. Your lordships will give me leave, as I ask your lordships your several opinions, to take so much time as to write down the opinion of every lord.—Lords. Ay, ay.

Then the Lord High Steward asked this question of every one of the lords there present, beginning with the puisne baron, which was the lord Bernard.

L. H. S. My lord Bernard, is Edward earl of Warwick guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

The lord Bernard stood up in his place uncovered, and laying his right hand upon his breast, pronounced his judgment thus:

L. Bernard. Not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter, upon my honour*.

The same Question was asked severally of all the lords, who in the same form delivered the same opinion.

Then the Lord High Steward reckoned up the number of the Peers that were then present, and the opinions that were given, and afterwards acquainted their lordships with the Resolutions that they came to, in this manner:

L. H. S. My lords, your lordships are 93 in number here present, and you have all acquitted my lord of Warwick of the murder whereof he stands indicted, but you are of opinion that he is guilty of manslaughter: Is it your pleasure that he should be called to the bar, and acquainted with your lordships judgment?—Lords. Ay, ay.

* Mr. Barrington, Observations on 34 Ed. 3, infers from a Case in the year books, (Mich. 1, Hen. 4.) that the answer originally was upon my conscience, and not upon my honour.

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes! chief governor of the Tower of London, bring forth the body of your prisoner, Edward earl of Warwick, forthwith, upon pain and peril will fall thereon.

Then the earl of Warwick was brought to the bar.

L. H. S. My lord of Warwick, your lordship has been arraigned upon an indictment for the killing Mr. Coote; you have pleaded not guilty, and put yourself upon your trial by your peers here present; my lords have heard the evidence given both against you and for you, and have considered of it, and are come to a resolution; and their judgment is, That your lordship is not guilty of the murder whereof you stand indicted, but that you are guilty of manslaughter. What has your lordship to say, why judgment of death should not be pronounced against you according to the law?

Earl of War. My lords, I desire that the benefit of my peerage may be allowed me, according to the statute of Edward the 6th*.

L. H. S. My lord, your lordship has demanded the benefit of your peerage upon the statute of Edward the 6th, and you must have it by law; but I am directed by their lordships to acquaint you, that you cannot have the benefit of that statute twice; therefore I am likewise directed by their lordships to say, that they hope you will take a more than ordinary care of your behaviour for the future, that so you may never hereafter fall into such unfortunate circumstances as you have been now under; my lords hope this will be so sensible a warning, that nothing of this kind will ever happen to you again; your lordship is now to be discharged.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships' pleasure to adjourn to the House of Lords?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. This House is adjourned to the House of Lords.

Then the lords went in procession, in the same order that they came into the court.

* Mr. Barrington (Obs. on 12 H. 7, cap. 7.) says, "I find but one instance of a criminal's not claiming the benefit of clergy, which is that of the duke of Somerset." See in this Collection, vol. 1, pp. 509, 515, the proceedings against him. The expression of sir John Hayward, to whom Barrington refers. (See his "Life and Reign of Edward the Sixth") in 2 Keanett, are observable, "The duke of Somerset might have craved his clergy; but he suffered judgment to pass." If lord Audley (see his case in this Collection, vol. 3, pp. 401, 402, 403, 2 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, c. 43, Leach's Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, chap. 30, s. 23, chap. 53, s. 28.) had stood mute upon the indictment against him for the rape, he would have intitled himself to benefit of clergy, and so have avoided sentence of death upon that conviction.

403. The Trial of CHARLES LORD MOHUN,* before the House of Lords, for the Murder of Richard Coote, esq.: 11 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1699.

March 29, 1699.

ABOUT one of the clock the Lords came, in the same order as the day before to the trial of the earl of Warwick, into the court erected in Westminster-hall.

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes! My Lord High Steward his grace does strictly charge and command all manner of persons here present to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes! All manner of persons who are obliged to give their attendance here this day, before his grace my Lord High Steward of England, let them give their attendance forthwith.

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation again.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes! His grace my Lord High Steward of England does straitly charge and command all manner of persons here present to be uncovered.

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation again.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes! Chief governor of the Tower of London, bring forth the body of your prisoner Charles lord Mohun forthwith, upon pain and peril will fall thereon.

[Then my lord Mohun was brought to the bar.]

L. High Steward. (Lord Somers.) My lord Mohun, your lordship is now brought upon your trial for the murder of Mr. Coote, for which you stand indicted by the grand jury for the county of Middlesex. The king, who knows that justice is one of the pillars which supports a throne, will have a strict account taken of the blood of any of his subjects, without respect to the quality of the slain, or of the person who stands charged with his death. There is not one of the noble peers here present, who are to be your triers, but does heartily wish your lordship innocent; but on the other side, if you should appear to be guilty upon the evidence, you ought not to hope that any consideration of relation, friendship, or pity, will prevail against justice. And therefore, since in your present condition every thing that is valuable in this world is at stake, it will be highly necessary for your lordship to recollect yourself, and to have your best thoughts about you. Facts of this nature are frequently attended with such unhappy circumstances, that a noble person may be justly covered with shame to have faults and weaknesses exposed to such an assembly as this, although he be not conscious to himself of the guilt of blood: but your lordship ought not to be so far discomposed with any thoughts of this kind, as to neglect your defence against this heavy accusation of murder. In order to this, it is necessary for your lordship to hear with temper what will be said against you, and by no means to interrupt the counsel or witnesses. I will take care to give your lordship notice when the proper time comes for you to make your observations upon the evidence, to examine your witnesses, and to say what you think proper for your own defence; and when my lords have heard, and fully and maturely considered the whole matter, their lordships will give such a judgment as the law and justice require.

L. H. S. Read the indictment to my lord:

Clerk of the Crown. Charles lord Mohun, your lordship stands indicted in the county of Middlesex, by the name of Charles lord Mohun of Okehampton in the county of Devon, late of the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields in the county of Middlesex, together with Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, late of the same parish and county, Richard French, late of the same parish and county, gent. Roger James, late of the same parish and county, gent. and George Dockwra, late of the same parish and county, gent. not having the fear of God before your eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the 30th day of October, in the tenth year of the reign of our sovereign lord that now is, William the third, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. with force and arms, &c. at the parish aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, in and upon one Richard Coote, esq. in the peace of God, and our said sovereign lord the king, that now is, then and there being, feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice afore-thought did make an assault; and that the aforesaid Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, with a certain sword made of iron and steel, of the value of five shillings, which he the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland in his right hand then and there had and held drawn, the aforesaid Richard Coote, in and upon the left part of the breast of him the said Richard Coote, near the collar-bone of him the said Richard Coote, then and there feloniously, voluntarily, and of his malice afore-thought, did strike, stab, and thrust in, giving to the said Richard Coote, then and there with the sword drawn aforesaid, in and upon the left part of the breast of him the said Richard Coote, near the collar-bone of him the said Richard Coote, one mortal wound of the breadth of half an inch, and of the depth of five inches, of which said mortal wound he the aforesaid Richard Coote then and there instantly died: and that you the said lord Mohun, together with the said Richard French, Roger James, and George Dockwra, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice aforethought, were present, aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, the said Richard Coote in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, to kill and murder; and so the said Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, and you the said Charles lord Mohun, Richard French, Roger James, and George Dockwra, the aforesaid Richard Coote, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, that now is, his crown and dignity.

Cl. of Cr. How say you, Charles lord Mohun, are you guilty of this felony and murder, whereof you stand indicted, or not guilty?

L. Mohun. Not guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, How will you be tried?

L. Mohun. By God and my peers.

Cl. of Cr. God send your lordship good deliverance.

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes! All manner of persons that will give evidence on behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against Charles lord Mohun, the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and give their evidence; for now he stands at the bar for his deliverance.

L. Mohun. My lords, I desire. I may have the benefit of pen, ink, and paper.

L. H. S. Your lordships are pleased to permit my lord Mohun to have pen, ink, and paper?

Lords. Ay, ay.

[Pen, ink, and paper were carried to my lord, by one of the clerks of the House.]

Mr. Cowper. May it please your lordships, my lord Mohun, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted by the grand jury of the county of Middlesex, before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in that county; and the indictment sets forth, That Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, Charles lord Mohun, baron Mohun of Okehampton in the county of Devon, Richard French, Roger James and George Dockwra, the 30th of October, in the tenth year of his majesty's reign, with force and arms, at the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, upon one Richard Coote, esq; feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that the said

Edward earl of Warwick and Holland, with a drawn sword then in his right hand, the said Richard Coote, upon the left part of his breast near the collar bone, did strike, stab, and thrust, giving him thereby a mortal wound of the breadth of half an inch, and the depth of five inches, of which wound he instantly died; that my lord Mohun, Mr. French, Mr. James and Mr. Dockwra, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, were present, aiding, and abetting my lord of Warwick and Holland, the said Richard Coote, in manner aforesaid, to kill and murder; and then concludes, so that the earl of Warwick and Holland, the said lord Mohun, Richard French, Roger James, and George Dockwra, the said Richard Coote, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the peace of the king, his crown and dignity. To this indictment my lord Mohun has pleaded not guilty, and for his trial has put himself upon God and your lordships, his peers. We shall call our witnesses, and produce what evidence we have to give to prove my lord Mohun guilty, and to submit it to you.

Attorney General. (Sir Thomas Trevor.) My lords, this noble lord, my lord Mohun, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for the death of Mr. Coote, one of the king's subjects, as your lordships have heard in the case that was before you yesterday; to which indictment he hath pleaded not guilty, and for his trial has put himself upon my lords, who are his peers; I shall very shortly open the substance of the evidence that we shall offer for the king against my lord, the prisoner at the bar; we shall produce evidence to prove, that at the time laid in the indictment, the 29th of October at night, and the next morning, which was Sunday, my lord the prisoner at the bar, and my lord of Warwick, (who has been found guilty of manslaughter upon this indictment before your lordships) and those other persons that are named in the indictment, captain French, captain James, and Mr. Dockwra, and the gentleman that was killed, happened to be at the Greyhound tavern in the Strand, which was then kept by Mr. Locket, and continued there a great part of the night, indeed till the next morning, about one or two of the clock in the morning; there was my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, captain French, captain Coote, and Mr. Dockwra; but very late in the night the other gentleman, Mr. James, was sent for: A messenger was sent particularly to have him come to them; there they continued drinking till about one or two of the clock in the morning, then coaches were sent for; then the drawer of the house will acquaint your lordships, that he went for them, and could not get any at that time, being a very dark night; and when there could be no coaches had, then there were chairs called for, and the drawer went to call chairs; and as we shall make it appear to your lordships, when the drawer came back, there did appear to be a quarrel among them, for there was clashing of swords, and they seemed to be divided into two parties; on the one side were my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun the prisoner at the bar, and Mr. Coote; on the other side were captain French, captain James, and Mr. Dockwra; and first there were two chairs came to the door, into which Mr. French and Mr. Coote went, and when they were in the chairs my lord Mohun came out, and said he would kill any of the chairmen that went away; and so they put up again, and the gentlemen came out, and came into the house; but afterwards Mr. Coote went into the first chair, and my lord of Warwick into the next, and my lord Mohun into the third, and then they went away; and the other three gentlemen went into the other three chairs, and followed them. Your lordships will hear whither they were all carried. When they came to the end of St. Martin's lane in the Strand, my lord Mohun would indeed have endeavoured to have persuaded Mr. Coote in particular to have gone home for that night, and let the business alone till another time; but Mr. Coote would go on; and while the three chairs carried my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and Mr. Coote to St. Martin's lane end, which were the three first chairs that went away from Locket's, the other three chairs that went after them overtook them, and then by Mr. Coote's command, the chairmen that carried him went forward towards Leicester fields; and then this noble lord, my lord Mohun, did say, If you go on, I will go and see the end of it, and ordered the chairman that carried him to go after those chairs in which my lord of Warwick and Mr. Coote went; and accordingly they did go till they came to the hither end of the square in Leicester fields, near Green street end, where my lord Mohun got out of his chair, and paid for all the three chairs three shillings. But we shall not be able to give to your lordships an account particularly as to my lord Mohun, what he did afterwards, but we shall call our witnesses to prove what we have opened; and when our witnesses are heard, we shall leave the matter to your lordships' judgment.

[Samuel Cawthorne, which was the drawer at the tavern at Locket's, was sworn, and gave his evidence to the same effect that he did the day before.]

Att. Gen. Pray, will you acquaint my lords, who were at your house the 29th and 30th of October last, Saturday night and Sunday morning?

Cawthorne. There were my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, captain Coote, capt. French, Mr. Dockwra, and Mr. James.

Att. Gen. How long did they continue there?

Caw. Till between one and two o'clock in the morning.

Att. Gen. Pray, will you acquaint my lords what happened at your master's house at that time; you remember what evidence you gave yesterday; tell the whole matter again, because it relates to another noble lord that is now at the bar.

Cam. The reckoning was called for about that time, and I went up and took the reckoning, and all the gentlemen came down to the bar, and coaches were sent for; I went for them, but no coaches could be had: then chairs were sent for, and I called for chairs, and there came two chairs to the door, and into those two chairs went capt. Coote and capt. French; and my lord Mohun and my lord of Warwick endeavoured to quiet them, and to put off the business till another day, and thereupon they came out of the chairs, and came into the house again; my lord Mohun did desire there might be no quarrel, and would have Mr. Coote go home with him to his lodgings at Westminster, or he would go with Mr. Coote, and said there should be no quarrel that night: there were then three of them on one side of the bar, and three of the other side, and their swords were all drawn. My lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and Mr. Coote, were of one side, and captain French, capt. James, and Mr. Dockwra, were of the other side: I was without the house when the swords were first drawn; but I heard my lord Mohun say, I have got a cut finger by endeavouring to part them; and at first when the chairs came on, my lord Mohun said, if they did quarrel, he would send to the guards for a file of musqueteers, and secure them; so that he did what he could to prevent any quarrel at all; and when he had received the wound in his hand, I helped him to a napkin to wrap his hand in, upon the bleeding of it: then my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun, and captain Coote, went away in three chairs, and my lord Mohun gave order to go down to Westminster; and there were three chairs called for by the other three persons; two did come, and capt. French and capt. James went into them; and the sixth not being come, they staid till it did come, and then they three went away too; the chairs were all ordered to go home with them; my lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun gave order to their chairs to keep close with Mr. Coote; and the other three chairs immediately followed.

Att. Gen. Pray, will you consider, and recollect with yourself, was Mr. James there at first?

Caw. No, I was sent for him about ten o'clock at night, and there he continued with them till they went all away in the six chairs, and he was almost fuddled when he came in.

Att. Gen. When James came in, was his sword drawn?

Caw. His sword was in the scabbard, but the scabbard was broken, and he took and broke his sword stamping upon it.

Att. Gen. Pray, can you tell, you being up and down in the room, what was the occasion of the quarrel?

Caw. Indeed I cannot tell; but some words past when they were below stairs by the bar from capt. Coote, that he would laugh when he pleased, and frown when he pleased; and Mr. Dockwra did say, that they would fight them whenever they pleased when they went away; but I did not observe that there was any quarrel between them while they were above, nor any swords drawn till after I came from calling the chairs.

Att. Gen. Were all the swords drawn at once?

Caw. They were all drawn when I came in from calling for the coaches and the chairs, and three were within the bar, and three were without; they were putting up their swords when I came in again; indeed I do not know any thing of the quarrel.

L. H. S. My lord Mohun, will you ask this witness any questions?

L. Mohun. Indeed, I think I need not ask him any question; but yet, if Your lordships please, I would ask him this, Whether directly or indirectly I was any ways concerned in the quarrel? or, whether I did not endeavour all that ever I could to quiet them?

Caw. Yes, indeed, my lord Mohun did endeavour all that ever he could to prevent any quarrel at that time.

L. Mohun. Did I say any thing tending to the promoting of a quarrel or fighting among them?

Caw. No; my lord Mohun did not promote any thing of the quarrel between them, but he did say two or three times, that he would send for the guards to secure them, and keep them from fighting, both at the door of the house, and at the bar, and asked for a napkin to wrap up his hand in, for the wound which he said he got in endeavouring to quiet and part them, and prevent their fighting.

L. Mohun. That is all that I would ask him, whether I did not endeavour all that I could to prevent any quarrelling or fighting at that time?

Caw. Yes, indeed, my lord did so.

L. H. S. He has said so already, my lord, and therefore there does not need any further examination of him to that point: if both sides have done with this witness, let him go down. (Which he did.)

L. H. S. Then, Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness?

Att. Gen. Our next witness is Thomas Browne, who was one of the chairmen that carried Mr. Coote into Leicester-fields. [Then he was sworn.]

L. H. S. What is the question you would ask him, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. My lords, I desire he may be asked and examined, and acquaint your lordships, who it was that he carried from Locket's the 29th of October last to Leicester-fields, and what time it was of the night?

Browne. I carried Mr. Coote in my chair.

Att. Gen. Whither were you directed to carry him?

Browne. To Leicester-fields.

Att. Gen. What time of night was it?

Browne. It was three quarters past one, as near as I could guess.

Att. Gen. Pray, what other chairs were there that went along with you?

Browne. There were two other chairs.

Att. Gen. Who were in those chairs, pray?

Browne. There were my lord of Warwick in one, and my lord Mohun in the other.

Att. Gen. Did you three go away from Locket's together?

Browne. Yes, we did; and when we were bid to take up, we went to the end of St. Martin's-lane, and turning up at the end of St. Martin's-lane, there my lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun called out to capt. Coote to stay, and to turn down to go to Westminster; but Mr. Coote would turn up the lane, and my lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun made a stop at the back door of the Cross-Keys tavern, and both of them persuaded Mr. Coote to put it off till the next morning; but he would not, he said he would make an end of it that night.

Att. Gen. Pray, recollect yourself, did they name among them what their business was that they would make an end of?

Browne. No, they did not.

Att. Gen. Who was it that stopped at St. Martin's-lane end?

Browne. When we were turning up at St. Martin's-lane end, my lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun called out to stop, and asked Mr. Coote whither he was going? and when he said, to Leicester-fields, my lord Mohun called out to us to set down, which we did, at the back-door of the Cross-Keys tavern; they did both of them, my lord Warwick and my lord Mohun, persuade Mr. Coote to go home to Westminster, and not to end the business that night; but he would go on; and while we were there, there went three other chairs up St. Martin's-lane on the other side of the way; then Mr. Coote, who was in our chair, bid us take up, and follow those chairs into the fields, and swore, Damn him, he would run his sword into one of us, if we did not make haste, and overtake those other chairs, and go before them; I think his words were, 'Damn me, I'll run my sword into your breech, if you do not make haste, and get before that other chair.'

Att. Gen. You say then, they went all away together up to Leicester-fields?

Browne. Yes, they did so.

Lord Mohun. I desire he may be asked, Whether I did not desire him to go home with me to my lodging at Westminster?

Browne. Yes, you did, and begged of him as if it had been for an alms, that he would put it off for that night; but when the other chairs past by us at Charing-cross, in St. Martin's-lane, he would have the chair taken up, and us to make what haste we could to get before them thither, or else, he swore, damn him, he would run his sword into one of us, if we did not make haste to get to Leicester-fields before the other chairs that went up the other side of the way.

Att. Gen. When the other chairs were past by, and you went away to Leicester-fields, pray tell my lords what happened then?

Browne. We went away to Leicester-fields, when we came to Green-street end, and were entering upon the square upon the broad stones, Mr. Coote called out to us, and bid us to set him down, and so did the other two chairs; and when he put his hand into his pocket to discharge us, my lord of Warwick put his hand in his pocket to pay the three chairs, and Mr. Coote offered half a guinea to discharge the chairs, and my lord Mohun did produce 3s. and with it discharged all the three chairs, and they all three walked away together forward upon the broad stones, on the right hand side of the way; it was so dark a night, I could not see half a dozen yards from me: it was the darkest night, I think, that ever I saw in all my life, and therefore I cannot tell what became of them after they went out of the chairs.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you see my lord Mohun afterwards?

Browne. No, I did never see my lord Mohun afterwards till now here at the bar.

Att. Gen. You say it was so dark, that you could not see three yards from you; pray, what did happen afterwards when you were in the field?

Browne. A little while after we had set down these gentlemen, I filled my pipe out of my box, and before I could light it, I heard a calling of chairs, chairs, and I went up towards the end of the square, where the noise was; and when I came there, they would have had me lift the chair over the rails, and I told them, if I did I could not lift it over again: but they would needs have me lift it over, and I did so; and by the light of the lanthorn I saw captain French and captain James holding up captain Coote, and they did desire me to take him into our chair, but he was in such a condition that I could not get him into the chair; it was before I could well light my pipe the chairs were called.

Att. Gen. Who did call, can you tell?

Browne. No, indeed, I cannot tell who did call chairs, but it was a voice from the upper end of the fields, and we lifted our chair over the rails into the fields, and there were two gentlemen holding up another man; I have heard it said it was captain French and captain James, and they cried out, Dear Coote, Dear Coote! and would have had him gotten into the chair, but we could not; and my lord of Warwick did then say, if any damage did come to the chair, though it were 100l. we should be satisfied for the damage; but we were not able to get him into the chair, and so there we left him.

Att. Gen. You say you saw two gentlemen holding up Mr. Coote, and it was a very dark night, how could you tell who those gentlemen were?

Browne. I could not see any thing of them till we came up with the candle close to them.

Att. Gen. And what did they say when you came up close to the chair?

Browne. They offered me an 100l. satisfaction for any damage to my chair; but they could not get him in, for he was at that time dead, I believe, for we went to hale him up, and to get him into the chair, but we could not do it.

Att. Gen. Can you tell who the two persons were that held him up?

Browne. No; but by the description of the persons they had such cloaths on, as that they must be captain French and captain James; but indeed I cannot swear directly who they were that were there, nor who they were that called for chairs at the upper end of the field; but when our chair was lifted over again over the rails, and we came to the corner to see who should be taken in, there came one to us who bid us carry him to the Bagnio in Long-Acre; and thither we did go accordingly.

Att. Gen. Pray, can you tell who the persons were that held up the gentleman they would have to be got into the chair?

Browne. No, indeed, I cannot.

Att. Gen. Pray, can you describe them so as to know them, whether my lord of Warwick, and my lord Mohun were those two gentlemen?

Browne. My lord of Warwick and my lord Mohun were not there, I am sure, for I know them very well; I was acquainted with them before; and when I came up to these gentlemen with the candle, there was one of them was bigger than my lord of Warwick, or my lord Mohun; and the elder of them had other sort of cloaths than either of them had on at that time, as we could see when we came up close with the candle to them.

Att. Gen. Were there any lights of the lamps, that are usually in the streets at that time, about the square?

Browne. Yes, there were those lights; but it was a very dark night, and we could not see two yards before us, that I am sure of; and there was nobody else that I saw at that time at the upper end of the field, but those two gentlemen, holding up of captain Coote, whom we had brought up before to the square, and left him with the earl of Warwick and my lord Mohun at the bottom of the square; but whether they all went, indeed I cannot tell: we called watch; but they said it was not within their ward, and therefore they would not come. When we saw how ill Mr. Coote was upon our coming up, and that he could not get him into the chair, we went away, lifted our chair over the rails again, and carried a gentleman to the Bagnio in Long-Acre.

L. Mohun. I have a question to ask this witness, and that is, how far the place is whither he carried the chair, that is from Green-street end, to the place whither the chair was called for again, at the upper end of the place, where he found the two gentlemen holding up Mr. Coote, and endeavouring to get him up into the chair?

Browne. I believe it is about fifty yards as near as I can guess.

L. Mohun. I desire to know, whether he means fifty yards from the upper end, to the lower end of Leicester-fields?

Browne. Yes, I believe, my lord, it is, and better.

L. Mohun. I desire to ask him, whether Green-street be not the very lower end of the square?

Browne. Yes, my lord, the lower end of the square, coming out of St. Martin's-lane into Green-street.

Att. Gen. But did you see three other chairs in that place?

Browne. Yes, while I was filling my pipe out of my box, three other chairs did come by, and went away; but within a little while after the filling of my pipe, or rather before I could well fill it, or light it, we heard calling for chairs again towards the upper end of the fields, and we carried up our chair thither, and there we found, as I have told you, two gentlemen holding up Mr. Coote, and crying out, my dear Coote, my dear Coote!

Att. Gen. Can you tell who it was that called for the chairs the second time, when you were in the fields?

Browne. No, indeed, I cannot; but they would have us bring our chair over the rails, and we did lift it over; and when we came up to them, I saw only two gentlemen, whom I did not know who they were particularly, till we came up close to them, that we could see their cloaths, by the light of the candle in our lantern; and they would have had us put Mr. Coote into our chair, and he being very much wounded, they would have had us carry him away; we told them it would spoil our chair, and we could not besides lift him over the rails again; they promised we should have any satisfaction for damage to our chair, even to the value of a hundred pounds; we went to leave him up to put him into the chair, and did all we could to have got him into the chair, but we could not; so we lifted the chair over the rails again; and when we came to the corner of the rails, at the way that goes to Long-Acre, there we took up a gentleman, whom we carried to the Bagnio in Long-Acre; we called out to the watch; but they said it was not within their ward, and they would not come.

Att. Gen. Can you tell who were the persons that were at the upper end of the fields?

Browne. No, indeed, I cannot tell who they were.

Att. Gen. Was my lord Mohun and my lord Warwick the two?

Browne. No, my lord Mohun was not there, nor my lord Warwick; I know them so well, that it could not be them; one of the gentlemen was bigger than my lord of Warwick, and the other of them had other cloaths than my lord Mohun.

Att. Gen. Was that the way they walked up, when they came out of the chairs, that led to that end of the fields where you found Mr. Coote wounded?

Browne. Yes, it was.

Att. Gen. My lords, this is but the repetition of the evidence that he gave to your lordships yesterday.

L. H. S. If you have done with this witness, my lord Mohun may ask him any questions.

L. Mohun. I desire to have him asked, how far is the place where he carried the chair at first into Leicester-fields, from the place where they put over the chair within the rails, and would have taken in Mr. Coote?

Browne. It is about fifty yards, as near as I can guess.

L. Mohun. I desire to know of him, whether the place where we were set down, that came in the first three chairs, from Locket's into Leicester-fields, to the place where he found Mr. Coote supported by the two gentlemen, be not from one end of the fields to the other?

Browne. The place where we set down captain Coote is at the lower end of Green-street, and the place where we found him wounded, was at the upper end by Leicester-house.

L. H. S. I think it is understood, that Green-street, which comes out of St. Martin's-lane, is at one end of Leicester-square, and Leicester-house is at the other end.

Att. Gen. Pray, where was it that you saw the two gentlemen holding up captain Coote, and cry out, my dear Coote! my dear Coote!

Browne. It was on one side of the cross way, that leads out of the fields towards Newport street, and by Leicester house.

Att. Gen. But you say three chairs did go up towards the upper end of the fields?

Browne. Yes they did so; but our three chairs that came away first from the Greyhound tavern, set down at Green street end, and the three gentlemen that came in our chairs went up the pales to them; but whither they went I cannot tell, but soon after we heard calling for chairs again, and so we went up, where we found the two gentlemen holding captain Coote, and saying, my dear Coote! my dear Coote!

Att. Gen. But when you were called the second time, that is, into the fields, where was the place you say that you found them in?

Browne. It was within the rails, one side of the cross-way towards Leicester-house.

L. Mohun. Pray, was that the direct way that I went from the place that I was set down, that is, the lower end of Green street, to the place that they afterwards went to, which was the bagnio in Long Acre?

Browne. When captain Coote, and my lord Mohun were set down, and walked at the paved stones of the square, to where I found the two gentlemen, the capt. Coote, was the quite contrary way, the end of Green street to the Standard tavern.

L. H. S. Who is your next witness, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. The next witness that we call is Robert Applegate. (Who was sworn.)

L. H. S. What do you ask this witness?

Att. Gen. My lords, this is the chairman that carried my lord Mohun to Leicester fields from Locker's; he will give your lordships an account when he carried him, who he carried, and what happened afterwards, which is all but to the same purpose with the evidence that he gave yesterday. But pray, who was that whom you carried on the thirtieth of October last to Leicester fields?

Applegate. I carried my lord Mohun from Locker's, at the Greyhound tavern in the Strand, to Leicester fields.

Att. Gen. Pray, how many chairs were there of you that went away together?

Applegate. There were three of us that went away together, one carried my lord Warwick, we my lord Mohun, and the third carried captain Coote, which was the first chair that went away.

Att. Gen. Whither did you go?

Applegate. We went to the corner of St. Martin's lane.

Att. Gen. Who do you say were in the other two chairs?

Applegate. My lord of Warwick, and my lord Mohun.

Att. Gen. When they came out first, what orders or directions were given?

Applegate. My lord Mohun said, That he and my lord of Warwick, and captain Coote, would go all three together down to Westminster, and there they would all lie together, or he together that night.

Att. Gen. What answer was given to what my lord Mohun said?

Applegate. Indeed I do not remember any answer that was given at all; but after that my lord Mohun went into the chair, and ordered us to follow down the other two chairs towards Westminster, and we put up the chair and came away; and when we came to St. Martin's lane, the chair that carried capt. Coote turned up the lane, and we being ordered to follow the other chairs, went up the lane too; but my lord Mohun perceiving that they were not going down to Westminster, called out to stop, just when we were entered into St. Martin's lane, over against the back door of the Cross-keys tavern, and made the other chairs to stand, and all the three chairs were set abreast before that place, and my lord Mohun asked capt. Coote, whither he was going? And he answered, to Leicester fields: He begged of him, as one would beg for an alms, that he would not go that night, for the business could not be done that night, and it was better to put it off till the next morning.

Att. Gen. Did they name what the business was, that was to be done?

Applegate. No; but my lord Mohun did say, it was impossible to be done that night.

Att. Gen. Well, and what happened afterwards, while you were in that place?

Applegate. While we were there, three other chairs passed by us on the other side of the way, and going forward up the street, capt. Coote ordered their chairs to follow, and so we did to Green street end, and there we set them down.

Att. Gen. Pray, can you remember what was said by my lord Mohun at the time when the other chairs passed by?

Applegate. He was then desiring and begging of capt. Coote to go home to Westminster, telling him that it could not be done that night; but it must be deferred till the next morning; but capt. Coote said he would not delay it till the next morning, but he would go to Leicester fields that night; and all three chairs were ordered to go forward, and we did go on forward to Leicester fields; my lord Mohun, indeed, did beg and desire as heartily as, I say, a man for an alms, that they would let it alone for that night; but capt. Coote would not, and ordered his chair to go forwards.

Att. Gen. You say, my lord Mohun begged as heartily as if it were for an alms to defer it for that night?

Applegate. Yes, he did so; so that I do really think that he was not concerned in the matter.

Att. Gen. If he were so earnest to defer and put off the business, how came you to carry him thither, that night? What expressions did he use particularly in St. Martin's lane, after the other chairs were passed by?

Applegate. He said, If you must go, I will go with you and see it; and he bid us take up and follow the other chairs wherein capt. Coote and my lord Warwick were; and we did go.

Att. Gen. And where did you set my lord Mohun down?

Applegate. At the hither end of Leicester-square, at the corner of Green-street, the lower corner of the paved stones, going up to Leicester-house.

Att. Gen. What became of the three gentlemen that you set down at the end of Green-street?

Applegate. They went all three together up the stone pavement, towards the upper end of the square, towards the Standard tavern, I think.

Att. Gen. Did they go together, or did they go asunder?

Applegate. They went together, I think; I did not see them part one from another.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you see my lord Mohun afterwards?

Applegate. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. What became of you afterwards?

Applegate. I staid a little at the lower end of the square to take a pipe of tobacco, and when I had filled my pipe, I heard calling chairs, chairs, again, at the upper end of the square; and when we brought up our chair to the upper end of the fields, the first man that I did see was my lord of Warwick, who would have had us put over our chair within the rails; but we told him we could not get it over again if any one was put in it; but if they would come out into the square, there we were ready to carry them any where; and when we came to the upper end of the square, there was captain French, and we took him into the chair, and he bid us carry him to the Bagno in Long-acre; and at Newport-street end he would have had us stop and pull off his cloaths, for he believed he was a deail man.

Att. Gen. Pray, who did you see there at the upper end of Leicester-fields?

Applegate. Nobody indeed, but my lord of Warwick and Mr. French.

Att. Gen. Nobody but them two?

Applegate. No; nobody but them two.

Att. Gen. Where do you say that was, that the calling for chairs was, and where you brought your chair?

Applegate. It was just at the upper end of Leicester-fields, by Leicester-house, and by the Standard-tavern.

Att. Gen. Who was it that you there took up?

Applegate. It was captain French.

Att. Gen. Whither then did you carry him?

Applegate. We were ordered to go to the Bagno in Long-acre; and thither we, and another chair that carried my lord Warwick, did go; and when we came there, we did knock a good while before we could get any body up; and when they were let in, we came away, and were bid to call for our fare the next morning.

Att. Gen. Pray, where was it that you took up captain French?

Applegate. It was the upper end of all of Leicester-fields.

Att. Gen. And you went away with him, did you?

Applegate. Yes, as soon as ever we took him up; it was as soon as ever we could, at the outside of the rails. I was the first chair that, upon the calling for chairs after they came thither, was by the Standard-tavern, and from thence we went into Long-acre.

Att. Gen. Whereabout is the Standard-tavern?

Applegate. It is at the further end of the fields by Leicester-house; it is by Cranburne-lane, which is the street that leads into Newport-street, and so into St. Martin's-lane; and then we were to go to the Bagno in Long-acre.

L. H. S. My lord Mohun, will you ask this witness any questions?

L. Mohun. Yes, my lord, I have a question or two to ask him, I desire to ask him, Whether, when we were going along, and the chair in which capt. Coote was, turned up St. Martin's-lane, I did not call out to have him stop, and know whither they were going?

Applegate. Yes, my lord, you did.

L. Mohun. Pray, whither did I bid you go, when you first took me up at Locket's?

Applegate. My lord Mohun bid me follow those chairs; but go down to Westminster, for he said they all three would go together, and lie together that night.

L. Mohun. My lords, I desire this man may be asked, Whether there were not several ways of going out of the fields, besides those of Green-street and the Standard-tavern?

Applegate. Yes, my lord, no doubt there are.

L. Mohun. Then I will leave it to your lordships to make the observation; for there is no evidence that I was even seen in the field after I alighted out of the chair, at Green-street end; and I hope your lordships do observe that he has told you, I was earnest in begging captain Coote to defer going to Leicester-fields till the next morning, and begged as heartily of him for it, as any beggar would do for an alms.

L. H. S. My lord, their lordships, no doubt, have made that observation; for he did say so.

L. Mohun. My lords, I have no more to ask him.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness?

Att. Gen. Our next witness is Peter Ketro, who likewise was a chairman that carried my lord Mohun into the place where the fact was done.

[Peter Ketro was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Pray, will you acquaint my lords who you carried upon the 30th of October last, from the Greyhound-tavern to Leicester-fields?

Ketro. Upon the 30th of October last, in the morning (which was Sunday) very early, we were called to the door of the Greyhound-tavern, and when we came there, there were several other chairs there; for there was no coach, it seems, to be had.

Att. Gen. And who was in your chair?

Ketro. My lord Mohun; and there were two other chairs that went away together, wherein were captain Coote and my lord Warwick.

Att. Gen. And whither did you go from thence?

Ketro. We went along the Strand, and when we came to the end of St. Martin's-lane, the chair that capt. Coote was in, we supposed by his order turned up the lane; for my lord Mohun had given us order to go down to Westminster; and then when we came there to the end of St. Martin's-lane, he called out to stop, and to have the other chairs stopt, and they stood still at the back door of the Cross-keys-tavern, which is at the end of St. Martin's-lane, and all the three chairs did make a stand at that place, and my lord of Warwick, and my lord Mohun and captain Coote talked together; and my lord Mohun did desire capt. Coote to go down to Westminster, and to put off the business for that night; for nothing of business could be done: then my lord of Warwick did say, if they did go on he would go on with them; but my lord Mohun did endeavour to persuade them to go down to Westminster to lodge, for nothing could be done that night; but when the other three chairs passed by, on the other side of the way, and captain Coote would needs go forwards to Leicester-fields, my lord Mohun did bid us take up and follow them; and he said, if they would go, he would go and see what came of it; so we took up, and followed the other chairs, and went up the lane, and into Green-street, to the lower end of Green-street next the square, and there our three chairs set down my lord Warwick, my lord Mohun, and captain Coote, and were discharged.

Att. Gen. And what became of them after?

Ketro. There they went up upon the broad-stones, up towards the upper end of the fields.

Att. Gen. Did they all go together, or did they part?

Ketro. They went together, for any thing I know; I saw no parting, and indeed it was so dark a night, that I cannot tell what became of them after they went out of the chairs: It was one of the darkest nights that ever I saw.

Att. Gen. Well then, pray, what happened after that?

Ketro. I went to light my pipe of tobacco, and before we could light a pipe of tobacco, there was calling at the upper end of the square for chairs again; and so we went with our chair to the upper end of the fields; and when we came there, somebody called out to have us lift our chair over within the rails; but we told them, if we did so, we could not get it over again, if any body were put into it; and so we were bid to go to the end of the rails, in order to the getting out from that place, and getting in of any body that was to go into the chair; and when we came to the end of the rails we took up capt. French, and he bid us carry him to the Bagnio in Long-acre, and we did so; and at Newport-street end he would have had us have pulled off his cloaths, for he said he believed he was a dying man; but we carried him on to the Bagnio in Long-acre, and there came after us the lord of Warwick in another chair; and there we set them down.

Att. Gen. I have a question to ask you, friend; did you not see my lord Mohun after you set him down at Green-street end?

Ketro. No, indeed, not I: I did not after he went out of the chair.

Att. Gen. Can you tell whether he went after he went out of the chair?

Ketro. No, I cannot tell whether he went; they all three went up the paved stones together; but whether they went I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Did you hear of any other chair that was at the end of the fields at that time?

Ketro. There was another chair at that time, at the upper end of the fields.

Att. Gen. Did you hear them desire to take Mr. Coote into that chair?

Ketro. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. Nor do you know any thing of their putting Mr. Coote into a chair?

Ketro. No, indeed; not I; what they did as to the other chair that was before, they can best tell, for I cannot.

L. H. S. Who is your next witness, Mr. Attorney?—Att. Gen. Richard Edwards.

L. H. S. What do you call him to?

Att. Gen. Because we would not trouble your lordships with the repetition of every one of the witnesses that were here yesterday; this is the man that carried Mr. Dockwra into the field.

[Edwards was sworn.]

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, What do you ask this witness?

Att. Gen. Pray do you acquaint my noble lords here, who you carried in your chair to Leicester-fields?

Edwards. Indeed, I cannot tell; there were three chairs that took up three persons at the Greyhound-tavern in the Strand, after three other chairs were gone away, and every one had a gentleman in them; I, for my part, did not know who was in our chair; but when we shut up the chair we were bid to go to the Standard-tavern in Leicester-fields; and thither we did go, and there we set down the gentleman that was in our chair; and away we went; and as we went up St. Martin's-lane, we passed by the three other chairs that turned up before, at the back-door of the Cross-keys tavern.

Att. Gen. Did you see the other three chairs in Leicester-fields afterwards?

Edwards. No, indeed; I did not; but went up to the Standard tavern, and set down the gentleman that was in our chair, and there left him, and went away.

Att. Gen. Pray, can you tell who it was that you carried?

Edwards. Indeed, I cannot very well tell; but I believe it was captain James, or Mr. Dockwra.

Att. Gen. When you came to the Standard-tavern, pray, what happened? What passed there?

Edwards. To the best of my knowledge, I took hold of the knocker of the door; and knocked at the door, and the gentleman came out and was set down there: and he gave me a shilling, and away I went with my chair.

Att. Gen. When you set him down at the Standard-tavern, pray, what did he say?

Edwards. He gave me a shilling, and bid me go about my business; and so we went away.

Att. Gen. Was you there when you heard them call chairs back?

Edwards. No, we went away as soon as we had set him down at the Standard-tavern.

Att. Gen. Did you observe which way they went after you set him down?

Edwards. No, indeed, I did not; I never minded which way they went, after we set him down.

Att. Gen. Which way did you go?

Edwards. We went away down towards Charing-cross.

Att. Gen. Did you see any other chairs in the square when you went down?

Edwards. Yes; there were other chairs at the other end of the square.

Att. Gen. Did you see any gentlemen as you came down, walking towards the Standard-tavern, upon the paved-stones.

Edwards. No, indeed, my lords, not that I remember; but I did see the other three chairs as I passed by Green-street end:

were in them, or what was become of them that were in them, that I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. What did they say to you any of them at that time?

Edwards. They asked us if we were going away, and we told them yes; we were discharged.

Att. Gen. But pray, did you not meet any of the other gentlemen upon the paved stones?

Edwards. No, indeed, I did not see, to the best of my remembrance, any other gentleman upon the paved stones.

Att. Gen. What did the other chairmen say to you?

Edwards. They asked if we were coming away? And we left them behind us.

L. H. S. Has my lord Mohun any questions to ask him?—L. Mohun. No, I have not.

L. H. S. Mr. Attorney, who is your next witness?

Att. Gen. Jackson, who was the chairman that carried captain James. (He was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Pray, will you acquaint my lords who you carried away from Locket's to Leicester fields?

Jackson. Captain James: There were six chairs in all: I do not know who went in the other chairs, but in the three chairs that went together when we went, there was captain Dockwra, captain French, and captain James.

Att. Gen. And where did you set him down?

Jackson. At the Standard tavern, in the square in Leicester fields.

Att. Gen. What became of him after you set him down?

Jackson. We knocked twice at the tavern door, and then he gave us a shilling, and we went away presently, and went down on the left hand upon the paved stones, towards Green street end.

Att. Gen. Did you meet any persons coming up upon the paved stones?

Jackson. Yes, my lord, I did.

Att. Gen. Can you tell who those persons were?—Jackson. Indeed, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. How many were they in number?

Jackson. They were two or three; but it was so dark, that I cannot tell how many they were.

Att. Gen. Which way were they walking?

Jackson. They were going up towards the middle street.

Att. Gen. How far was that from the Standard tavern?

Jackson. It might be about sixty yards from the Standard tavern.

Att. Gen. You say there were three chairs standing at the end of Green street when you came by?

Jackson. Yes, there were so.

Att. Gen. Had you no discourse with them?

Jackson. No, indeed, I had not.

Att. Gen. Did you not ask them, why they stayed there?

Jackson. No, indeed, I did not; we passed by and went home.

Att. Gen. You know my lord Mohun, don't you?—Jackson. Yes, I do, very well.

Att. Gen. Was not my lord Mohun in that company?

Jackson. He was, when the six chairs were called to Locket's; but I did not hear any discourse, that I can remember, that passed among them, nor do I know, or did hear, what became of my lord Mohun afterwards.

Att. Gen. Were those the other three chairs that went away from Locket's first, that you saw at Green street end?

Jackson. Indeed, my lords, I believe so: I cannot swear that they were those three chairs; when we had set down captain James, we did not look back any way at all, but went away home, it being so late and so dark.

L. H. S. My lord Mohun, will you ask this witness any questions?

L. Mohun. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, we shall call William Salmon, who was the surgeon that did search the wound by the coroner's command, when he took the inquisition upon the view of the body. (Who was sworn.)

Att. Gen. Pray, did you view the body of Mr. Coote after he was dead?

Salmon. Yes, I did view his body by the command of the coroner at the watch house, where it lay in St. Martin's lane.

Att. Gen. Pray then, will you acquaint my lords what wounds you found upon the body?

Salmon. There was one upon the left part of the breast, near the collar bone; which, upon probing, I found to be half an inch in breadth, and four or five inches deep downward; the other was a wound that was in his left side, just under the short ribs, and that was upward; and upon probing of it, I found it was about the breadth of an inch at the orifice, and about the depth of five or six inches, and pierced through the diaphragma.

Att. Gen. Pray, did you observe any difference in the wounds, or in the orifice of them?

Salmon. That below was a large wound, larger than the other.

Att. Gen. Were the wounds, do you think, given with two swords, or with one and the same sword?—Salmon. Indeed, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Did you look upon either, and which of them, to be mortal?

Salmon. I looked upon both to be mortal.

L. H. S. If you have done with him, Mr. Attorney, will my lord Mohun ask him any questions?

L. Mohun. No, I shall ask him no questions, for I think I need not; I was never proved to be in the company, in the place where the fighting was.

Att. Gen. We have done with calling of witnesses, till we hear what my lord Mohun says to it.

L. H. S. My lord Mohun, this is the time (the king's evidence being finished) for you to call your witnesses, and make your defence.

L. Mohun. My lords, I shall not call many witnesses, for I think there is nothing that fixes any thing of guilt, as to caps. Coote's death, as to me; but I shall call one witness that was here (as I understand) yesterday, but not examined, and that is a person that saw me afterwards, and knows that I had a wound in my finger laid open, and that wound was received at Locket's, by endeavouring to part them, when they were quarrelling there at that time. (The witness stood up.)

L. H. S. Though you are not upon your oath, yet you are as much obliged, in justice and conscience, to speak the exact truth, as if you was upon your oath; therefore have a care what testimony you give.

Witness. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. What is the question you would have this witness asked?

L. Mohun. What he knows of my being wounded about this time? and what I declared concerning that wound, how I received it?

L. H. S. I will not refuse to ask the question, but I must acquaint your lordship that it signifies nothing in point of evidence at law, what you yourself did declare after the fact was over. It is material what you did to prevent this mischief before it happened, but not what you said or declared after the thing was done. You hear my lord's question, what say you to it?

Witness. I was at my lord Mohun's several days after this business happened, at the lodging where he lay, and where I saw him: he had a hurt in his hand, and it was laid open, it was in the finger; and that, he said, was all he got by endeavouring to part people from fighting.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, when was this?

Witness. It was several days after the death of Mr. Coote.

L. H. S. I told your lordship before, that in point of law such evidence would signify nothing; because your declaring any matter, after the thing was done, in relation to the fact, could not be admitted as legal evidence; if any of my lords be of another opinion, I suppose they will declare it.

L. Mohun. My lords, I submit it to your lordships; I only desire he may be asked, whether he saw my hand or no? and how it was?

Witness. I saw my lord's finger, and it had been laid open some time before; and he said, he had received that wound by endeavouring to part capt. French and capt. Coote: that is all I know of the matter.

Att. Gen. But, pray, when was that that he declared so? How long after the death of Mr. Coote?

Witness. It was several days after that.

L. H. S. You hear, in point of law, that can be no evidence at all: if you have no other witnesses to call, your lordship would do well to sum up your evidence, and make what observations you think fit upon the evidence which has been given for the king.

L. Mohun. My lords, I hope I shall make my defence against this accusation, with all the modesty and submission to your lordships that becomes me. I am very much ashamed to be brought before your lordships upon any such account as this again, after having been once before your lordships upon such an account before. I may very well say, I am not guilty at all of having any hand in Mr. Coote's death; and I can assure your lordships, I will avoid all occasions of giving you any trouble of this nature for the future: I do not doubt but to acquit myself of all guilt, in relation to this matter; and, indeed, with submission to your lordships, there has been no evidence given, relating to me, that does infer any guilt upon me, to prove that I was at the place where the fact was done; therefore I shall only make some few little remarks upon what has been said, and leave it all to your lordships' consideration.

The king's counsel first have called the drawer of the house, and he has satisfied, that I did so far endeavour to part them, that I threatened to send for the guards and secure them, if they would not go home; and when they went into the chairs, I went into my chair, on purpose to follow them down to Westminster, whither I would have had them gone. The prick that I got in my finger, of itself speaks, that I endeavoured to part them, and so the drawer he has told you; I am sure it was the occasion of a great deal of pain to me, it being forced to be afterwards laid open. The chairman that carried Mr. Coote swears, that I, at the door of the tavern in St. Martin's-lane, did make them stand, and when I came up to them, I begged, as for an alms, that they would go home; and I asked Coote whither he was going? which proves that I was not conscious of any design of going to fight at that time. Your lordships are likewise told, that when he came to Green-street end, I was set down upon the paved stones. I was so, indeed, and I went up about five or six yards, but that is all that is proved; but I did take the quite contrary way to the place where Mr. Coote was wounded. Then there was another chairman, one Applegate, and truly what use they make of him, I cannot imagine, as an evidence against me; for he says, I was very earnest in St. Martin's-lane to hinder any quarrel, and indeed at the tavern door, at Locket's, I was so at first; and when we came to St. Martin's-lane end, he says, that I ordered them to make them stop, and ask Coote whither he was going? And he saying he was going to Leicester-fields, I endeavoured all I could to persuade him to the contrary, and did entreat him that he would go no farther, but go down to Westminster to his lodging, or lodge with me; but Mr. Coote would not give me time, at that time, the other chairs coming by, to give him further reasons, but would go away: and then it is objected, that I should say, that if they would go, I would go and see: that was, my lords, I would go on till I could have a further opportunity to prevent any fighting among them: and the witness Ketto says, my lord of Warwick did bid the chair to follow the other chair in which captain Coote was. My design was for Westminster, to go to my lodgings; and when we came to the end of the square, if I did go up the white stones, it was directly the contrary way to the place where it is proved this fact happened. For the next witness, Edwards, he says he saw nobody walking upon the paved stones; and truly, I did go the direct way into Newport-street: and for my not appearing before, it was for avoiding commitment; and I must submit the whole matter to your lordships, how far any guilt is fixed upon me, not being proved to be in the field at the time when they fought, or seen to be in the company when they came up and found Mr. Coote wounded, and dying, or dead. It is a plain case I could have no hand at all in his death; and so I think I need give no further trouble to your lordships, for I believe your lordships cannot but be satisfied, that as I have pleaded, I am not guilty of killing this gentleman: nay, it is impossible that I should go into the field to be a second, when my own right hand was wounded, for I was not able to hold my sword in my sword hand, because of that wound. I submit the matter entirely to your lordships, from whom I am sure to meet with every thing that will be suitable to honour and justice.

L. H. S. The king's counsel are now to sum up the evidence for the king.

Mr. Solicitor General (sir John Hawles,) began to sum up the evidence for the king, but his voice was so low, and the noise in the Hall was so great, that he could not be heard; and therefore the Lord High Steward moved the house that he might stand by the prisoner at the bar, which was something nearer than the place where the king's counsel stood, as was done the day before; and it was ordered accordingly.

L. H. S. Mr. Solicitor, pray raise your voice as much as you can, that all my noble lords may hear you.

[Several of the lords did move, That one that had a better voice might sum it up, and particularly Mr. Cowper; but it being usually the part of the Solicitor General, and he only having prepared himself, he was ordered to go on; but for the better hearing of him, several of the lords towards the upper end of the house, removed from their seats down, as they did the day before, to sit upon the wool-packs.]

Mr. Gen. My lords, I am of counsel for the king against this noble lord, my lord Mohun, the prisoner at the bar, who has been upon his oath this day, and it comes to my turn to sum up the evidence that has been given against him: but I must shortly sum up the chief of the evidence that has been given, and make a few reflections thereupon, particularly upon my lord Mohun. The first witness was the drawer of the house, at the Greyhound in the Strand, who gives you an account, who were at his master's house the 29th of October last, and particularly, that my lord Mohun was there in the same company wherein this gentleman was that was unfortunately killed, and that he continued in that company till very late that night, or rather, very early the next morning; when, after the reckoning was paid, they came all down to the bar and called for coaches; and he tells you, that he was sent out, and he tells you what he was sent for, he was sent for coaches, and so cannot give any account what passed while he was gone; but when upon calling for coaches, none could be had, there was order for chairs to be called, and chairs were brought to the door; and when he came in again he heard the clashing of swords, and there were three on the one side of the bar, and three of them on the other: indeed he does say, he did not see when the swords were drawn; but at that time they were putting up their swords, my lord Mohun was in the company; upon which I would observe to your lordships that there had been some fighting; for the witness says, upon my lord's question, that my lord called for a napkin to put his hand in, for his finger was cut; and he said, this is all that I have got by endeavouring to part them; so that it shews there was a quarrel, and my lord Mohun was in it. When the chairs were brought to the door, they went into them; there went Mr. Coote into one, into the second my lord of Warwick, and into the third my lord Mohun; so that still my lord Mohun was in the company, and they went away together; and though it is pretended by my lord, that he did all he could to prevent the quarrel, yet he gave directions to the chairmen that carried him to follow the other chairs, and your lordships perceive what the business was that they went about; and the other three chairs followed after presently, so that they all went away together; nay, my lord himself does not disown his being in the company till they came into Leicester-fields. Next I would observe what fell from Browne, who carried the very gentleman that was killed, Mr. Coote, that my lord Mohun was in one of the three first chairs, and that they all went together, till that my lord Mohun called out to stop, upon the turning up into St. Martin's-lane; and though they stopped in St. Martin's-lane, and my lord Mohun did intend them to let it alone at that time, yet it was only to let it alone till the morning; and when the other three chairs passed by on the other side of the way, and Coote would have them go on, my lord Mohun said, if they would go on, he would go with them and see it. Applegate, the chairman, that carried my lord Mohun, says the same: and so it is plain my lord Mohun did go on with an intention to make one in the affray; for Applegate says, that when my lord Mohun could not prevail upon his servants, and when Coote went away, after the other three chairs were passed by, my lord Mohūn said, if you do go, I must go and see it ; and they did go all together : and the chairman says, he set my lord Mohun down at the end of Green-street, at the lower end of the fields, where the other two chairs set down captain Cooté and my lord of Warwick, and that they all three walked up together towards the Standard tavern ; still all this proves my lord did go there, and that he himself did say he would go and see it : and it is plain that my lord Mohun did go as far as Leicester-fields, and it is only his declaration concerning himself, without any proof, that he went away and did not go into the fields, to the place where the fact was done ; and we think it is sufficient proof that he was one of them that were concerned, because we do prove, that he was all along in the company till the very time that they came into the place where the thing was done. Then there is the chairman that carried Mr. James, and he tells your lordships, that the three first chairs that went up St. Martin's-lane went to the Standard tavern, and there knocked at the door, and paid the chairmen, and went out of their chair ; and so says the other chairmen that carried capt. Dockwra and capt. French ; and they say also, that when they came down the paved stones again, they heard chairs called for, but they did not interpose at all in the matter ; but the other two chairs it seems did, for they went up to the upper end of the square, where there were two persons holding up Mr. Cooté, and after they put the chair over the rails, in order to have him carried away in a chair, but they could not get him into the chair. I would likewise observe from the evidence of the surgeon, who gives you an account of what nature the wounds were ; one was in the breast, near the collar-bone, on the left-side ; the other was under the short ribs, on the left side too, which could not be given him by the person that he was fighting with, he being a right-hand man, as was proved by his servant. My lord Mohun has called but one witness, which is only about a little circumstance of his being wounded in the hand, and having the wound laid open, but that was two days after the fact was done ; my lord Mohun could not but know that the matters he was to answer, related to a time before. It must be agreed to me, that they all three, my lord of Warwick, my lord Mohun and Mr. Cooté, went all away together, that they were carried to Leicester-fields, that they were set down together, and walked up together upon the stone pavement, when the others were gone towards the upper end of the fields ; so that in all probability, they all went together into the place where the fight was, and were all concerned ; and if so my lord Mohun must be equally guilty with the rest, my lord Mohun knowing what business it was they were going about. It must be left to your lordships, whether he shall not be presumed to be there when the fact was done, especially his saying when he could not prevail in St. Martin's-lane, to put the matter off till another time, that if they did go on, he would go and see it ; so that putting these two circumstances together, his going in one of the chairs with my lord Warwick and Cooté, and what he said after when the chairs stopt in St. Martin's lane, we think are circumstances to induce your lordships to believe, that he was present at the time of the fact committed, or very near the place ; and if that be so, how far he is guilty must be submitted to your lordships' consideration ; and this is all that I shall trouble your lordships with without repeating the particular evidence, which your lordships I am sure very well remember.

L. Mohun. My lords, I desire I may say one word in answer to what Mr. Solicitor has observed. I think your lordships have had no evidence given you where Mr. Cooté was killed ; but only the chairman that was desired to bring over his chair within the rails, says, it was towards Panton-street, which is quite contrary to the place where I was set down, at Green-street end ; I must then be at a very great distance from the place where the fact was done.

L. H. S. If all have done on both sides, then your lordships have nothing left but to consider of the evidence which has been given, which, I suppose, you will do among yourselves.

Lords. Ay, adjourn, adjourn.

L. H. S. Is it your pleasure, my lords, to adjourn into the House of Lords?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. This House is adjourned into the House of Lords.

[And the Lords went back in the same order to the House of Lords, and there they staid for about two hours time, debating the matter among themselves, and afterwards returned again into the court in Westminster-hall, and were seated all in their places, as they were before, and the Lord High Steward was seated in the chair before the throne.]

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make Proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes, my lord high steward of England, his grace, does straitly charge and command all manner of persons here present to be uncovered, and keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships' pleasure to go on now to give your judgment ?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. Then I must pray your lordships to give me time to write down your opinions distinctly, that I may be able to acquaint you with certainty of the numbers.

Lords. Ay, ay.

[Then the Lord High Steward stood up, and put the question to every lord, beginning with the youngest baron, to know what his judgment was ; and the lord to whom he called, stood up in his place uncovered, and laying his right hand upon his breast, delivered his judgment in the manner following.]

L. H. S. My lord Beruard, Is Charles lord

Mohun guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

L. Bernard. Not guilty, upon my honour.

[The same question was asked severally of all the Lords, who in the same form delivered the same opinion.]

[Then the Lord High Steward seated himself again in the chair, to take the number of the peers who had given their judgment.]

L. H. S. My lords, 87 of your lordships are present, and you all are unanimously of opinion, That my lord Mohun is not guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted.

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. Let the prisoner be called to the bar.

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes, my Lord High Steward of England, his grace, does straitly charge and command all manner of persons here present to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes, chief governor of the Tower of London, bring forth the body of your prisoner Charles lord Mohun, whom you have committed to you, in order to be brought hither this day, upon pain and peril will fall thereon.

Then he was brought forth to the bar, and the Lord High Steward addressed himself to him in this manner:

L. H. S. My lord Mohun, you have been indicted for the murder of Mr. Richard Coote, upon which indictment your lordship has been arraigned, and upon your arraignment has pleaded not guilty, and for your trial you have put yourself upon your peers, my lords here present; and they have heard the evidence, and have considered of it, and delivered their judgment upon the whole matter; and I am to acquaint your lordship, they are all unanimously of opinion, that your lordship is not guilty of the felony and murder whereof you stand indicted; and therefore your lordship is discharged from your imprisonment, paying your fees.

Then the lord Mohun made his reverence to the Lords, and expressed himself thus:

Lord Mohun. My lords, I do not know which way to express my great thankfulness and acknowledgment of your lordships' great honour and justice to me; but I crave leave to assure your lordships, that I will endeavour to make it the business of the future part of my life, so to behave myself in my conversation in the world, as to avoid all things that may bring me under any such circumstances, as may expose me to the giving your lordships any trouble of this nature for the future.* [And then making his reverences to the lords, he went away from the bar.]

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes, All manner of persons here present, are commanded to keep silence, by my Lord High Steward of England, his grace, upon pain of imprisonment.

L. H. S. My lords, the trial being at an end, there is nothing remains to be done here, but the determining the commission.

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. Sir Samuel Astry, let proclamation be made in order to the dissolving the commission of High Stewardship.

Cl. of the Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serj. at Arms. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes, My Lord High Steward of England, his grace, does straitly charge and command all manner of persons here present, and that have here attended, to depart hence in the peace of God, and of our sovereign lord the king; for his grace, the Lord High Steward of England, intends now to dissolve his commission.

And then the White Staff being delivered to his grace, the Lord High Steward, he stood up, and holding it in both his hands, broke it in two; and then leaving the chair, came down to the Wool-pack, and said, Is it your lordships' pleasure to adjourn to the House of Lords?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. This House is adjourned to the House of Lords.

And so they went back in the same order that they came into the court, and all the assembly broke up.

404. A brief Account of the Trial of CHARLES DUNCOMBE, ESQ. before the Lord Chief Justice Holt, at the King's Bench Bar in Westminster-hall, upon an Information for false indorsing of Exchequer Bills, and paying them into the Exchequer, as if they had been first paid into the Excise Office upon that Branch of the Revenue: 11 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1699.* [Now first printed from a MS. in the Possession of the Earl of Radnor, who has obligingly imparted it for this Collection, A. D. 1812.]

June 17, 1699.

THE Court waited a long time for D'Acosta the Jew's evidence, upon which my Lord Chief Justice reproved the king's counsel, and asked them if they had ordered it so on purpose; to which Mr. Attorney replied, that D'Acosta promised to be here. One of the defendant's counsel said it was the Jews' Sabbath; that the Jews would not fight on the Sabbath, but rather be cut in pieces, and that the king's counsel might have dispensed with the attendance of the defendant's counsel. Mr. Attorney answered, that D'Acosta promised to be there, and made no objection as to the Sabbath, but he supposed the defendant's counsel had put him in mind of it.

Mr. D'Acosta being come, the Jury was sworn as follows: Warwick Lake, esq.; Leonard Hammond, esq.; Richard Bever, esq.; Thomas Blackmore, William Fenn, Francis Heath, Francis Peters, Michael Shepherd, Richard Poston, Matthew Fern, Robert Hedin, James Cole.

The Jury being sworn, Mr. Attorney exhibited the Information, which being read,

Mr. Montague, counsel for the king, opened it to the effect following:

The Record now read, is an Information brought by Mr. Attorney against Charles Duncombe, esq. for a high misdemeanor in the execution of his office as cashier of the excise. It shews that the lords of the exchequer had directed bills to be issued out, and that Mr. Duncombe being cashier of the excise had received 20,000*l.* and more of the king's money upon that branch of the revenue, and according to his duty ought to have paid it in specie for his majesty's use as the commissioners directed. On the 5th day of May, the commissioners of the excise ordered him to pay 10,000*l.*; notwithstanding which, he, intending to defraud the king and to lessen the credit of the exche-

* "Another sort of offenders were this session animadverted upon by the commons, but had the good fortune to escape with impunity. The exchequer bills were at this time of very great use in the nation, by supplying the scarcity of money, during the re-coining of the silver species. Now because there was an interest of 7*l.* 12*s.* per ann. allowed upon the second issuing of these bills out of the exchequer, after they had been paid in, on any of the king's taxes, whereas at their first issuing out of the exchequer they bore no interest, this encouraged several of the king's officers, both in the exchequer, the customs, and the excise, to contrive together to get great sums of money by false indorsements on these exchequer bills, before they had circulated about, and been brought into any branch of the king's revenue. The most considerable persons, who had carried on this unwarrantable practice, were Mr. Charles Duncombe, receiver-general of the excise; Mr. John Knight, treasurer of the customs; Mr. Bartholomew Burton, who had a place in the excise-office; and Mr. Reginald Marriott, one of the deputy tellers of the exchequer; which last, to procure his pardon, compounded to accuse the rest. Upon a full proof of the matter, Duncombe and Knight, who were members of the house of commons, were first expelled the house, and committed prisoners to the Tower; Burton sent to Newgate, and bills ordered to be brought in to punish them. The bill against Mr. Duncombe, whereby a fine of near half his estate, which was computed at 400,000*l.* was set upon him, quickly passed the house of commons, notwithstanding the opposition that was made to it, particularly by sir Thomas Trevor the attorney-general. But, being sent up to the house of lords, and the house being equally divided, the duke of Leeds gave his casting vote for rejecting the bill. But, Mr. Duncombe being set at liberty by the order of the house of lords, without the consent of the commons, the latter resented it to that degree, that they caused him to be remanded to the Tower of London, where he continued till the end of the session. The bills against Knight and Burton had the same fate; and so all the noise this sort of forgery had made, in town and country, was hushed on a sudden, and no more heard of." Tindal.

quer bills, did on the 8th of May pay in 7,860*l.* principal money in exchequer bills, falsely indorsed, for money that he ought to have paid into the exchequer in specie, he knowing that those bills had never passed the revenue of the excise.

Mr. Attorney (sir Thomas Trevor) argued next to the effect following, viz. That Mr. Duncombe had received into his hands as cashier of the excise the sum of 20,000*l.* and more of the king's money, which had been paid in for the revenue of the excise in old money, sent afterwards to the Tower to be re-coined, and came back again in milled money to Mr. Duncombe the cashier. This money being in his hands, he was to have paid in according to the direction of the commissioners of excise. They ordered 20,000*l.* to be paid for several uses, and part of it being 10,000*l.* and more to be paid into the exchequer by their order of the 5th of May for that purpose. But Mr. Duncombe intending to make an unlawful gain to himself, and to prejudice the king, did not pay in milled money according to their order, but purchased to the value of 7,860*l.* in exchequer bills upon a great discount for it; at that time exchequer bills issued for such and such sums were discounted at 5*l.* per cent. so that he saved 5 per cent.; this came to 400*l.* more or less, that he gained by this bargain. But those exchequer bills he could not pay into the exchequer without being indorsed, to shew that those bills had been really paid into the excise upon that branch of the revenue; for, by the act of parliament, they were to be paid into the exchequer as money that had formerly been paid on the revenue, and the persons were to write their names upon them as they paid them; whereupon Mr. Duncombe prevails with Mr. D'Acosta to set his own name and other feigned names, some of them of persons not in being, others the names of persons that were not privy to it; and Mr. Duncombe knowing that they were falsely indorsed, paid them into the exchequer in part of 10,000*l.*, though he knew they were not paid in to the excise. It was a misdemeanor in his office and a deceit to the king, for him who was entrusted to pay the king's money to buy exchequer bills by which he gains so much per cent. and pays them into the exchequer at so much damage and loss to the king: this we shall prove by our witnesses.

Mr. Serjeant Darnel spoke next, and insisting a little upon the information, called for the king's evidence.

The first was Mr. Clayton, with the order of the lords of the treasury.

Mr. Darnel. Mr. Clayton, give an account of what you know of exchequer bills issued by the lords of the treasury.

Mr. Clayton. This is the order of the lords of the treasury, which was read as follows:

"April 26, 1697, Stephen Cox, Charles Montague, John Smith, Thomas Littleton.
"To sir Robert Howard, auditor of the "exchequer."

"Whereas by act of parliament for granting

"an Aid to his majesty by a land tax, payable "for one year, we are authorised to issue bills
"of the exchequer not exceeding 1,500,000*l.*,
"and to issue the same in such proportion as we "shall think fit. And whereas, by an act last "parliament, and by the king's proclamation,
"when the receivers of the revenue pay those
"bills into the revenue, they are to have tallies "struck, and their bills are to be cancelled, as "more fully therein appears. These are in "pursuance of the authority granted unto us
"by the said act, &c. for issuing, receiving "back, and cancelling the said bills, and fol"lowing the orders to be observed, to require
"you if you cause indented bills to be issued "for such sum or sums, as any three of us or
"the lord high treasurer for the time being
"shall direct, and that you see the same num"bered and marked with the portcullis, al"lowing interest of 5 per cent. and that you
"keep an exact and true account of the same,
"and deliver the same to the tellers of the ex"chequer, taking their receipts and keeping "an exact account in the nature of a controul,
"and charge the tellers with the money so by
"you delivered, and keep a true account of all "bills they receive from you; and that the "said tellers be required to observe these par"ticular directions, and such further rules as "we shall find necessary; and that we may "have the better information how the same are "complied with, you are every Friday to ex"amine the accounts of the tellers distinctly,
"and to keep their receipts and cancelled bills
"separate from the other accounts in the ex"chequer, and this shall be your warrant."

Serj. Darnel. We shall next prove the commission of the excise to appoint Mr. Duncombe their cashier. Show the commission.

L. C. J. How do you prove it to be a true commission?

Mr. Attorney. It is a true copy examined in the Six Clerks office.

Then the Commission was read.

Sir Tho. Powis, one of the defendant's counsel. It were proper before you come to make this objection, that you should lay it in the information, that the commissioners caused money bills to be issued out, to be paid into the exchequer; they are first to prove that, but they have not yet proved it, for this is only a general instruction that they should issue bills when commanded.

Then an Order of the Treasury was read, dated 27th April, 1697, signed, Fox, Smith, Littleton; directed to sir Robert Howard, importing, "That for enlarging the capital stock of the Bank of England, there should be issued "out to the lord Ranelagh upon an unsatis"fied order in his name, 322,648*l.* for payment
"of his majesty's forces, and contingent "charges to be applied, to pay money due for "quartering of soldiers betwixt 1694 and
"1696, 200,000*l.*; to clear quarters and sub"sistence in England, 77,648*l.* for the service

"in Flanders 36,400*l.*; and that they should take care that this should be duly paid, and charge themselves with it."

Mr. Attorney. Call Mr. Clayton. Mr. Clayton: were the bills issued according to this order?—Clayton. Yes.

Sir Tho. Powis. Upon what account were they issued?

Clayton. On the 1,500,000*l.* act; for we did not make out any bills upon the second act till three months after.

Sir Tho. Powis. If this be sufficient proof, it is strange; it recites the Capitation act, and a 2d act for deficiencies, and making good the stock of the Bank. The order recites directions for exchequer bills to pass in all payments, except the 3*s.* Aid, so that there are no exchequer bills made according to the act; for their order is subsequent to both. The first orders exchequer bills to go in all payments, so after both are passed, here are exchequer bills that ought to be made to pass in all payments, and not to pass in all payments, so that there is no exchequer bill agreeable to the intention of the 2d act.

L. C. J. The first hath an exception. The second says, all exchequer bills shall pass in all payments whatsoever. The first and second having both passed, they ought to have made their bills payable accordingly.

Mr. Attorney. Their order is only upon the issue of the first act, that the exchequer bills shall be current in all payments but the three shillings aid.

Sir Barth. Shower. It is before any proclamation, p. 384. "Be it further enacted, that exchequer bills be taken not only by receivers, but by all collectors of the Land tax and supply," &c. Observe this order of theirs recites both acts, therefore they ought to have framed their exchequer bills to be current in all payments, and not with an exception.

L. C. J. The exchequer bills are made according to one. Will you make two sorts? First, the one act says, they shall pass in all payments except the 3*s.* aid, and the other act says, exchequer bills shall be current in all payments whatever; they have authority in one act to make exchequer bills current in all payments except the 3*s.* aid, and in another to make them current in all payments whatsoever.

Mr. Attorney. It is another act that makes them current in all payments: so that you are mistaken, sir Bartholomew.

Sir Barth. Shower. It is to make exchequer bills general when there is a clause in one act that they shall be current in all payments except the 3*s.* aid, and then by another act in the same session they are made current in all payments; then, what authority had they to make exchequer bills with an exception, when the act authorizes them to make them payable in general.

Serj. Darnel. If the fact were so as sir Bartholomew alleges, it will not conclude that there can be no exception.

Mr. Munday. It appears by the evidence produced that they are to make bills according to their order.

Mr. Attorney. Though there be a general clause in the act, yet there is another proviso about contracts for exchange.

L. C. J. At this rate, gentlemen, there is not one exchequer bill in England good; you will destroy all exchequer bills. Go on with your evidence.

Mr. Attorney. Call Noel. Mr. Noel, did you know Mr. Duncombe when he was cashier of the excise?—Noel. Yes.

Mr. Attorney. Call Rumney. Mr. Rumney, What do you know of Mr. Duncombe's receiving milled money?

Rumney. On the 4th and 5th May, 1697, he received 20,135*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* received from old money?

Mr. Attorney. How did he receive it?

Rumney. He received it from Mr. Fouquier, accountant to the excise.

Mr. Attorney. How do you know he received it?

Rumney. I went to Mr. Duncombe's office; I helped to carry it, part on one day and part on another.

Mr. Attorney. What do you know of money paid to Mr. Duncombe, Mr. Fouquier?

Fouquier. On the 27th February, 1696, he had 357 ounces 8 dwts. hammered money; On the 5th of March, 358 ounces hammered money repaid to his clerk: On the 4th of May, ——— produce of the money so brought in on the 27th February ———; on the 3d day of March, then there was paid him on the 4th and 5th

One of the Defendant's Counsel said, You speak by your book. Did you see it carried in?

Fouquier. I always received it and paid it thus to his clerk.

Mr. Attorney. Mr. Blessington, produce the order of the commissioners for the payment of the money into the exchequer.

Blessington. There is the order of the Commissioners to pay the money into the exchequer.

Then it was read, dated May 5th, 1697.

Mr. Attorney. Notwithstanding this order, he bought those exchequer bills, caused them to be indorsed, and paid them into the exchequer in part of the 10,000*l.* Mr. D'Acosta, give an account to my lord and the jury what number of exchequer bills you sold to Mr. Duncombe, for what, and when?

D'Acosta. I did, upon the desire of the lords of the treasury, furnish bills for his majesty's service in Flanders the 19th March 1697; I was to be repaid in exchequer bills when they came out. The exchequer bills were accordingly delivered to me on the 9th of May 1697, and wanting money at that time, I contracted with Mr. Duncombe to sell him 88 exchequer bills, amounting, with interest, to the sum of 7,894*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* deducting 5 per cent. which came to 394*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* The remainder Mr. Duncombe paid me on the 12th of May.

Mr. Attorney. Who did you deliver them to, and from whom did you receive them?

D'Acosta. I delivered them to alderman Duncombe. I received them from the lords of the treasury, on the 4th of May 1697. I brought them to him myself; he received them, and looked upon them; he told me I should set my hand to them, and I did so to several.

Mr. Attorney. Why did you set your hand to them?

D'Acosta. I thought it necessary for the currency of those bills, they being but come about a week before; but considering with myself at the same time, that it might be a reflection upon me to discount so many bills, I told Mr. Duncombe so then; he bid me put my own hand, or the name of any other person to them; so I put my own name to part of them, and to the rest, I set other names.

Mr. Attorney. What names did you set?

D'Acosta. Any names I could think on; the names of persons that dealt with me or others.

Mr. Attorney. The discount at 5 per cent. you say amounted to 394l. 4s. 6d.; did you set your hand to those bills, when Mr. Duncombe was by?—D'Acosta. Yes.

Mr. Attorney. How came it you did not write this indorsement?

D'Acosta. He desired me to do nothing, but to set my hand, without filling up any thing.

Mr. Attorney. Did you write your name upon all of them?

D'Acosta. I wrote my name upon several of them.

Mr. Attorney. Whose names did you write upon the rest?

D'Acosta. I do not remember any other names but that of my partner, and some others that dealt with me.

Mr. Attorney. Look upon those bills; you know the numbers of those bills you sold.

D'Acosta looked upon some of the bills and said, I think this is my hand; this is the name of John Romberg, one that I dealt with.

Mr. Attorney. Did you write that indorsement?

D'Acosta. No, I wrote nothing but the name upon it; there was a blank, I know not who wrote the rest.

Mr. Attorney. When did you pay those exchequer bills?

D'Acosta. On the 9th of May, 1697.

Mr. Attorney. Did you write no indorsement upon them?

D'Acosta. No, only my hand and a blank.

Mr. Attorney. Did you set down no day?

D'Acosta. No.

Mr. Attorney. Did not you scruple the putting your name to them at first?

D'Acosta. No, I made no scruple, because he told me there should be a name to them; but considering at last that it was a large parcel of bills, and that it would be a reflection upon me to discount so many bills, I told him of it, and he bid me write my name.

Mr. Attorney. Did he desire you to write nothing else?

D'Acosta. No, he desired nothing of filling up, or any day; I only set my own and some other names to them; for this thing that is wrote over the names, I know nothing of it; some other body hath writ it.

Mr. Attorney. Did he give you no directions what names to write?

D'Acosta. He gave me no directions, but said any name.

Mr. Attorney. What was the reason you set down feigned persons, and feigned names?

Sir T. Powis. You wrote your own name to many of the bills; tell the reason why you did not write it upon all?

D'Acosta. Because I was afraid it might disoblige the lords of the treasury, to discount so many, and wrong my own credit; I moved it so to Mr. Duncombe, and he bid me set my name.

Mr. Attorney. Was there any advantage at that time by setting names to the bills; did you discourse of any advantage by it; or do you know of any contrivance in the matter? was it for your own sake or Mr. Duncombe's that you wrote your name?

D'Acosta. Mr. Duncombe desired me to set my name to them; I knew of no advantage by it; the bills that I had were the first that were issued, and the first that I had, I carried to Mr. Duncombe. Those bills were delivered to me on the 4th of May, and betwixt that time and the 12th that I signed them, I could not tell the manner of them. Mr. Duncombe desired me to set my name to them, and I thought it was necessary to do so, and accordingly put my name in blank to them.

Sir T. Powis. When you put your own name upon so many, you were unwilling, it seems, to put your name to any more; was it for your own sake, or Mr. Duncombe's, that you scrupled it?

D'Acosta. It was for my own sake.

Sir T. Powis. Did he direct any body else's name to be set to the bills?

D'Acosta. I brought those bills, as I have said, blank; I delivered them to him; he told me I must set my name to them; I signed several of them, and then considered the reflection it would be upon me, if I signed so many of them, as I said before, and moved it so to him, and he bid me set my name.

Mr. Northey. Did you take it to be of any import, when you set your name to them?

D'Acosta. I thought it to be no more but a kind of receipt, as the indorsing of bills is betwixt merchant and merchant.

Sir B. Shower. You say you discounted them to him at 5 per cent.; Was that less or more than the lords of the treasury allowed you?

D'Acosta. What the lords of the treasury allowed me was upon another point. I gave them my bills to be paid in Flanders; so that whatever discount there was on the other side of the seas, was upon the account of exchange; for beyond sea, we give so many guilders per sterling.

Sir B. Shower. Had you not a greater discount from the treasury upon that exchanging, than upon common exchanging; was there nothing of that betwixt you and the lords of the treasury?

D'Acosta. I cannot tell how much I had, for the course of the exchange varies every week or every post.

Mr. Northey. Mr. Duncombe had no occasion to sink the value of those bills; for we say there was more allowed to Mr. D'Acosta over and above the common rate of exchange.

L. C. J. That was upon another account if it was so; but I do not see of what use it will be to you if it was so.

Sir Tho. Powis. We shall apply it by and by. When you remitted the money to Flanders, Mr. D'Acosta, did not you write to your friend to accept the bills so and so, pray how was this money paid, what exchanging had D'Acosta. I have said already the exchanging varies every post, I cannot positively tell, but my bills were paid with honour, and I received the value here in exchequer bills.

Sir Tho. Powis. Did you deal on the same terms when you received the value in exchequer bills as if you had received it in milled money, cannot you tell the difference?

D'Acosta. When I made my bargain on the 19th of March, the bills were worse, because the second act was not then made: when I received them, I was to take them in payment as they were then delivered me there, being none issued out upon the first act; they were discounted sometimes at more, sometimes at less, they were discounted afterwards at 9 and 10 per cent.

Sir Tho. Powis. Would you not have had more allowed than 5 per cent. if you had remitted them in milled money?

D'Acosta. Yes; but how much I had for them I cannot say, for I took them on all hazards; I have known the exchange rise in one year from 27 to 36. Can any merchant say, then, what profit he had on individual bills, when I made use of my money in Hamburg, Italy, &c. and received all sorts of coin.

Sir Tho. Powis. Cannot you remember about March how the exchanging betwixt Flanders and England was?

D'Acosta. If I had known what questions would have been asked me, I could have been provided; but now I do not know.

Sir Tho. Powis. Do not you know how many stivers you had per pound sterling in March, 1698?

D'Acosta. I do not remember.

L. C. J. How much had you per cent. cannot you tell?

D'Acosta. I gave my foreign bills two months before I had the exchequer bills; if I had had the value of the bills when I drew them, I reckon it would have been 12 or 13 per cent. but I had them two months after.

L. C. J. How much per cent. suppose you had received the value in money?

D'Acosta. 12 or 13 per cent. if in money when I delivered my bills, but I was to have the value in exchequer bills when they came out, but did not then think of the second act of parliament, which made them better.

L. C. J. When you came to discourse of those bills with Mr. Duncombe, was it he proposed it to you, or did you propose to sell them to him?

D'Acosta. I proposed it to Mr. Duncombe, telling him I had so many exchequer bills to dispose of, at —

L. C. J. Did you deal with him on the account of the public, or only with Mr. Duncombe?

D'Acosta. I dealt with him as Mr. Duncombe, and not on the account of the public.

L. C. J. Had you any message from Mr. Duncombe to have those bills from you?

D'Acosta. No, I went myself to him, hoping for a better profit.

L. C. J. Did you think at the time that the discounting of the exchequer bills at 5 per cent. would have sunk the exchequer bills?

D'Acosta. No.

Sir Tho. Powis. Were those the first bills delivered out of the exchequer?

D'Acosta. I take it they were the first bills. The lords of the treasury promised me I should have the first payment as soon as they came out.

Sir T. Powis. How long did you keep those bills?

D'Acosta. From the 4th to the 12th of May.

Sir T. Powis. Was there not a discount upon exchequer bills before Mr. Duncombe had yours?

D'Acosta. I think not, but I believe there was about the same discount amongst merchants.

Sir T. Powis. Do you know it was so?

D'Acosta. I do not know it of my own knowledge, I did not see it done; but those that did it told me they did it.

Sir T. Powis. Did you agree with the treasury for other remittances?

D'Acosta. Yes, about 3 months before.

Sir T. Powis. You discounted 5 per cent on the bills, had you more or less for the second?

D'Acosta. I cannot positively tell how much, but I furnished more guilders per £. sterling than before. Those bills after the 2nd act were more secure than before, therefore we had reason to allow more for them.

L. C. J. What discount was there upon the second bills after the second act?

D'Acosta. I have known the discount to be more than 9 per cent. upon the exchanging between man and man.

L. C. J. Did you discount more upon the second bills than upon the first?

D'Acosta. I discounted less.

Sir T. Powis. Was not your contract for those remittances before any bills were issued?

D'Acosta. Yes.

Sir T. Powis. How many of those bills did you deliver to Mr. Duncombe?

D'Acosta. Eighty three.

Sir T. Powis. Were they delivered out after the second act?

D'Acosta. Yes, after the 2nd act and proclamation, but the contract was made before.

Mr. Attorney. Call Mr. Fern. Mr. Fern, what do you know of Mr. Duncombe's paying those bills into the exchequer?

Fern. His man should have paid money into my office, and offered me exchequer bills, but I would not receive them, and so he went to another.

One of the King's Counsel. It was a settled course among them for such and such branches of the revenue to be paid into the respective offices. This money should have been paid into Mr. Fern's office, Mr. Duncombe's messenger offers Mr. Fern so much money, Mr. Fern takes down the sums, but when he came to receive the money it proved to be exchequer bills, upon which Mr. Fern said, 'Those bills were but issued out last week, you cannot have received them in the excise as yet, I cannot take them; if you won't, says he, I will come to you again by and by.'

Fern. Upon the 8th of May, 1697, Mr. Duncombe's man came to me to tell me how much he was to pay that day. I entered it, and he went to the next office where he was to make some other payment; then he came to me again and offered me exchequer bills for 3,222*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* I refused them, because we had issued them out so lately, that I knew they could not have circulated through the revenue so soon. I asked him if they had been received in the excise; he told me he believed not; then I told him I could not take them, and upon that he went away from me.

Mr. Attorney. Do you know the man?

Fern. He employed two men generally. I cannot tell well which of them it was; but it was one he used to employ to tell money.

Mr. Attorney. Did you ever see him before that time?

Fern. Yes, several times; he used to come to me as Mr. Duncombe's man.

Mr. Attorney. Why did he come to you?

Fern. He came to me as clerk to Mr. Cary, one of the tellers; it fell to my lot to receive part of the excise.

Mr. Attorney. Do you know the man when you see him?

Fern. I think it was one Stent or one Runney, but cannot tell which.

Mr. Attorney. Why came it to your lot to receive this money?

Fern. By agreement amongst ourselves, we subdivided the receipt of the king's revenue; I received that part some time before, therefore he came to me.

Mr. Attorney. In part of what sum was it to be paid?—Fern. On the 2-8*ds* excise:

Sir T. Powis. They all the while endeavour to affect Mr. Duncombe with fraud and deceit, that he paid it not into his own office but into another; pray how does any thing this man hath said prove a fraud upon him?

L. C. J. Let them go on with their evidence.

Mr. Attorney. When the servant came, did he not tell you he came to pay it from the excise?

Fern. I entered it in my book upon the 2-8*ds*, and additional excise, but when he told me it would be exchequer bills, I razed it out.

Mr. Attorney. Did he say he would pay it upon the excise and from Mr. Duncombe?

Fern. Yes, and I set it down upon those particular proportions as he directed me in drawing the bills, and he offered exchequer bills in discharge of that money.

Mr. Attorney. What answer did he make to your objection.

Fern. I asked him, if the money was paid into the excise, and he answered he believed not.

Mr. Attorney. When was this?

Fern. It was upon the 8th of May.

Mr. Attorney. What directions had you before the 8th of May about receiving exchequer bills?

Fern. I had no directions but the act.

Sir Tho. Powis. It was only difference of opinion.

L. C. J. He told you on what account he refused the exchequer bills before, because he knew they could not have circulated through the revenue in so little time.

Sir T. Powis. Was Mr. Duncombe receiver of the excise at that time?

Fern. He came from Mr. Duncombe at that time, and I did not know Mr. Duncombe was out.

Mr. Attorney. Call Mr. Peters. Mr. Peters, acquaint my lord and the jury with what you know of this matter?

Peters. On the 12th May 1697, Mr. Duncombe's servant, but which I cannot tell, brought me three parcels of exchequer bills in three papers; I take it to be Runney. They were indorsed Principal and Interest; he told me I must charge them on the particulars of the excise, on additional duty, ——— double excise, ———, Excise for 99 years, ———. Low wines, &c. sweets, duty on coals, ———. Brandy, ———, Salt, ———. I charged more upon the additional duty, ———, upon the excise, ———. Low wines and spirits, ——— two thirds excise, ———, Excise for 99 years, ———. Duty on salt, &c. which came in all to 1,039*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. Attorney. Did you see any names upon the bills?

Peters. I found one with the name "Fraser" upon it, I took them to be all according to the act which obliged us to take them. I delivered them to the clerk to examine, and while that was doing, struck a tally and entered "received in cash," ——— that he paid in exchequer bills.

Mr. Attorney. Do you remember any indorsement upon the bills?

Peters. No, nothing but a name.

Mr. Attorney. Were they paid to you as part of the excise?—Peters. Yes.

Mr. Attorney. Did you not endeavour to satisfy yourself?

Peters. I took them upon Mr. Duncombe's credit; his servant did not tell me one thing or other concerning them, nor did I ask him, but struck a tally for the sum.

Mr. Attorney. Was it your lot to receive them?—Peters. Yes, in a great proportion.

Mr. Attorney. Were they indorsed with the day of the month?

Peters. I saw nothing but the name.

Mr. Attorney. Had you known them not to have passed through the excise, would you have received them?

Peters. I would not, but the method then was not generally known, for after that time we received bills from Mr. Burton without names, and sent them back to the excise, and they indorsed them.

Mr. Attorney. When did you first discover that they had not passed the excise?

Peters. About three or four days after they were taken out as cash, and delivered to the clerks of the Million office, they said they could not receive them, but I cannot remember whether it was because they were not indorsed, or that they did know the method of them. Some time after I acquainted Mr. Duncombe with it that they were refused; and he answered, he had got his tally for them, and would not take them again.

Mr. Attorney. Did you offer them him again; upon any discount?

Peters. I desired him to take some of them again, about 2,000*l.* worth, but he would not, but I offered him no reward for it if he would.

L. C. J. What did you go to Mr. Duncombe to tell him the bills were refused, and desire him to take them again?

Peters. Yes, I desired him to take some of them again.

L. C. J. Were they indorsed?

Peters. There was a name I indorsed but not the day.

L. C. J. Who put the day upon them?

Peters. The clerks.

L. C. J. Why did they put the day upon them.

Peters. Because the act of parliament says, the interest should cease from the day of their being paid into the exchequer, and therefore it was thought fit to enter them on the same day he paid them.

L. C. J. If they had been indorsed and paid by a brewer into the exchequer, it would have saved the interest to the king undoubtedly; but as you say the interest would have been computed sunk from the day he paid them to you?—Peters. Yes.

Mr. Solicitor. (Sir John Hawles.) Was there any loss by those bills being received?

Peters. Yes, there was a little loss to the king after; the interest should have sunk from the time they were paid into the excise, therefore they ought not to have been paid into the exchequer.

Mr. Solicitor. Are those bills any of them paid into the exchequer, upon Mr. Duncombe's account, (a parcel of bills being shewed at the same time)?

Peters. I know nothing of that lock upon them.

Mr. Solicitor. Do you know any of the hands that have writ upon them?

Peters. Yes, one of the hands is Mr. Pregarve the present clerk of the office, another is Samuel Edwards's hand; another is Lawrence Cook's hand.

L. C. J. Let me see one of them; and looking upon it said, How came it to be indorsed upon the bill, 'paid into the excise'?

Peters. It was the method of the indorsement; when they were taken out, we wrote so upon them, because I received them as paid into the excise, &c.

Sir B. Shower. The clerks of your own office made the false indorsements; it was their fault and none of ours.

Mr. Attorney. They relied upon Mr. Duncombe, because he paid them as if he had received them from that branch of the revenue. Was there any loss by the payment of those bills?

Peters. Yes, there was 250*l.* loss to me.

Sir B. Shower. Your lordship sees now, that here is nothing at all but a man's name on the bill, and that was necessary.

Just. Turton. Neither the name, day of the month, nor indorsement, are in Mr. Duncombe's hand.

Mr. Attorney. We only say he brought them as such; one teller scrupled the taking of them, another did not; so that all the time the bills remained in the tellers hands. Were not those names set to them when they were brought to you, Mr. Peters?

Peters. Yes, I took them to be the names of the people that had paid them; looking upon it as formal, and knowing nothing further of it.

Sir T. Powis. What did Mr. Peters take to be meant by those names?

Mr. Attorney. It is a prosecution for a crime, why should he be asked that question. Would you have received them, Mr. Peters, if those names had not been put to them?

Peters. I believe not.

Mr. Attorney. Whose names do you remember to have been put to them?

Peters. I remember but one, that is Mr. Frazer, and I took it to be according to the act of parliament to warrant our taking bills as coming from the excise.

Sir T. Powis. What bills came to you, were they not in several parcels?

Peters. In three.

Sir T. Powis. Were there not some indorsed as received in the excise?

Peters. I looked but to one, and gave the rest to the clerk to examine.

Sir T. Powis. You say one parcel had one name upon them?

Peters. I saw the name Frazer upon one bill, and of all of them that were taken out of the chest, there was not any of them had any thing else upon them but a name.

Sir T. Powis. Did you neither at that time, or at any time after, see the sum of those bills made up that had indorsements upon them as being paid into the excise?

Peters. Not one.

Sir T. Powis. Did you know nothing, or never see that sum of 1,397*l.* indorsed as paid into the excise?

Peters. I knew nothing of it at that time, but afterwards understood that 1,300 and odd pounds were regularly indorsed.

Sir T. Powis. Where did you hear that?

Peters. I heard it at the Parliament House.

Sir B. Shower. Was there 1,300*l.* regularly indorsed?

Peters. I heard so, but knew it not.

Mr. Northey. What entry did you make of these bills?

Peters. I gave it to the clerk to compute.

Mr. Northey. Who had you that account from, that some of them were regularly indorsed? had it you from any of the clerks?

Peters. No, I heard it from Mr. Duncombe himself, but not when he gave me the bills; it was after that, and I understood it was 1,395*l.*

Mr. Northey. How did you enter those bills?

Peters. I entered them in parcels, as I said before.

Mr. Northey. Why did you enter them as paid into the excise?

Peters. Because I took them as such. These three parcels were in covers as I received them, and having seen one parcel, I gave them to the clerks to examine.

Sir B. Shower. Was there any interest computed to a further day than the 12th that you received them from Mr. Duncombe?

Peters. No.

Sir B. Shower. Was there any indorsement of the day when you received them?

Peters. No.

Sir B. Shower. Can you tell when Mr. Presgrove indorsed any of them?—Peters. No.

Sir B. Shower. Can you tell whether they had the same indorsement then as now?

Peters. No.

Sir B. Shower. It must be the fraud of Presgrove and them.

L. C. J. Supposing that Mr. Duncombe hath no interest after the 12th of May, that does not excuse him from having the interest to that time.

Sir B. Shower. We ought to have it, the law says so. Mr. D'Acosta had interest of Mr. Duncombe to the 12th. Were there any bills in the parcel that made up 1,300*l.* and odd money?—Peters. I cannot tell.

Mr. Attorney. Call Mr. Presgrove. Mr. Presgrove, on the 13th of July, the chamberlain of the Exchequer issued out some money bills?

Presgrove. I paid them accordingly; there were bills given me out of the king's chest to pay the same with.

Mr. Attorney. Do you know if these bills (shewing them) were paid by Mr. Duncombe?

Presgrove. Yes, they were; there are two indorsed in my hand, and there are two others.

Mr. Attorney. How came you to write it in July, when the bills were taken out with only a name upon them?

Presgrove. I remembered that in May before, Excise was wrote upon them, and I sealed up the papers, having omitted the writing upon them, so we only thought it an omission; we suppose Mr. Duncombe or his people wrote Excise upon the cover of the parcels; we found it written upon the bills when they were taken out of the king's chest.

Sir T. Powis. When they were paid in by Mr. Duncombe, do ye know that any had Excise writ upon their outside?

Presgrove. Yes, upon the outside of the paper in which the bills were contained, but not upon any of the bills.

Sir T. Powis. Can you say they were the same bills Mr. Duncombe's servant delivered to Mr. Peters?

Presgrove. I can only say they were the same bills that were delivered out of the king's box.

Another of the Defendant's Counsel. Mr. Peters remembers no other name but Frazer; they cannot be part of those bills.

Mr. Attorney. Do you remember a parcel of 1,395*l.*—Presgrove. I do not.

Mr. Attorney. Were any of those three parcels marked with the day of the month when they came through the excise?

Presgrove. No.

Mr. Attorney. Mr. D'Acosta, look upon the names of those four bills.

D'Acosta. To the best of my knowledge they are part of those that I delivered to Mr. Duncombe; Arthur Page indorsed three of them; I take this to be his own hand writing.

Mr. Attorney. Was there any more than names writ upon them when you delivered them to Mr. Duncombe?—D'Acosta. No.

Mr. Attorney. Let the jury see them: [Which was done accordingly.]

Mr. Attorney. My lord, we have done with our evidence; we do not charge Mr. Duncombe with having made those indorsements, with writing every name or setting down the day of the month to deceive the trustees, that should not puzzle the cause. It is plain matter of fact we charge him with, that he caused Mr. D'Acosta's name and others to be put upon the bills, and paid those exchequer bills into the excise as in the information.

Sir T. Powis. If they are done, we are of counsel for the defendant. The matter now before your lordship and the jury is whether Mr. Duncombe hath done any thing, or committed any such offence as the fact is laid in this information; and if the fact be a crime within any law now being or that was in being when that which he is charged with was done. We are now in a court of law, where the nature of the crime must be tried, and that we are to enquire is, if it be a legal offence; for other power we meddle not with.

L. C. J. Other power! There is no other power in England but a legal power to punish according to law.

Sir Tho. Powis. My lord, I say other power I meddle not with, nor with any thing out of my sphere, but I shall shew your lordship that here hath nothing been done but by act of parliament and upon a right understanding of those acts of parliament, or that which wise and good men may take to be so, and then we shall see how it really stands in his condition.

The information is brought against him for these two crimes, for we agree as to the acts of parliament, that he was cashier and deputy to the commissioners of excise, and answerable to them for the money that came into his hands as their cashier. The information says that on the 5th day of May, he was ordered by the commissioners to pay 10,000*l.* or more into the exchequer; so far we agree; the first crime that he is charged with is on the 12th of May; he had the money paid into his hands on the 5th, on the 7th he was discharged from being cashier, then he was ordered to pay, and says, that on the 12th he did buy 83 exchequer bills, amounting to 7,884*l.* principal and interest, of D'Acosta, to the king's loss of ———, and his own unlawful gain, &c.

He paid them into the exchequer afterwards, as if they had been reserved in the excise, indorsed with several false names; this is all in the information that is criminal, and this they say he did to the great loss and prejudice of the king.

We insist upon it, that he had by law power and right to do it, for which the two acts must be consulted; the first directs bills not exceeding 1,500,000*l.* to be issued out, and to be received and paid in any aid except the 3*s.* aid, &c.

It was not a general currency for all purposes whatsoever, but with this particular exception, and to the intent that these bills might have a general credit, not only in payments to the king, but to the merchants and all other purposes; then says this act, after such time as his majesty shall by his royal proclamation, signify that the lords of the treasury have contracted with persons, &c. then they shall not only be payable to all receivers of the revenue, but into the exchequer, for any duty or revenue to the king, by any person or receiver whatever, upon any account whatever: So by this act, any of the king's receivers that had received money in the country might have brought bills, and paid them into the exchequer for money he was to pay to the king, though it never was paid into the revenue, therefore we insist upon it, that if we be within a less compass, there is no reason for the prosecution.

L. C. J. If it be so as you say, there will be no crime.

Sir Tho. Powis. It is our great disadvantage that the thing is to be taken to be otherwise. I propose to make it out by the words of the act, the last act which shews that money being scarce, these bills were to supply the species of money in every thing, not only in the revenue payment of taxes, &c. but to supply money in any payment to the king; so that if any payment whatever be made to the king, and though a debtor to the king, an officer in any part of the revenue, or that paid him next, he might bring exchequer bills to the exchequer and pay the king's duty.

It will extend to any sum whatever upon any account to the king, so to any person, not only to the king's debtor on any score, but to any person, though the king's officer in express words: This was the express meaning on the frame of the act, we make these bills of universal currency in payments by any man, as if it were money, say they shall have interest for them till they be paid unto the king; so they were better than money, and by an established method a man may make it money when he will, by giving a recompence to those that exchange those bills for money, so that the goldsmiths desired rather bills than money. We can make money, say they, every hour of the day by them, and therefore make it our interest to take them before money, because we have 5*d.* per day per cent. till it come into the exchequer, but it shall not be of this convenience till notice be given of the contract made.

These receivers shall pay it into the exchequer on any account whatsoever, but they have narrowed the contract and raised the premium to 5 or 6 per cent. and so make the contract narrow, and will exchange them only if brought through the revenue, as delivered out of the exchequer immediately, as soon as they found the bills sunk, then people were puzzled with exchequer bills, there were specie bills and other bills, there were many that did not care to know them, and when they found this puzzle they did not care to meddle with them; they would not be troubled with discounting, and with the difference betwixt specie bills, and those that were not so, for the act doth not require the indorsing of that branch of the revenue they came through; so that if they see what part of the revenue they came through, they will exchange them, and if not they will not receive them. It was those difficulties and the narrowing the contract that sunk the exchequer bills. If air Francis Child, or any other goldsmith, give a bill, every Child will receive it, but if goldsmiths make a difference in their bills, and say such a bill shall be a specie bill and such a one not, there is nobody will take them: your lordship will find this to be the intent of the act.

The present case as to Mr. Duncombe was this; he was to pay money to the king that remained owing by him to the king. He was debtor and not accountant, not that we make this our defence, we do not need it; but this was his condition he then stood in. If he had the liberty to pay it in, it was no more ga of fence in him than in any other man; unless they have any thing to say against him as he is Mr. Duncombe; but say they, you received it in hard milled money, and needed not have gone with bills, for you had 20,000*l.* in hand. But this is so far from being a fault, that if it were the course of the exchequer formerly that the receivers ought to bring the very numerical sums and pieces that they received for the revenue, this act over-rules it, and says, if any man on any account whatever, &c.

Here comes the act, fo. 89, the king for establishing the ancient bourse of the exchequer, &c. Then there comes a clause, that it should not extend to vary or alter, &c. so that it over rules the course of the exchequer, and so could not direct that payment in the method of this act should be disturbed by this act.

Mr. Duncombe paid bills for 1,597*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* by him received in the duty of excise, and regularly indorses the same. The act says, men in offices should have interest of 5*d.* per day, &c. and when money from any office is paid into the exchequer, there must be the name of the person and the day set down to stop interest, and those that he received so in his office of excise, every one of those the interest of them is immediately stopped, so Mr. Duncombe acted regularly. They say he might have carried in the rest in specie; so he might, and probably he would have done so, if it had not been for D'Acosta, for it is not proved that Mr. Duncombe fished about for exchequer bills; but Mr. D'Acosta knowing him to be a monied man, came and asked him if he would have exchequer bills, upon which he sold him 7,884*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* at 5 per cent. discount. Now, if that be no crime, as it is not, the act allowing him to pay it without discount, if he paid it so, he answered it to the king according to the act, and so he hath hindered the discrediting of those bills, the first time they were delivered out they were discounted; for, says D'Acosta, they gave him these bills with discount, they made a contract before they came forth, then he should have so much exchange and discount beyond the exchange, because he was to be paid in bills; so that before ever they came abroad, they were disparaged with a witness; for, if the— think them less worth than money, every body will think so too. Mr. Duncombe takes them with less discount than they allowed them at, so that he rather gave credit than otherwise to those bills, they rose higher and the discount was less upon them, so hitherto there is no crime. Then the proclamation comes out in the words of the act making the said bills payable on all accounts whatever.

Then as to the indorsement, if that was a crime, it was in D'Acosta your own evidence; he swears he put his own name to them, and he knew no hurt in putting his name to them. Those bills he paid in to Mr. Duncombe on his own private account; but those that Mr. Duncombe had received in the excise for 1,300*l.* he had abused the king if he had not indorsed them and stopped the interest; but from D'Acosta he received them, as I or any other man might have done: Mr. D'Acosta was to have received interest for them till he paid them in, but Mr. Duncombe paid them and stopped the interest.

These indorsements upon them, D'Acosta says, were not for Mr. Duncombe's sake, but for his own sake, and that he put on his own and his partners' names.

When Mr. Duffcombe brought them into the exchequer, he had a great deal of trouble about this business; had he then, when he paid them in, told Mr. Peters that he had received them all in the excise, it would have made the case worse; but they have cleared him of that. Mr. Peters is an unwilling witness on our side, he owns he did not tell him any such thing, so that Mr. Duncombe is innocent; he is so far from accusing him with it, that he clears him, and says, he told him no such thing.

We shall prove distinctly the parcel received in the excise, that it was a parcel regularly indorsed. There was no occasion for their being deceived, they had the opportunity of casting them up, so that this was a good payment in point of law, and the king had no damage.

Sir B. Shower. We submit it to the consideration of your lordship and the jury upon our evidence, if we had any intention to defraud the king; we shall shew we could not have any such intention, for the interest was to cease when the bills were paid in, and Mr. Peters swears the loss was his own and not the king's, so that the king had no prejudice in fact. D'Acosta discharges Mr. Duncombe from any design to defraud the king, he says, it was his own motion not Mr. Duncombe's. Then in respect of that act about their being received into the exchequer, Mr. Duncombe did not tell them that they were paid into the excise, Mr. Duncombe's man told Fern at the same time that they were not paid into the excise. There is no proof that he paid them as such; on the 5th of May, he was directed to make this payment; on the 7th of May he was removed; on the 12th he paid those bills into the exchequer; judge then if there can be any evidence to satisfy the jury that he designed a deceit when a distinct parcel being 1,300*l.* are mentioned to be taken in the excise, and the other not so. Peters passed them, and so it is not possible there could be any deceit in this matter. The bills were in 3 parcels, some of the clerks must take notice which came from the excise and which not: the interest was cast up to the 12th of May upon 83 bills, so that they must know they came not all from the excise. For the other point of Mr. Duncombe's being cashier of the excise, had their money in specie and paid it in exchequer bills; the jury must consider if Mr. Duncombe did pay them as coming from the excise, Mr. Duncombe not having signed or indorsed them as such.

If Mr. Duncombe had been in office and not paid in the money, the first information ought to have been for paying that in other coins different from the coin he was to pay when under articles to the contrary. But this was a payment as debtor afterwards; or if Mr. Duncombe had died, his executor must have been substituted as another debtor, and he might have paid in these bills as a lawful payment. Exchequer bills rose upon an exigency of state; page 130 will tell us the frame of them, and the reason of issuing them out.

Then the Clause was recited.

This transaction was after both the acts, when both of them were in force. Another clause provides, that the receivers of the revenue should out of such milled money as they had in their hands pay the value of those bills to any man that offered them, so that the receivers were obliged to take exchequer bills, and to give money for them.

The second act makes them generally current, including the third act; and also at the receipt of the exchequer from the said commissioners receivers collectors; but if it be said these words do not take in the cashier, it is said in another place, any other person or persons, certainly this will take it in, no man can use words larger than those universal terms, any person in any payment on any account whatever; but there is yet a stronger than all this: the act of parliament was Mr. Duncombe's rule, he was subject to take notice of the contract by which they were to exchange all bills coming through any branch of the revenue or not. The second act, page 338, was read, and page 522. The two proclamations were agreeable to this act.

Mr. Duncombe was far from any fraud in this matter, we must open the evidence in this matter to remind you of it, and so went on as before. Mr. Duncombe doubted the doing of it when he was cashier, but Mr. Burton made no scruple to pay those bills when sent up to him in milled money or bills. But when the matter came to be questioned, he consulted the commissioners of the excise upon it, they differed in opinion if they could take them from officers as officers, Mr. Duncombe was obliged to pay them to the king as cashier to the commissioners of the excise. Mr. Burton upon this, between the 7th and the 19th of May, received and took exchequer bills, for that which should have been paid in milled money or guineas, or specie money received upon the excise, and Mr. Duncombe having notice of it, thought he might as lawfully pay them to the king, as Mr. Burton might receive them into the excise. Mr. Burton paid in exchequer bills for what he did not receive so, but there was no notice taken of it. He did for six months, till the contract made them scruple it, not that they thought it to be an offence in them or any one else, all the officers made use of these exchequer bills. But now because the contract was made, they scrupled whether they should pay any but specie bills, we submit it to the consideration of your lordship and the jury, if Mr. Duncombe had taken exchequer bills of his own he might not have paid them unto the king as money. If this was then the received practice and opinion, though that would not excuse in all cases, yet if the words of the law be with us, and if the reasonable construction of the words of the law be on our client's side, we hope the jury will not bring him in guilty. If the practice be that which wise and good men, such as Mr. Duncombe is supposed to be, would have done in the like case, we hope they will not find him guilty. If there be such words in any act of parliament as obliges particular officers to pay in the individual pieces of money they receive, it is beyond the memory of man that ever any one was prosecuted for not doing so.

In the act, the proviso respects auditors, collectors, tellers and receivers, we insist on this proviso (which was read, Provided always, &c.) It shews that they had in their other law made an alteration in the method of paying it into the exchequer; if in the other act it be said, it is to be at the receipt of the exchequer, &c.

Serj. Dolbin. Mr. Duncombe had a right to pay it by the act of parliament and proclamation; no man that read the proclamations could tell what was specie and what not; any man that came to the exchange could not imagine that the contract was narrowed, because the act of parliament led them into the mistake; if it be their duty to receive it, it is the duty of the subject to pay it; but they distinguish his case and say he was cashier of the excise. But we have proved he was not so then, so that this part of the information must fall; but if he had been cashier, it was not his duty to pay it in specie; if he paid it in current coin as these bills were at that time, there was no fraud at all in it; so that that part of the information is out of the case; and while he was cashier and servant to the commissioners of the excise, it was their payment and not his; he struck his tally, so that the payment was by them and not by him; but say they, they were indorsed in false names, but that appears to be nothing at all by the evidence: the act says there shall be indorsed the name of the person that pays, and the day of the month, but we did not pay it in till the —, indorsed without name and date; so that this indorsement, such as it was, was of no signification, but the indorsement taken notice of by this act says, the interest shall cease.

The bills thus paid in were paid in part of the 7,800*l*. Mr. Peters does not speak ad idem. Mr. D'Acosta believes the bills were the same that Mr. Duncombe had from him. D'Acosta says the bills that he sold to Mr. Duncombe were indorsed, &c. but none of those that Peters had, had names; none of these three parcels that he had, had any names, but one that had Frazer upon it. Those showed to the jury have no names: we have the right of the king's subjects to make payments in exchequer bills. There is a penalty in the law of exchequer bills be counterfeited, therefore Mr. Peters ought to make it appear to the world whence he had those bills.

Mr. Northey. My lord, I shall beg leave to state the material points in the information, there are many things not material talked of; I shall point at the particular matters: 1st. that they were paid into the exchequer, that they have stated in the information we paid them in, it must be allowed a payment.

The next point, whether Mr. Duncombe in his circumstances, might pay in exchequer bills, that is not the question, though if it were, it is plain by the act he might do it.

The question is this, whether Mr. Duncombe who paid them in, paid them in ac si as if they had been received in the excise by him, and if ac truly indorsed according to the act, with the man's name that pays suam in, and the day when he pays them; they are positive we did do so; we are positive to the contrary; we delivered Mr. Peters several parcels, one parcel indorsed with the men's names and the days when paid, these we told him we received from the excise. This makes an end of this information, if our witnesses prove it: we observe that by his own evidence it was impossible it should be paid in, as received by us for excise, for the act enjoins the indorsing to stop the interest, but Peters allowed interest for these bills, till the 12th of May; Mr. Duncombe was discharged the 7th of May, Mr. Burton came in his place, and told Peters who knew this, that he should allow them ac si to the 12th, when Mr. Duncombe was discharged on the 7th. This demonstrated that he did not tell Mr. Peters that he received all those bills for excise; he could not tell him he received them that day for excise; this is positive proof in the matter.

We observe further, that Peters' witnesses he took the bills by consent and delivered them to his man; he did not ask him if they were right, he hath a memory for that, but though he knows Mr. Duncombe's servants, he cannot remember which of them brought the bills to him. But we have the servant here who will refresh his memory, when Mr. Duncombe's servant brought them those bills, they say they had not seen the act of parliament, and that the lords of the treasury had given no directions in it. We shall read the king's proclamation of the 23d of April 1697, to shew that if we were mistaken, we were led into it, by the best exposition of the act of parliament that could be. Then the proclamation was read reciting all the clauses of the act.

Sir B. Shower observed upon it, that nothing could be more plain, but least the officers should mistake, though he could not tell how Peters could. It says we do hereby, &c. enjoin — and tellers. There is Mr. Peters. We have this for us, what can be plainer? It is plain by this first witness, there is no fraud in Mr. Duncombe. This man told them that the bills had not passed the excise; then, says he, I cannot receive them, but he cannot tell why. It is plainly contrary to the proclamation, which enjoined him to receive them. Peters should have seen if the bills had been regularly indorsed, he took them upon credit; and hereupon it is alledged against us, that we paid them into the exchequer, as if they had been received from the excise.

Mr. Harcourt. Mr. Duncombe is charged with lessening the credit of the exchequer bills and of the exchequer, but if the fact be doubtful; if this might have been done by law that he hath done. If it had been enacted generally before, if allowed by the commissioners of the excise afterwards, and by the direction of the lords of the treasury. It is hard for Mr. Duncombe to be prosecuted for such an offence: what he did was done in many instances before, but whether their practice may excuse him there is no necessity of enquiring into or of relying upon, that he is strictly justified by the law, though where a person is indicted for a fact in its own nature doubtful, the practice of others may give some light towards the vindicating or condemning him. Though Mr. Duncombe be so indicted, there is not one fact alledged against him sufficient to induce the jury to believe him guilty.

The information is not for his paying these bills as money, or if it were, the act is a full answer to it. Had Mr. Duncombe been indicted for that, the answer must have been the act itself; and supposing this fact had been designed to be done before the act, it could not have been better excused than by this act.

The exchequer bills were not falsely indorsed, the information is mistaken in that point; there is no other indorsement but what the act describes, and a name without a day mentioned is nothing; it was their fault they took them as paid into the excise, for not looking upon the 2d parcel they paid them in as being truly indorsed. It is the most absurd thing in the earth, that we should come to pay bills that had not the day of the month upon them as if they had been paid into the excise, as if we had not common sense to see that the exchequer could not be imposed upon in that manner.

In the next place, it would not have been criminal had he paid them so. If a person had received money, and told them that he did receive money for the excise but bills, then they had proved their information, but they say he paid them in as if they had been received for excise.

Your own witnesses put it wholly upon these two. If you fail in proving those two, then we must leave it to the consideration of my lord and the jury, whether you have proved your information. The 1st witness says, Mr. Duncombe's servant disowned it, and therefore he would not take them; the other witness, he takes them; so that what is criminal is done by the witness, he commits a notorious fraud to justify himself, and makes false indorsements as if we had done it.

Mr. Munday. How far the fact charged in the information is criminal hath been largely taken notice of. — It is manifest from D'Acosta's evidence that he was the first person that made a contract about exchequer bills; now the lords of the exchequer themselves did not know what success they would have, therefore they make a contract with Mr. D'Acosta, allowing him a large exchange and discount upon the bills. He tries among the brokers how he could put them off, and at last finds out Mr. Duncombe knowing him to be a monied man, and at D'Acosta's request, Mr. Duncombe took some of those bills at 5l. per cent. discount, which is much less than the lords of the treasury had discounted to Mr. D'Acosta, this is plainly to advance the value of those bills; and the next contract Mr. D'Acosta made with the lords, it was for a much less value, so that it was for the particular reputation, that Mr. Duncombe gave to those bills that they were not more undervalued. It is plain, then, that he did not diminish the credit of the exchequer bills.

In the next place, it is as plain that the king was not defrauded for the discount. I must pay it, says your own witness. The interest must be allowed to the time they were brought in, there is no contradiction, no deceit there; so that it is manifest that as the fact was not criminal, neither was it done for any such purpose as to defraud the king.

If in the country collectors and receivers had cash in their hands from old money carried into the country mints, and they give bills in London for gold or new milled money, yet the merchants pay it in those bills. Consult the king's counsel, they will tell you that it would give credit to those bills for the exchequer to take them, and if so it was beyond contradiction an advancement of their reputation for Mr. Duncombe to buy those exchequer bills.

Mr. Eyres. I shall put your lordship in mind of a case that was before your lordship in the Guildhall of London, but I do not offer it as the offence in evidence. Dyer the news-writer had an information preferred against him as having wrote a news-letter, with a design to cast a slur upon the justice of the kingdom, concerning the prosecution of the gentlemen for the Lancashire plots, and saying that in Mr. Standish's house there was so many arms found, that is to say, so many birding pieces, so many hunting saddles, &c. but there was no such things found: though this would have been an offence, if it had been charged that he did it with a design to scandalize the justice of the nation, and as not having told the whole truth, but having charged it upon the falsity of the information, he was acquitted.

L. C. J. You mistake it; it was upon a mistake of the session of gaol delivery that he was acquitted; the meaning of the indictment was for ridiculing the Plots.

Mr. Eyres. I submit it to your lordship; the question now before us is, if there hath been any fraud or deceit committed by Mr. Duncombe, what a condition would many people be in? if all that owed the king money, should have informations brought against them here in the court of King's-bench, that they have not paid the king's money in specie but bills, with a design to lessen the credit of the exchequer or to defraud his majesty.

L. C. J. The question is, whether the king's receiver having actually in his hands the king's money, whether he can detain their money to his own use, and pay the king in exchequer bills, and if those receivers be robbed, whether the king must actually answer it. If a bailiff receives his master's rent in the country, and keeps the money in his hand till he can conveniently pay it, if he be robbed in the mean time he shall be allowed it upon his account; but if he put the money into another man's hand, and that man be robbed of it, he might be accountable for it; so that I do not see the law allows the king's officer to convert the king's money to his own use.

Then the 129th page of the Act was read.

Mr. Brown. Mr. Peters tells it, he charges himself with so much money; it is impossible the king should be deceived, for Mr. Peters discharges Mr. Duncombe of so much money paid.

Mr. Attorney. Let them go on regularly; sometimes they go on with law and then with matter of fact; let them go on with their evidence first.

Mr. Brown. This we prove, that Mr. Peters was teller; then that he received those exchequer bills from us; that he owns the receipt of them, and those bills so received are thrown down into the talley-office, and a talley is struck from them, whereupon Mr. Duncombe hath his quietus; for that the mistake is in Mr. Peters, and not in Mr. Duncombe, for Peters ought not to have taken them, but it is plain he charges himself with the money actually received, so if the king was no sufferer by this transaction, we shall show that Mr. Duncombe was very fair, and if they had not been wilful in the thing, they might have distinguished betwixt those that were regularly indorsed as coming through the excise and those that were not.

Then the 130th page about the Capitation Act was read, afterwards the 2nd paragraph.

Sir B. Shower observes, that the 1st act not only allows them to pay exchequer bills in for the aids, but allows the payment of them from those who have the receipt, the receivers have the liberty of paying it. Read the next clause, we shall shew your lordship that the king desires those bills rather than money.

Then the Clause was read.

Sir T. Powis. Your lordship sees that upon the first act adapted to pay the aids, money was scarce in the country, and therefore it makes those bills not only payable by those that receive the revenue, but a breach of their trust if they did not exchange these bills for money, so that if I had exchequer bills, I go presently to these men the receivers; and say, take you the bills and give me money for them, and they are obliged to it to give credit to the bills, and to stop the interest due upon them from the king. If the bills be not brought in, then the receiver kept the money and the bills paid interest, so that it is better for the king to have the bills than the money.

L. C. J. But suppose exchequer bills come to the receiver, and the receiver buys those bills, does he do well in that?

Sir T. Powis. Yes, he defrauds not the king, for if Mr. Duncombe had brought his money to Westminster-hall, I or any man might have stopped him and demanded money for exchequer bills, and it would have been a fault in him not to have given me money for them.

Mr. Attorney. The extent of the Act is no further than to money paid on the duty charged that session. Read the clause, page 132.—“And be it further enacted,” &c.

Then was read the 2d act, page 384.—“And whereas by an act,” &c.

Sir B. Shower. This clause is plain, it ought to have been paid into the exchequer without coming into any other aid, and he shall be allowed interest till it be paid into the exchequer, so that it is payable into the exchequer without coming into any branch of the revenue.

Then the next clause was read.—“It is hereby enacted,” &c.

Then page 388.—“Provided always,” &c.

Then page 522.—“Provided, nevertheless,” &c.

Then page 593.

Then the Proclamation of 23d April, 1697, which sir B. Shower observed was before the 14th of May, the time when Mr. Duncombe is accused of having defrauded the king, and that Mr. Peters was enjoined by that proclamation to take them as a teller.

Mr. Northey. Subsequent to this, there is a clause in another act already read.—Then the Proclamation of July 30th, 1697, was read.—“We don't insist upon these things to justify the fact, but to shew, that this was the general practice of all persons whatever to take those bills.

Call Mr. Cook, Mr. Sheldrack, and sir John Foch.

Sir T. Powis. We shall now prove that there were bills drawn by many in the country. Mr. Sheldrack, pray acquaint my lord and the jury, whether when receivers in the country had the product of old money received, paid back to them in milled money, whether when they draw bills upon merchants in London for so much milled money of the king's in their hands, did they draw these bills expressly to be paid in milled money and gold, and whether they came with exchequer bills, if you took those bills or made them pay money?

Mr. Sheldrack. In May, 1697, I had application made to me, having the care of the bills of exchange. Merchants came to me and urged me to take exchequer bills in discharge of the bills drawn upon them, upon which I went to Mr. Duncombe, who was then cashier of the exchequer, and acquainted him with it; he told me there was a new cashier coming in, and he was a going out, and therefore bid me put them off for a day or two, telling them that I was to receive directions from the new cashier, and that we could not receive bills yet, because the state of the accounts of 200,000*l.* or thereabouts was to be made up and transferred betwixt Mr. Duncombe and Mr. Burton. On the 17th of May, about 11 o'clock, Mr. Duncombe came to this office, the transfer was made, and all the bills and notes examined by Mr. Burton and his brother, and as soon as they were satisfied there were bills to answer the sums, Mr. Burton discharged Mr. Duncombe.

Sir T. Powis. Had you ever any directions about taking exchequer bills?

Sheldrack. Mr. Burton told me that the exchequer bills being newly issued, it was necessary to credit them as much as we could; the same directions were given to the bill-men, and I told them it was proper they should attend the new cashier for his orders.

Sir T. Powis. What money did you receive in exchequer bills?

Sheldrack. From the 7th of May to the 22d of October we received exchequer bills in all payments, making 247,321*l.* 9*s.* 2½*d.* many of them bills made payable in gold and milled money, the value received from the collectors, expressing whence they paid them; there are two or three that enter them before they come to me, that can witness the same thing.

Sir T. Powis. How much did you receive in gold money during the time?

Sheldrack. Between 7th May, 1697, and the 22d of October that we were ordered to take no more exchequer bills, we took 22,977*l.* 11*s.* 11½*d.* in gold and milled money.

Sir T. Powis. Was this all known to the commissioners?

Sheldrack. I gave them an account of it all under my own hand, and particularly the days when the sums were received, so much in exchequer bills and so much in milled money.

Sir T. Powis. Did they ever reprove you for it?

Sheldrack. No, Mr. Duncombe met me soon after, and asked me how I liked Mr. Burton, our new cashier; I answered him I took him to be a very honest gentleman. Then he asked me what I did about exchequer bills? I answered, that Mr. Burton ordered me to take them in all payments. Betwixt the 7th of May and the 12th, we received 4,000*l.* in exchequer bills, upon several bills of exchange drawn from the country by several receivers, some of them payable at 20 and 30 days after date. From the 22d of May, we had bills in hand for 100,000*l.* most of them according to the same time, at 28 or 30 days after date, or eight, so that it was 40 days before they became due, and were not usually paid in three weeks after, and then paid in exchequer bills and the discount of 7½ per cent.

Sir T. Powis. It was better for the money to be in the country, and for the king to have the bills for when they came in the interest ceased running on in the country, so that they did it in consideration of the king's interest.—Mr. Sheldrack, when you had bills drawn at 30 days sight, would they have paid them sooner if you had taken it in exchequer bills?

Mr. Sheldrack. No.

Sir T. Powis. How do you know that?

Sheldrack. I am charged with all bills, and have given out bills several times, and the king being to pay 5d. per cent. per day, it looked like a great abuse, and they ought to have given general directions to their collectors to pay it at six days sight, upon which sir John Foach and others ordered us to alter the method of it according to the trade of the country, and ordered me, if bills were not paid in twelve days after they became due, to return them to the collectors they came from.

One of the King's Counsel. Mr. Sheldrack, you did take exchequer bills from the merchants instead of these bills, did you ever know any money brought up to town by the receivers, and exchequer bills brought into the revenue instead of money?

Sheldrack. I know nothing of that.

Sir T. Powis. Those merchants that accepted bills in milled money and gold, if you had called upon them, they were not able to pay it in money at the end of the time if you would not have taken bills from them?

Sheldrack. I lost twenty of the best merchants, that paid 800,000*l.*; Mr. Walker and company, Samuel Trowel, Josiah Hilyard, &c. because I would not take any more exchequer bills.

Sir T. Powis. Did you use to exchange exchequer bills brought to you?—Sheldrack. No.

L. C. J. You make much of this, because bills expressing to be paid in gold and money were paid in exchequer bills, was it therefore a good payment?

Sir B. Shower. These collectors carried in old money to the mints; they had it recoined, and instead of sending it up they get good bills for it payable in money or gold, and yet merchants paid it into the excise in exchequer bills; this shews that it was the public practice.

L. C. J. But you seem still to infer that it was a good and lawful payment, and would impose so upon the court, but we tell you it was not so, there was no necessity of taking it so, the merchants were obliged to pay them in milled money or guineas, but this that you talk of is done by consent, whereas you alledge that it was good in law.

Another of the King's Counsel.—He consulted his merchants about it; he thought it was best to give credit to those bills, but they did not say that it was to be done by law.

Mr. Montague. Mr. Sheldrack, when the collectors paid money in the country had they not the benefit of discount in it?

Sheldrack. No doubt of it; the collectors one half, and the merchant one half.

Sir B. Shower. We say it was so far from being what that it was advantageous to the king; we do not urge it that it was a good payment, but that it was the opinion of those that were trusted with the king's revenue to make their bills current.

L. C. J. They had authority to do so.

Sir B. Shower. They had no more than the law gave them.

Sir T. Powis. All that we use it for is this: we are charged with fraud and a design to deceive the king, whereas it appears that those officers intrusted with the revenue thought it so far from being so, that when they saw bills to be paid in milled money or gold, they looked upon it to be no deceit, but allowed it.

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Duncombe did not do it till Mr. Burton did it.

Another of the Defendant's Counsel. Did the price of exchequer bills rise or fall after you were forbid taking them?

Sheldrack. They fell.

Q. Had you any directions from any body else but Mr. Burton about them?

Sheldrack. No.

Q. Had you any directions to indict any body for it?—Sheldrack. No.

Q. To sir John Foach. What application was there made to you and the other commissioners of the excise about these exchequer bills?

Sir John Foach. Mr. Burton, in two days after his entry upon his office, came and acquainted us that there were a great many bills, as Mr. Sheldrack says, and the merchants would not pay them but in exchequer bills, upon which we debated it amongst ourselves and consulted the act; and upon the clause, p. 384, some were of opinion that the parliament had made exchequer bills silver and gold; upon which we represented it the Tuesday morning following to the lords of the treasury, and discoursed with them an hour or two upon it. The lords debated it, whether the law was so or not, and at last desired that Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor should attend on the Thursday following, when Mr. Burton and Mr. Knot waited to know their opinion, and they told me the lords had given directions to take them; after which, they were taken to a great many thousand pounds without any contradiction.

Q. How did you know the lords of the treasury ordered it so?

A. We gave credit to Mr. Burton, who told us so.

Sir T. Powis. Had you any directions from the treasury to the contrary?

A. Not till October following.

Q. Did you attend the lords often?

A. We attended them every week; they knew that such payments were made.

Q. When was it that you first attended them about it?

A. It was betwixt the 7th and 12th of May, a day or two after Mr. Burton came in.

Sir T. Powis. The lords of the treasury gave power to issue out those bills in such a method as they thought proper, but could not vary it from the act of parliament, so that there was nothing to make it criminal but the opinion of the lords of the treasury, and of the commissioners of the excise.

L. C. J. Must we therefore be of the same opinion?

Sir T. Powis. No, we do not say so; but the jury must not think that we acted fraudulently in the matter.

Another of the Defendant's Counsel. It was the general opinion at that time, and constantly practised, the lords of the treasury approved it in payments, and the commissioners of excise accounted constantly before the lords of the treasury.

Mr. Cooper. Sir John Foach, upon what consideration was it that those bills were allowed to pass; you were mentioning some reasons of state why those bills were allowed to be taken?

A. Some were of opinion we could not by law receive them, others thought it was fit to give them credit.

Q. You said there were some merchants refused to pay money, but only in exchequer bills?

A. Mr. Burton told us he was so informed by his officers.

Q. That was then one reason why they were received?

A. The lords of the treasury permitted us to receive them till October following, that we were prohibited.

Q. Was there no notice taken that you had received them so, by those that prohibited you?

A. Never that I heard of.

Sir B. Shower. It was reckoned good payment in every body but Mr. Duncombe. Call Mr. Fitch, Mr. Sturton, Mr. Dawtree, and Mr. Milner.

Q. Mr. Milner, what do you know of the payment of exchequer bills, for bills drawn in milled money and guineas?

A. I had all from one Petit in 1697, and he told me if I would I might pay those bills in exchequer notes, which accordingly I did for what bills I had drawn upon me to be paid in new money.

Q. Did they insist upon it that you should do so?

A. They came to me and told me I might do so.

L. C. J. They were his friends; suppose a man be bound to pay worth in guineas and silver, will paying it in exchequer bills be a good payment, or a rule for others?

Sir B. Shower. No, we do not say that this is to be our rule, but we say that those that consented to take exchequer bills in lieu of gold and money, designed the public benefit.

L. C. J. Had Mr. Duncombe the same design?

Sir B. Shower. Certainly he had, for we obliged Mr. D'Acosta, who might otherwise have gone to the brokers with his bills, and then they would have been 10 or 12 per cent discount.

L. C. J. It is imposing upon the court to say, because some did it that therefore it is lawful.

Sir Tho. Powis. We are not now upon what they thought law, but proving that they did not think it a fraud.

L. C. J. You are in the right now.

Sir Tho. Powis. Mr. Fitch, what number of exchequer bills were there actually received at the excise office?

A. I was employed by Mr. Duncombe about the exchequer bills; there came a considerable number of them, there was to be the name of the person or his servant, and the date upon these that were paid, and accordingly there were bills thus regularly indorsed for 1,300 and odd pounds.

Q. John Cook, do you know any thing of the payment of the same bills into the exchequer from Mr. Duncombe to Mr. Peters?

J. Cook. On the 12th of May, 1697, Mr. Duncombe received exchequer bills from Mr. D'Acosta, and going to the exchequer to pay them to Mr. Peters, told him he had two parcels of bills, one of them that had passed the revenue and the other not: one parcel of 1,300 odd pounds that came from the excise office was indorsed, and the other parcel from D'Acosta came not through the excise office.

L. C. J. Did you hear Mr. Duncombe say so distinctly?—A. Yes, my lord.

One of the Defendant's Counsel. They were divided into parcels; the fact speaks it.

L. C. J. Were the bills delivered by you, or by Mr. Duncombe?

Cook. I carried them, but my master delivered them with his own hand, and told him the difference betwixt them.

Mr. Attorney. Call Mr. Peters. Mr. Peters, as to Mr. Cook?

A. I knew nothing of him or of his relation to Mr. Duncombe; I knew not if I saw him that day or not, but am positive Mr. Duncombe did not deliver me the bills; it was either Stent or Romney.

Q. Are you positive that Cook was not there, when you received the bills?

A. I cannot be positive that Cook was not there, but I am positive that Mr. Duncombe was not there when the bills were delivered.

Q. When was it you saw Cook first?

A. I saw him a day or two after, but knew him not to be his servant, and some time after I had charged myself with the money, I saw Mr. Duncombe come in at the wicket gate of Westminster-hall.

Q. Was Mr. Duncombe there when the bills were brought?—A. No.

Q. Cook swears he was there, and told you the difference betwixt the bills expressly?

A. I do not know that I saw him at that time.

Serj. Darnel. Was there any thing said that the bills he had from D'Acosta had not passed the excise?—A. No.

Mr. Attorney. Did he name D'Acosta at that time?

A. No, upon the oath I have taken.

Q. Did you look upon the bills?

A. I looked upon one parcel, and they were signed Frazer,

Sir B. Shower. Mr. Peters, bethink yourself, did not you at first scruple the taking those bills as not coming through the excise?

A. No, I did not.

Q. But you swore it you shall have it by and by.

Mr. Attorney. It was Mr. Fern that said, when those bills were brought to him, he refused them, because they had not passed through the excise, and therefore it is the more likely they would conceal that objection from the other officer.

Mr. Peters. I knew nothing of D'Acosta, till I saw him in the declaration.

Q. Did Mr. Duncombe bring you no parcels of bills that day?

A. I saw him not till I saw him come through the wicket gate.

Sir B. Shower. You saw him so near as the hall gate, what did you say to him?

A. I said to him, Mr. Duncombe, I have charged your money.

Another of the Defendant's Counsel. Were the bills in 3 parcels?—A. Yes.

Q. This helps to clear the matter, that there was no fraud in it; shew him one of the bills, is that your name?

A. No, there is no name of mine here.

Sir T. Powis. Did the king lose any money by this?

A. No, not one farthing.

Q. Had not Mr. Duncombe a demand upon the loan at your office, of 5,000*l.* payable before that day, and there was not money in cash to answer him?—A. It was not paid.

Q. Mr. Stent, did you carry any bills to the exchequer from Mr. Duncombe?

A. No, I never did.

Q. Mr. Romney, did you?

A. No, I never did.

Q. Mr. Stent, what was it you carried then?

A. On the 8th of May my master gave me a note to strike a tally, I came to Mr. Peters, and desired him to take three orders on Mr. Palms, and told Mr. Peters, here is my note, and threw it down. Mr. Peters told me I must go to Mr. Fern, it was to be paid in his office, for I have no money, says he, before Mr. Fern, to take them, and I will take them up again by and by. Accordingly I went to Mr. Fern, and told him I had three orders of court on Mr. Palms, and that Mr. Peters desired him to take them again, but Mr. Fern refused to do it, upon which I went to Mr. Peters and told him so, then he went himself to Mr. Fern, but he still refused. Then Mr. Peters said to me, come, I will not be obliged to him, then he took the note and struck a tally, which I brought on the 8th of May to Mr. Brown at the excise office, and then I went to Teddington to my master's house, and was there on the 12th of May.

Mr. Fern. Did Mr. Stent bring you any exchequer bills?

A. He shewed me no exchequer bills.

Sir T. Powis. We say that the payment, by Mr. Duncombe was a legal payment, and though that payment by merchants was not because of their undertaking to pay it specially in gold or milled money, yet that will be of use to us by and by; but Mr. Duncombe's was as legal as if there had been an act of parliament that such a proportion of lead so and so stamped should go for money of such a value in all payments; this at that time was as good to the king as gold and silver if made so by law. If a receiver in the country had met a man with such a parcel of stamped lead money, and had said to him, I do not like this money, I will give you this for the king, and the receiver had accordingly taken it and given him other money for it, this would have been no abuse to the king; or suppose I have so many guineas, the king takes them at 22*s.* and if I say to a receiver, if you will take them at 22*s.* I will allow you so much, thus he makes a profit of them, but does no wrong to the king at all. It is the king's interest that all the exchequer bills should be brought in and sunk, for so they must do according to the act, so the act says, when they come in on a proper fund, then that is the king's wish, he is not wronged by having them paid in, if they be paid in on a fund they stop the interest, if on a right fund they are sunk and never go out to pay interest again. If people who have these bills, stay a week before they call for their money though due when they receive those bills, it is a great deal for the king to pay so much interest every day, so that it is better for his majesty to have them all paid into the hands of his officers, and if they keep them two or three days in their hands there is a profit to the party, but no manner of deceit to the king? We therefore stand upon it that it was a legal payment according to the act and proclamation. The opinion of the officers of the king's revenue shews that it is no deceitful payment. Will they let a man that hath the king's money in his hand pay in exchequer bills? yes, because there is no deceit upon the king for so doing, the king is no loser by it. All those merchants that paid exchequer bills instead of guineas and milled money may have informations against them, and every one of the commissioners of excise may have informations against them of the like nature, for the thing is the same. He took not those bills whilst he was in the office, for those he took then were regularly indorsed, all those complained of were taken on the 12th day from D'Acosta, and why might not he take them? If any man had owed money to the king, he might go by law and ask those that had exchequer bills to let him have them to pay to the king for renewing a lease or any other debt, he brings them to the exchequer and they take from him, the king has his own to a farthing, and the receiver charges himself with the money.

Sir B. Shower. We put it upon them to distinguish it from a collector of the excise who hath milled money of the king's in his hand, and let them shew one word in any one act of parliament that orders exchequer bills to be paid in upon any branch of the revenue before they be paid into the exchequer. It is in any payment whatever, and the teller came to receive it. We submit it to the jury if we have established their information by Mr. Cook, and contradicted Peters by two other witnesses, and as two other evidence swear they were not with him that day, they verify Cook and falsify Mr. Peters.

Mr. Peters. It was to the best of my opinion Buntney that brought me the bills, but coming down that same day or soon after, we talked with Stent about the matter, and he said it was he and not Rumney.

Mr. Stent. I told you that I was with you about three orders of court, and not about exchequer bills.

Mr. Attorney. The information against Mr. Duncombe is, &c. We have proved that he was cashier of the excise, that he received 20,000*l.* in milled money, that he was ordered by the commissioners of the excise to pay 10,000*l.* &c. that he paid 7,000 odd pounds of it in exchequer bills bought by him from D'Acosta at 5 per cent. discount, and that he ordered feigned names to be written upon the bills, and we have proved that the bills were indorsed with false names as if they had been received into the revenue of the excise. Mr. Peters hath sworn expressly that he took them to have been received into the revenue of the excise. Mr. Peters hath sworn expressly that he took them to have been received upon that revenue, he understood so by the names indorsed upon them, for that was at that time the usual method, and thence he concluded that the persons whose names were indorsed upon them had paid them. They contradict this, and alledge the difference betwixt the bills regularly indorsed and those that were not was told to the teller. If that be made out to the satisfaction of the court I know not, that must be left upon the credit of that witness and Mr. Peters. Mr. Peters denies it positively, that either Cook or Mr. Duncombe were there that day, and swears he did not see Mr. Duncombe till after, so that Cook is expressly contradicted in all his evidence; Mr. Peters expressly denies any thing said to him by that man at all, if Mr. Peters may be credited in this matter, and though he does not say positively that Mr. Duncombe or his man told him expressly that those bills were paid into the excise, yet except they had declared the contrary, the officer must take them so. If that be so, then the information is proved in every particular. There is no other part of our evidence in question but that of his having paid them into the exchequer as having come through the excise, Mr. Duncombe knew it plainly that they had not been so paid in, he knew they were falsely indorsed, and that by his own directions as D'Acosta swears, that by his direction several false and feigned names were wrote upon them. If this be proved, this is an offence, they cannot say it is no crime.

Sir B. Shower. That depends upon some clause of the act read to your lordship, by which those bills might have been paid by Mr. Duncombe though they had never been received in any branch of the revenue, the 2*nd* clause of the said act, and the 3*rd* clause of the 1*st* act, passed in the 1*st* year of the said king.

Mr. Attorney. That is manifestly false, it is in the 1*st* act that exchequer bills are to be received in all payments of collectors and receivers only, in all such bills as were granted that session, only except the 3*rd* and 4*th*. They are bound indeed if anybody comes and desire to have milled money in lieu of bills to exchange them, but Mr. Duncombe's money was not taken in upon any aid of that session, so that he was not bound if any body had come to him to have exchanged their exchequer bills for money; that clause does not extend to his case. It is restrained expressly to the clause in that act of parliament for the ease of the people in the country, the act says they should exchange bills brought to them upon such and such aids, but does not extend to other aids granted that session of parliament.

Sir B. Shower. The next clause is upon the subsequent act, fo. 385, therefore Mr. Duncombe might have paid them in exchequer bills.

Mr. Attorney. There is no ground for that. Then the clause was recited.

Thus far the clause makes them current only to collectors, receivers, or commissioners of any part of the revenue; they are made current at the receipt of exchequer, not only to the receivers but from the receivers to the exchequer, it was highly reasonable they should be able to pay them in discharge. The last words they ground upon are "from any other person and on what account soever," hence they would infer, that they may be paid by collectors or receivers that receive money in specie, but this cannot be. This provision is that they shall pay them into the exchequer when they have received them; they shall be paid by those receivers into the exchequer; the latter clause doth not extend to collectors or receivers but to any other subject, as suppose they are a fine for a lease to the king, they may pay it in exchequer bills, but receivers may not, for it is other persons; receivers and collectors are mentioned immediately before. This clause will not empower receivers and collectors to pay exchequer bills for money received on the king's duty, there is not a word in the act empowering receivers or collectors to pay exchequer bills into the exchequer when they did not receive them on the revenue.

Though the officers of the exchequer were not bound to receive exchequer bills, that will not indemnify him, if this payment was unlawful and made to procure advantage to himself, as it is apparent it was, for he got 300 odd pounds by it, as is sworn by D'Acosta, so that so much of the king's money he got by this method: this is paying it deceitfully; he should have acquainted them with the truth of the matter, that they were not paid into the excise, and then if they had taken them, it would have justified him.

For the proclamation, it is no longer than the act, it does not explain its nature; it must be subject to the same construction. As to the general practice of merchants and others, if that had been allowed by the treasury, it will not therefore follow that he should do it. If they would indulge those people thus that had money to pay for the benefit of the country, it may be indulged to them on this account, but that will not excuse him. We have proved the information as it is laid, and as for the contradiction between Mr. Peters and Mr. Duncombe's servant, it must be left to the jury. It was an unwarrantable payment and a deceit to the king. There was a contract made for exchanging exchequer bills upon any of the loans, but that is no help to him that makes it prejudicial to the king, for the king must pay them a consideration for exchanging them. It aggravates this offence that it was an advantage to himself and a prejudice to the king.

Mr. Solicitor. The defendants have said much that is not proper, and which, if there be a verdict against him, we shall hear of again at another time. The point now in dispute is, whether Mr. Duncombe be guilty of the information of causing 83 bills to be indorsed with the name of D'Acosta, and we have proved his causing those bills to be indorsed. We do not say with what design this was done, but we have proved that they were paid into the exchequer. They have a witness that says, that when they were paid in, the teller was told that some of them had not passed the revenue of the excise. After this was found out by the officer they would have had Mr. Duncombe take some of them again, but he would not. Though by the act of parliament a person may pay those bills into the exchequer upon his private account as a tenant or debtor to the king, yet when he pays them into the exchequer he ought to indorse his name on them. If the person pay them to the king as having received them on the revenue, he is not to indorse his name only to the delivery of the bill, but it ought to be indorsed with the name of the payer.—That is the act. It is plain the bills were not indorsed with the name of Duncombe, he did not pay them any otherwise than as cashier to the excise. If he paid them in as a private person, they ought to have been indorsed with his own name, and not with those of other persons. Here is the evidence of the fact, as well as the evidence of Mr. Peters, he did think they had been passed that revenue, had Mr. Duncombe intended to pay them on his own account he should have set his own name upon them; but doing the contrary, it is plain he paid them in as cashier. If Mr. Duncombe had been met with here in the hall, and had exchequer bills tendered him to be exchanged for money, he was not obliged to receive them, he was not an officer but a deputy of the commissioners of excise, and discharged taking any such bills in the name of the commissioners; nor were the commissioners bound to exchange such bills brought to them. As to the frequent practice of persons, that when bills were returned to be paid in milled money and gold, they paid them notwithstanding in exchequer bills; it was permitted because persons refused to do otherwise. It was the king's interest rather to make an abatement of 5 per cent. than to sue so many persons. Could not the king have given so much money to D'Acosta and got 300*l.* by it as well as Mr. Duncombe, why might not the king have done it himself? It is not to our purpose to say how much the king is damnified; if he be damaged, it is sufficient; the question is, if it be not a crime to design the damnifying of the king. They have adventured upon a point of law, we shall argue that afterwards.

Mr. Serj. Wright. It is admitted that Mr. Duncombe kept the cash of the excise; that he had his authority from the commissioners of the excise, and that on the 5th of May he received so many exchequer bills. The next thing is, he having this money in his hand was ordered to pay it, upon which he pays in exchequer bills to the value of 7,000 odd pounds. It is plain that D'Acosta was not the contriver of the false indorsements, and it is not denied, but Mr. Duncombe ordered D'Acosta to indorse them: When D'Acosta questioned it because of his own credit, Mr. Duncombe found him an expedient. We differ in this, that he being thus ordered to pay this money into the exchequer, he pays those bills, parcel of the money, as if he had received them in the excise. It is plain what we mean by indorsement.

They would excuse him thus; first, that he is not guilty, and secondly, if he did pay the said bills, that it is no offence; that he is guilty of the payment, is positively proved by Mr. Peters, so far as he is a good witness; and so Fern says there was an essay made upon him on the 8th of May, to have him receive them, but he having refused them, they went to another. Mr. Peters says they were brought to him as so much money paid into the excise. If Mr. Duncombe had acquainted him or had not acquainted him so, it is not material. What pretence had he to make a payment into the exchequer at that time, but in lieu of money that he had received in the excise? It is plain he paid them in as truly indorsed, when indeed they were falsely indorsed; this they do not contradict. Then as to the legality of the payment they insist upon; they insist, that by the letter of the act of parliament, they were made current, admitting them to be as general as they would have them, if they extend their own case. It is hoped the king's case will be as good as that of a private man; if a private man, Mr. Duncombe or any other, send his servant from the excise to the exchequer with 10,000*l.* in milled money, and by the way he meets a bargain of exchequer bills, and he gets 5*l.* per cent. to himself, and his master loses it, would any private man be so served; if any man send his servant to a goldsmith, to receive 1,000*l.* in new money or guineas, and he buys exchequer bills with the money his master trusts him to receive, and bring him paper for his money, would any master bear with this? There is no difference in this case, betwixt the king and a private man, only the act makes them current in payment to the king and not to other people. It is a breach of trust for any man having money of another man's in his hands, to buy exchequer bills and to pay them instead of money. Little money was current till described by act of parliament, suppose any man's servant had bought little money with his master's bills, instead of new money, it would have been an offence; this is the same case, for instead of 10,000*l.* in specie which carried an intrinsic value in it, he bought bills that had not the intrinsic value in them and paid them to the king. The act intended that all people indebted to the king for rent, taxes, customs, &c. might pay the king in that coin, but does not authorize servants to buy up other specie, and to pay the king in that; this was Duncombe's case, he kept the king's cash and diverted the money he received in specie, brought up exchequer bills at a discount, and paid them into the exchequer in fraud of the king, and therefore we hope Mr. Duncombe will be found guilty, if the fact be with us. That it is so there is no great reason to doubt; there can be no comparison betwixt Mr. Peters and Cook; for though Cook says, Mr. Duncombe delivered them with his own hand, and told him the difference of the bills, Mr. Peters positively denies it, and makes a far more considerable figure than Cook; the thing speaks so plainly of itself, the truth must be on Mr. Peters's side; It is plain he paid them in lieu of money received in the excise, which justifies the information to be literally true; it is plain he paid them in so, and we submit it to your lordship and the jury.

Mr. Serj. Darnel. A great deal of what the defendants have said has been improperly moved at this time; they ought to have reserved that to move in arrest of judgment: we hope we shall have a verdict against them, and then they will have a time for that purpose.

The Defendant's Counsel. We hope not.

Mr. Darnel. Your plea sets out and concludes, that the name is not falsely indorsed, though we prove it is, we do not charge you with the false indorsing of the day and the month, but with indorsing the name and no more. I would know what the meaning of a false indorsing of a man's name and by so many fictitious names is. It appears by all our witnesses that they took it to be indorsed as if it had been received from the excise.

Cook is falsified by one of the other two evidences in every particular, and one of them is another.

He swears Mr. Duncombe gave Mr. Peters the bills with his own hand; Mr. Peters utterly denies it, &c.; but that we must leave the jury to judge, whether Mr. Cook falsifies Mr. Peters, or if Mr. Peters falsifies Mr. Cook. The defendant's counsel justifies his receiving 10,000*l.* in money and paying it in exchequer bills, converting the money to his own use, because he comes after and pays bills after he hath associated with D'Acosta, what colour is there in the act of parliament to excuse them? not one word in any act, but when they are brought to the office on a branch of the revenue, but this will not extend to a receiver's purchasing bills and making use of the king's money to buy them. The first clause was answered by Mr. Attorney, it extends to the receivers of the aid in 1697.

They offer that it was beneficial to the king. It was for the king's advantage to stop the interest of the exchequer bills, but the exchequer bills cannot be sunk till they be paid in upon the fund from which they issued.

Mr. Congers. The information charges three things upon Mr. Duncombe, &c.

The first is not controverted, that he did pay fraudulently of this 10,000*l.* 7,884*l.* in exchequer bills; it was a gain to himself and a fraud upon the king: he gains 5*l.* per cent.; he pays but 95*l.* per cent. which was a prejudice to the king; for if this money had come into the exchequer in specie, those that had demands upon the exchequer might have paid specie money to answer their demands. They say the ceasing of interest is beneficial to the king, but here the king is to pay 10*l.* per cent. for exchequer bills instead of money that ought to have been paid into the exchequer, so that from 7*l.* per cent. there is a loss to the king of 10*l.* per cent. This was done at that time by one that was an officer, though not at the actual time of payment, yet he received the money when he was an officer, and next he paid those exchequer bills as if they had been reserved upon the excise, which we must leave to the judgment of your lordship and the jury upon our evidence. He brought them in three separate parcels. It is not said that some of them were actually paid into the excise as they say, but the officer actually receives and takes them as paid from the excise, and takes them particularly in his book; so that it is plain, he that took them at that time did think them paid in for excise; then as to the indorsements upon the bill that they were falsely indorsed, and done so by his directions, we have fully proved; there was no settlement at that time what rate they were to be paid at, they put first the name upon them, and afterwards what they thought proper, as D'Acosta gives evidence; So that it is plain it was a false indorsement and done by Mr. Duncombe's direction.

As to their plea from the act, fo. 384, it will not admit of any such construction as they put upon it, whatever is said of collectors and receivers it will not extend to any man that hath received the king's money to allow him to pay exchequer bills for it.

They say it hath been done by several others, but if so, it is a fault in them and no excuse to him. They are guilty perhaps, and so is he, they are all offenders upon one act of parliament.

Mr. Cooper. My lord, it is difficult to avoid petition, but I shall show your lordship's indulgence as little as I can. Had it been a parallel case to that of coin it would have given us light to see into the nature of this offence. But from the act read, those bills are not to be sold to supply the room of money in all cases, but at first with narrow limitations, and afterwards with limitations again; the first issued were issued upon sinking the fund, the capitation act, the land tax, 3s. aid, and to be sunk. The first original of those bills were to be received in no other aid or tax but that on which they were first issued.

Then this provision was further made, that receivers and collectors of those funds, if any of them had money in their hands rising from those aids and revenues, it is limited to them in the 1,500,000*l.* act, &c.

None of these so authorized to make such exchange; no other but those, that those provisions are made upon can make such exchange by the regulated clause of the act. What a ridiculous care it would have been in the parliament to keep the execution of the act in the hands of the lords of the treasury, if it was in the power of receivers, collectors, &c. to substitute another species in the room of money. To enforce Mr. Attorney's exposition, the 389th page of the 2d act in every paragraph makes a distinction, considering, &c.

The interest stops when paid unto any receiver, collector of the aid tax, &c.: shall that receiver and collector keep that in his pockets, and 1,000*l.* at the same time, and then clap these bills instead of money into the exchequer? This must be tolerable, if that which the gentlemen of the other side say be law, for the collectors in that case may keep the king's money, make use of it, and when the day comes, pay bills into the exchequer instead of the king's money.

Paying into the hands of the public receivers or collectors is the paying of it to the king, after the king's officer hath it in his hands, they will say, it is profit indeed to our client but no disadvantage to the public, but that will not altogether excuse it, the faster these bills came into the exchequer the faster they issued out in discharge of tallies, so that it was as much to the advantage of Mr. Duncombe as it was to the detriment of the public.

The question of fact between us is, if Mr. Duncombe bought these bills on a discount in order to make this payment, and if he ordered a false indorsement with feigned names, and if all their wit can suggest no other cause for these names, and if it appear that he sent his servants with those bills to discharge a charge upon him on the account of the excise, it must appear to be a fraud upon the public, suppose on the point of credit betwixt Mr. Peters and Mr. Cook, though it should be in the opinion of the jury against us, it will be no colour for them to acquit Mr. Duncombe.

Suppose Mr. Duncombe had brought them into the exchequer indorsed as paid into the excise, as it is plain he did, suppose he found himself disappointed at one place and then goes to another, will that excuse him? they speak as if the fraud were in Mr. Peters, as if it were so that Mr. Peters's fraud could sanctify this matter; though he had trusted Peters with the thing, as it looks like something of this: that the leaving out of the date and putting nothing but the name was a temptation to any clerk, of the exchequer.

L. C. J. That is not in your information.

Mr. Cooper. No, my lord, it is not, but supposing the privy of Mr. Peters, it would not justify Mr. Duncombe; they insist upon his not being an officer at the time of the payment, but as he was keeper of that cash and bound by articles for the performance of his trust till he made his last payment.

Mr. Montague. I shall only crave a word as to Peters's evidence; suppose what Mr. Cooper has said to be true, and supposing that what the other side says gain credit with the jury that Mr. Peters be guilty, and Mr. Duncombe not guilty in that point. If Mr. Peters took them from him as from Mr. Duncombe and not as cashier of the excise, and by him received upon the branch of the revenue. If D'Acosta had paid it to him as to Mr. Duncombe and not as cashier, and if Mr. Duncombe had paid it in as a private man he should have put his own name and not D'Acosta's to them. We charge him with having made the payments as from the excise, leave out Peters's testimony, we need it not for that, for it will plainly appear there was a discharge given to Mr. Duncombe, as if he had paid it as coming through the excise.

L. C. J. It was never the intent of the act of parliament that the king's cashier should keep the king's money to buy bills, and then pay them in as if he had received them on the revenue; the law does not allow receivers to convert the king's money to their own use and to pay it in paper, but that cannot be well and therefore you gentlemen who are counsel for the defendant, and have urged this as a lawful payment, we are all of opinion that the law is against you. Mr. Duncombe being the king's cashier, and having specie in his hand, and he to pay 7,800 odd pound in exchequer bills, whereof he hath converted the money to his own use; this is a crime, but whether he be guilty of it or not, we must leave it to the jury.

The information is, that being possessed of 10,000*l.* of the king's money, that he paid exchequer bills into the exchequer for it; that is the question, if Mr. Duncombe be guilty of this crime as laid in the information.

Serj. Darnel. With submission, my lord, that is not the question.

L. C. J. It is; I have read the brief.

Judge Rookshy. There is no evidence of any bills when the matter was so indorsed on these bills.

L. C. J. He paid them in as if received by him into the excise, that is the point.

Mr. Montague. He paid them in as parcel of that sum.

L. C. J. It is said he paid them as tidia.

Mr. Montague. Suppose that he left out,

Judge Turtan. The indorsement goes only to the name.

Judge Roebuck. As to the matter of law, if it appear that there is an offence within this information, by that he is not only complained of as a subject injurious to his sovereign but as a servant injurious to his master. He was intrusted with the king's money, and when he received it, defrauded his master and paid it in, that that is less than the intrinsic value, for what he paid to the king for 100*l.* was but 95*l.*

L. C. J. That is true, but is that in the information?

Another Judge. That general clause cannot extend to Mr. Duncombe, for if it could be so, he might have as well paid the money 14 months after as when he did, he might have kept the money and alledged the act, but that he did not.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, the charge against Mr. Duncombe is for fraud and deceit against the king. It supposes that he was cashier of the excise, and as such received a great sum, being possessed to the value of 80,000*l.* in milled money. He dealt with D'Acosta for exchequer bills, for 7,000 and odd pounds, those he bought from Mr. D'Acosta at 5*l.* per cent. discount: this appears upon evidence, &c. as in the information, and he is charged with paying in those bills into the exchequer, as being truly indorsed, and as if he had received them upon that branch of the revenue. The question is, if he be guilty in such a manner as he is charged. The preliminaries to it are proved, as that he was cashier to the excise of the 4th and 5th of May, 1697, and that he was turned out on the 7th, and that he had this money in his hand is plainly proved.

That he did contract with D'Acosta is proved by D'Acosta himself. It seems that D'Acosta had contracted with the commissioners of the treasury for paying money beyond sea for the king, and was to have the value of his bills in exchequer bills. This contract was made some time before, and he had allowance accordingly, because it was to depend upon the credit of an act of parliament. He says, he did give for those bills, bills of exchange, and having occasion for money, he came to Mr. Duncombe to know if he would buy any, afterwards he dealt with him, and let Mr. Duncombe have those bills on the 12th of May, Mr. Duncombe agreeing with him for money at the discount of 1*l.* per cent. and odd money. Then Mr. Duncombe desired him to set his hand upon the back of the bill, which he did; but beginning to reflect upon himself that he should forfeit his credit with the lords of the treasury to discount so many bills in so little time, he was unwilling to set his hand any further, upon which Mr. Duncombe bid him set any name, he did so, and Mr. Duncombe had the bills, and he his money.

Those bills were afterwards brought to Mr.

Peters, a teller in the office, and were received by him for 7,000 and odd pounds; but before they came thither, a servant of Mr. Duncombe's comes to him, says Ferp, and discourses him on Mr. Duncombe's account about paying in those exchequer bills, and asked Ferp if he would receive them, he says so, he could not think they had circulated through the excise in so short a time, and therefore he could not receive them, Mr. Duncombe's servant said they had not been paid into the excise, this was four days before they were paid into Mr. Peters, and supposed to have been attempted by way of preparation for what was done after.

On the 12th of May, the exchange was made betwixt Mr. Duncombe and Mr. D'Acosta. Mr. Peters says, that Mr. Duncombe's servant came into his office with those bills, and gave him all the particulars they were received for. Mr. Peters gave them to his servant to look over, and he looked all of them over, he says they were not indorsed with the day of the month but only with a name, so says D'Acosta, he took it for granted they had been paid into the excise, and thereupon charges himself with the receipt of so much money, struck a tally, and discharged Mr. Duncombe; after this it was discovered, that those bills were not paid into the excise as they seemed to be, truly says he it will be damage to me, I shall be a sufferer, and therefore desires Mr. Duncombe to take them again. No, says Mr. Duncombe, I am not obliged so to do. I have got a tally for my discharge, and will be concerned no further. Peters says it is a damage to him of 250*l.* he hath told you they were in three parcels, some of the exchequer bills he found regularly indorsed as paid actually into the excise, and they were put up into a chest with a cover over them, indorsed exchequer bills upon the excise. They found an omission of the day when they were paid in, and indorsed several of them, and supplied that omission. This is the substance of the evidence to induce you to believe Mr. Duncombe guilty. First, say they, here was a fraud in Mr. Duncombe to convert the king's money to his own use and to pay exchequer bills in lieu of money. Then there was an attempt made before on the clerk of the office where Mr. Duncombe's servant comes and tries if he would be put upon, this was before the agreement with D'Acosta, but in respect as you are to suppose. But of the truth of what you must judge, and then he comes to Peters who supposed them to be received in the excise, and accordingly Mr. Duncombe was discharged of so much money as paid out of the excise.

The defendants say Mr. Duncombe hath not done an ill thing in point of law, taking it to be true, that Mr. Duncombe paid those bills as so much money paid into the excise they say he might have paid it in bills received on any other account. If so, he that hath the king's money instead of the individual money pay exchequer bills. This is affected to be law, but all the court is of another opinion. We think it had been more reasonable for them to have thought that the law would never allow the king's receiver to go away with the king's money and convert it to their own use, but when those collectors have received these bills and pay them as money, then they took them for money and it is but reasonable they should be allowed to pay them to the king as money, but the contrary was never the meaning of any act of parliament; therefore we are to expunge all that part of the defence out of the case, and must say that such a payment cannot be just in law.

The offence laid in the information is, that he paid in so many exchequer bills as if they had been paid into the excise. They say Mr. Peters is mistaken, all those bills brought by Mr. Duncombe's man were not on that account. Cook swears he brought the bills, and that Mr. Duncombe was by when he brought in three parcels, and he gave Mr. Peters a particular account what those bills were, he says that for 1,300 and odd pounds they were indorsed as paid into the excise, and he gave an account to Peters that those bills were actually received into the excise, and that there was no question about the other amounting 7,800*l.* paid as part of the 10,000*l.* Cook is positive as to this, he was by Mr. Duncombe at the time, if so there is a great alteration in the case, though it was a fault in Mr. Duncombe, to convert so much money to his own use, yet it is not the fault laid in the information.

Further, if the evidence Cook swears true, the bills being in several parcels, if Mr. Duncombe had a mind to pay them into the exchequer as they had been paid into the excise, why in different parcels? here is a plain distinction in this circumstance they insist upon to falsify the evidence of Peters.

Here again there are two other of Mr. Duncombe's men called, Mr. Peters says it must be one of them that brought him the bills, but they both swear that they never paid any exchequer bills, they don't remember they were at Peters's office. Peters says, he did see Mr. Duncombe at that time, but that he saw him afterwards in the hall but not at that time, this is a plain contradiction to the evidence. We must leave it to you gentlemen of the jury, upon the whole matter, whether you be satisfied that Mr. Duncombe is guilty of the crime or not as laid in the information. If he paid those bills into the exchequer, as if they had been first paid into the revenue of the excise for so much money. If you be satisfied he did, you must bring him in guilty, but if you be satisfied that he distinguished between the bills and told Mr. Peters what bills they were, you are to bring him in not guilty.

The Jury did immediately, without going from the bar, bring him in Not Guilty.*

405. The Trial of SPENCER COWPER,* esq. ELLIS STEPHENS, WILLIAM ROGERS, and JOHN MARSON, at Hertford Assizes, for the Murder of Mrs. Sarah Stout: 11 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1699.

July 16, 1699.

Proclamation was made for all persons concerned to attend.

CLERK. YOU good men that are empannelled to enquire, do answer to your names, and save your lives. Then Ellis Stephens, William Rogers, and John Marson, being upon the proclamation was made for them to attend, which they accordingly did; and Mr. Cowper was brought into court by the under sheriff.

CLERK. Spencer Cowper, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) John Marson, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Ellis Stephens, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) William Rogers, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.)

CLERK. YOU stand indicted by the names of Spencer Cowper, late of the parish of St. John's in the town of Hertford, in the county of Hertford, esq. John Marson, late of the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, gent. Ellis Stephens, late of the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, gent. and William Rogers, late of the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, gent. for that you not having the fear of God before your eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, on the 13th day of March, in the 11th year of the reign of his present majesty, by force and arms, &c. at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, in and upon one Sarah Stout, spinster, in the peace of God and our sovereign lord the king, then and there being, violently, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that you the aforesaid Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and William Rogers, a certain rope of no value, about the neck of the said Sarah then and there feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice aforethought, did put, place, fix and bind; and the neck and throat of the said Sarah, then and there with the hands of you the said Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and William Rogers, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice afore-thought, did hold, squeeze, and gripe; and that you the said Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and William Rogers, with the aforesaid rope, by you the said Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and William Rogers, then as aforesaid about the neck of the said Sarah Stout put, placed, fixed, and bound, and by the squeezing and gripping of the neck and throat of the said Sarah with the hands of you the said Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and William Rogers, as aforesaid, the said Sarah Stout then and there, by force and arms, &c. feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice afore-thought, did choke and strangle; by reason of which choking and strangling of her the said Sarah Stout, by you the aforesaid Spencer Cowper, J. Marson, Ellis Stephens, and W. Rogers, with the said rope about the neck of the said Sarah Stout as aforesaid, placed, fixed and bound, and by the squeezing and gripping of the neck and throat of the said Sarah with the hands of you the said Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens and William Rogers, as aforesaid, the said Sarah then and there instantly died. And so you the said Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens and William Rogers, the said Sarah Stout, on the 13th day of March, in the year aforesaid, in the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice afore-thought, did kill and murder; and the said Sarah Stout, as aforesaid, by you the said Spencer Cowper, John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and William Rogers, feloniously, voluntarily, and out of your malice afore-thought, choked and strangled; into a certain river there, being called the Priory River, then secretly and maliciously did put and cast, to conceal and hide the said Sarah Stout so murdered, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, &c.

How sayest thou, Spencer Cowper, art thou guilty of the felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Mr. Cowper. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Arr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Mr. Cowper. By God and my country.

Cl. of Arr. God send you a good deliverance.

[Then the other three pleaded Not Guilty, and put themselves upon their country in manner aforesaid.]

Then Proclamation was made for information.

Cl. of Arr. You the prisoner at the bar, these men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your several lives and deaths; therefore if you will challenge them, or any of them, your time to speak is as they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn.

(Then the pannel was called over.)

Cl. of Arr. Do you design to join in your challenges, or to challenge separately?

Mr. Cowper. If we should challenge separately, there must be so many separate trials; and therefore to prevent the trouble of the court, I am willing there should be but one challenge for all.

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen, do you all agree to that?—Prisoners. Yes, yes.

(Then after some challenges, as well on the part of the king as of the prisoners, there not being a full jury of the principal pannel:)

Mr. Cowper. If your lordship please, the pannel is now gone through, I desire they may shew some legal cause for their challenges.

Mr. Jones. I conceive we that are retained for the king are not bound to shew any cause, or the cause is sufficient, if we say they are not good for the king, and that is allowed to be a good cause of challenge; for what other cause can we shew in this case? You are not to shew your cause, you challenge peremptorily; so in this case the king does.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I stand at the bar with some disadvantage, to encounter a gentleman, that hath no concernment; but however, I do take it for law, that there must be a cause shewed, and that cause must be a legal one, and what that cause is they must certainly make out. I do think it ought to appear that there is some relation, or some notorious affection or friendship, or something of that sort; or otherwise it is not a legal cause of challenge; and if there seem to be any difficulty in this particular, I hope your lordship will assign me counsel to argue it with the king's counsel.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, you are not under such disadvantage as men usually are that stand where you now do. You have been educated in the study of the law, and understand it very well. I have several times seen how you have managed your clients causes to their advantage. As for this matter of challenge, Mr. Jones, I think, you should shew your cause of challenge,* though the law allows the prisoner liberty to challenge twenty peremptorily.

Mr. Jones. I do not know, in all my practice of this nature, that it was ever put upon the king to shew cause; and I believe some of the king's counsel will say they have not known it done.

Mr. Cowper. In my lord chief justice Hales's Pleas of the Crown, p. 259, it is expressly so; and in the statute of 33 Edw. 1. it is said, the king shall not challenge without cause, and that must be legal.

Cl. of Arr. Call Daniel Clarke.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Jones, if you can say,

* See the Case of Peter Cook, in the present volume, p. 311.

any Jurymen hath said any thing concerning this cause, and given his verdict by way of dis-course, or showed his affection one way or other, that would be good cause of challenge.

Mr. Jones. My lord, then we should keep you here while to-morrow morning.

Baron Hatsell. If there hath been any great friendship between any jurymen and the party, it will look ill if he be insisted upon.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I do not insist upon it, but I profess I know of no friendship, only that Mr. Clarke in elections hath taken our interest in town; I know I have a just cause, and I am ready to be tried before your lordship and any fair jury of the county; therefore I do not insist upon it.

Then the Jury sworn was as followeth:

Evan Lloyd, William Watson, John Prior, John Harrow, George Holgate, John Stracey, Thomas Pariot, Sam. Wallingham, Francis Cole, Rich. Crouch, John Cock, Richard Dickinson.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I humbly move that I may have pen, ink and paper.

Baron Hatsell. Ay, by all means.

Cl. of Arr. Hold up your hand. (Which he did.) And so of the rest. You of the jury, look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their charge. They stand indicted by the names of, &c. (Prout in the indictment, mutatis mutandis.)

Jury. My lord, we desire we may have pen, ink and paper.

Cl. of the Assize. There are three of the jury desire pen, ink and paper.

Baron Hatsell. Let as many have it as will.

Mr. Jones. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen that are sworn, I am of counsel for the king in this cause, and it is upon an indictment by which the gentlemen at the bar stand accused for 'one of the foulest and most wicked crimes almost that any age can remember: I believe in your county you never knew a fact of this nature; for here is a young gentlewoman of this county strangled and murdered in the night time. The thing was done in the dark, therefore the evidence cannot be so plain as otherwise might be.

After she was strangled and murdered, she was carried down into a river to stifle the fact, and to make it supposed she had murdered herself: so that it was indeed, if it prove otherwise, a double murder, a murder accompanied with all the circumstances of wickedness and villainy that I remember in all my practice, or ever read of.

This fact, as it was committed in the night time, so it was carried very secret, and it is very well we have had so much light as we have to give so much satisfaction; for we have here, in a manner, two trials; one to acquit the party that is dead, and to satisfy the world, and vindicate her reputation, that she did not murder herself, but was murdered by other hands. For my part, I shall never, as counsel in the case of blood, aggravate; I will not improve or enlarge the evidence at all; it shall be only my business to set the fact as it is, and to give the evidence, and state it as it stands here in my instructions.

My lord, for that purpose, to lead to the fact, it will be necessary to inform you, that upon Monday the 13th of March, the first day of the last assizes here, Mr. Cowper, one of the gentlemen at the bar, came to this town, and lighted at Mr. Barefoote's house, and staid there some time, I suppose to dry himself, the weather being dirty, but sent his horse to Mrs. Stout's, the mother of this gentlewoman. Some time after he came thither himself, and dined there, and staid till four in the afternoon; and at four, when he went away, he told them he would come and lodge there that night, and sup.

According to his word he came there, and had the supper he desired; after supper Mrs. Stout, the young gentlewoman, and he sat together till near eleven o'clock. At eleven o'clock there was orders given to warm his bed, openly to warm his bed, in his hearing. The maid of the house, gentlemen, upon this went up stairs to warm his bed, expecting the gentleman would have come up and followed her before she had done; but it seems, while she was warming his bed, she heard the door clap together; and the nature of that door is such, that it makes a great noise at the clapping of it to, that any body in the house may be sensible of any one's going out. The maid upon this was concerned, and wondered at the meaning of it, he promising to lie there that night; she came down, but there was neither Mr. Cowper nor Mrs. Stout; so that we suppose, and for all that we can find and learn, they must go out together. After their going out, the maid and mother came into the room; and the young gentlewoman not returning, nor Mr. Cowper, they sat up all night in the house, expecting what time the young gentlewoman would return. The next morning, after they had sat up all night, the first news of this lady was, that she lay floating and swimming in water by the mill dam. Upon that there was several persons called; for it was a surprize how this should come to pass. There she lay floating with her petticoats and apron, but her night rail and morning gown were off, and one of them not found till some time after; and the maid will give you an account how it came to be found.

This made a great noise in the country; for it was very extraordinary, it happening that from the time the maid left Mr. Cowper and this young gentlewoman together, she was not seen or heard of till next morning, when she was found in this condition, with her eyes broad open, floating upon the water.

When her body came to be viewed, it was very much wondered at; for in the first place, it is contrary to nature, that any persons that drown themselves should float upon the water. We have sufficient evidence, that it is that never was ; if persons come alive into the water, then they sink ; if dead, then they swim ; that made some more curious to look into this matter. At first, it was thought that such an accident might happen, though they could not imagine any cause for this woman to do so, who had so great prosperity, had so good an estate, and had no occasion to do an action upon herself so wicked and so barbarous ; nor cannot learn what reason she had to induce her to such a thing. Upon view of the body, it did appear there had been violence used to the woman ; there was a crease round her neck, she was bruised about her ear ; so that it did seem as if she had been strangled either by hands or a rope.

Gentlemen, upon the examination of this matter, it was wondered how this matter came about, it was dark and blind. The coroner at that time, nor these people, had no evidence given, but the ordinary evidence, and it passed in a day. We must call our witnesses to this fact, that of necessity you must conclude she was strangled, and did not drown herself. If we give you as strong a proof as can be upon the nature of the fact, that she was strangled, then the second matter under that enquiry will be, to know who, or what persons should be the men that did the fact. I told you before, it was, as all wicked actions are, a matter of darkness, and done in secret, to be kept as much from the knowledge of men as was possible.

Truly, gentlemen, as to the persons at the bar, the evidence of the fact will be very short, and will be to this purpose.

Mr. Cowper was the last man unfortunately in her company ; I could wish he had not been so with all my heart ; it is a very unfortunate thing, that his name should upon this occasion be brought upon the stage ; but then, my lord, it was a strange thing, here happens to be three gentlemen, Mr. Marson, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Stephens. As to these three men, my lord, I do not hear of any business they had here, unless it was to do this matter, to serve some interest or friend that sent them upon this message ; for, my lord, they came to town, (and in things of this nature it is well we have this evidence ; but if we had not been straightened in time, it would have brought out more ; these things come out slowly) these persons, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Marson, came to town here on the thirteenth of March last, the assize day. My lord, when they came to town, they came to an house, and took lodgings at one Gurrey's ; they took a bed for two, and went out of their lodging, having taken a room with a large bed in it ; and afterwards they went to the Glove and Dolphin, and then about 8 a'clock one Marson came to them there ; in what company they came, your lordship and the jury will know by and by ; they staid there, my lord, at the Glove from 8 to 11, as they say. At 11 these three gentlemen came all into their lodging together to this Gurrey's. My lord, when they came in, it was very observable amongst them, unless there had been a sort of fate in it, first, That they should happen to be in the condition they were in ; and, secondly, fall upon the discourse they did at that time ; for, my lord, they called for fire, and the fire was made them ; and while the people of the house were going about, they observed and heard these gentlemen talk of Mrs. Sarah Stout ; that happened to be their discourse ; one said to the other, Marson, she was an old sweetheart of yours ; Ay, saith he, but she cast me off, but I reckon by this time a friend of mine has done her business. Another piece of discourse was, I believe a friend of mine is even with her by this time. They had a bundle of linen with them, but what it was is not known, and one takes the bundle and throws it upon the bed ; Well, saith he, her business is done, Mrs. Sarah Stout's courting days are over ; and they sent for wine, my lord ; so after they had drank of the wine they talked of it, and one pulled out a great deal of money ; saith one to another, what money have you spent to day ? Saith the other, thou hast had 40 or 50*l.* for thy share : Saith the other, I will spend all the money I have, for joy the business is done.

My lord, this discourse happened to be among them ; which made people of the house consider and bethink themselves ; when the next day they heard of this Mrs. Stout's being found in the water, this made them recollect and call to mind all these discourses.

My lord, after these gentlemen had staid there all night, next morning, truly, it was observed (and I suppose some account will be given of it) that Mr. Cowper and they did meet together, and had several discourses, and that very day went out of town ; and I think as soon as they came to Hoddesden, made it all their discourse and business to talk of Mrs. Stout. My lord, we will call our witnesses, and prove all these facts that I have opened to your lordship, and then I hope they will be put to give you some account how all these matters came about.

Call Sarah Walker (who was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Mrs. Walker, pray give an account to my lord and the jury, of Mr. Cowper's coming to your house the 15th of March, and what was done from his coming there at night to his going out ?

Walker. May it please you, my lord, on Friday before the last assizes, Mr. Cowper's wife sent a letter to Mrs. Stout, that she might expect Mr. Cowper at the assize time ; and therefore we expected Mr. Cowper at that time, and accordingly provided ; and as he came in with the judges, she asked him if he would alight ? He said no ; by reason I come in later than usual, I will go into the town and show myself, but he would send his horse presently. She asked him, how long it would be before he would come, because they would stay for him ? He said, he could not tell, but he should send her word ; and she thought he had forgot, and sent me down to know whether he would please to come? He said, he had business, and he could not come just then; but he came in less than a quarter of an hour after, and dined there; and he went away at four a'clock: and then my mistress asked him, if he would lie there? And he answered yes, and he came at night about 9; and he sat talking about half an hour, and then called for pen, ink and paper, for that, as he said, he was to write to his wife; which was brought him, and he wrote a letter; and then my mistress went and asked him, what he would have for supper? He said milk, by reason he had made a good dinner; and I got him his supper, and he eat it; after she called me in again, and they were talking together, and then she bid me make a fire in his chamber; and when I had done so, I came and told him of it, and he looked at me, and made me no answer: then she bid me warm the bed, which accordingly I went up to do as the clock struck eleven, and in about a quarter of an hour, I heard the door shut, and I thought he was gone to carry the letter, and staid about a quarter of an hour longer, and came down, and he was gone and she; and Mrs. Stout the mother asked me the reason why he went out when I was warming his bed? And she asked me for my mistress, and I told her I left her with Mr. Cowper, and I never saw her after that, nor did Mr. Cowper return to the house.

Mr. Jones. How long did you sit up?

Walker. All night.

Mr. Jones. What time next morning did you see her?—Walker. About seven a'clock.

Mr. Jones. In the water, or out?

Walker. Out of the water.

Mr. Cowper. Pray will you recollect a little, and be very particular as to the time when I went out at night?

Walker. Sir, it was a quarter after eleven by our clock; the difference between the town clock and ours was half an hour.

Mr. Cowper. But you say by your clock it was a quarter after eleven?—Walker. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, what account did you give as to the time to the coroner's inquest?

Walker. I said then it was eleven, or a quarter after eleven, when I heard the door shut.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, was Mrs. Stout present with the coroner's inquest when you gave that account?—Walker. Yes, she was.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, what account did you give as to the time before my lord chief justice Holt?

Walker. I gave the account that it was eleven, or a quarter of an hour after.

Mr. Cowper. In her depositions there is half an hour's difference; for then she said it was half an hour after ten.

Baron Hottel. Which clock was earliest, yours or the town clock?

Walker. Ours was half an hour faster than theirs.

Mr. Cowper. How came you to know this?

Walker. By reason that dinner was dressed at the cook's, and it was ordered to be ready by two a'clock, and it was ready at two by the town clock, and half an hour after two by ours.

Mr. Cowper. When you came down and missed your mistress, did you enquire after her all that night?

Walker. No, Sir, I did not go out of the doors; I thought you were with her, and so I thought she would come to no harm.

Mr. Cowper. Here is a whole night she gives no account of. Pray, mistress, why did not you go after her?

Walker. My mistress would not let me.

Mr. Cowper. Why would she not let you?

Walker. I said I would see for her: No, saith she, by reason if you go and see for her, and do not find her, it will make an alarm over the town, and there may be no occasion.

Mr. Cowper. Did your mistress use to stay out all night?—Walker. No, never.

Mr. Cowper. Have not you said so?

Walker. I never said so in my life.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, Mrs. Walker, did you never take notice that your mistress was indeed melancholy?

Walker. I do not say but she was melancholy; she was ill for some time; and I imputed it to her illness, and I know no other cause.

Mr. Cowper. Have you not often told people that your mistress was a melancholy person, upon your oath?

Walker. I have said she hath been ill, and that made her melancholy.

Mr. Cowper. I will ask you this question; pray, did you ever purchase any poison more or less, within these twelve months?

Walker. Yes, Sir, I did so, and can tell what it was for.

Mr. Cowper. By whose order?

Walker. By my own order.

Mr. Cowper. Did you buy poison but once, upon your oath?

Walker. I believe I might buy twice.

Mr. Cowper. Where?

Walker. Of Mr. Lüdmán.

Mr. Cowper. Both times there?

Walker. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. Of him?

Walker. No, of the young man.

Mr. Cowper. Did you ever buy any poison at Luton?—Walker. No.

Mr. Cowper. Did you ever buy any by your mistress's order, or of one Mrs. Crooke, upon your oath?—Walker. No, I never did.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, at what time was it that you bought this poison you speak of?

Walker. I cannot remember.

Mr. Cowper. Pray recollect yourself.

Walker. It was within this half year, to be sure.

Mr. Cowper. What was the name of the poison you asked for?

Walker. I asked for white mercury.

Mr. Cowper. She saith, I passed by her mistress's house, and went directly to Mr. Barefoot's; pray, did not you come to Mr. Barefoot's after me?—Walker. Yes, sir.

Mr. Cowper. Pray did you give the same account before the coroner, when this matter was enquired into, that you have now done?

Walker. Yes, I did as near as I can tell.

Mr. Cowper. Did you give this account in substance?

Walker. Yes, I did.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, I suppose you do not mean in relation to the poison.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I mean in relation to so much of the evidence which she now gives, and particularly respects me. For what end or purpose did you buy it?

Walker. I bought it to poison a dog.

Mr. Cowper. Why should you poison the dog?

Walker. It was a dog that used to haunt our house, that did us a great deal of mischief; but that did not do, so I bought it a second time.

Mr. Cowper. Who gave it to the dog?

Walker. It was another maid did give it the dog.

Mr. Cowper. Why did you then swear it was given the dog?

Walker. Sir, I saw it given.

Mr. Cowper. Did your mistress know of it?

Walker. Yes, she did know of it afterwards.

Mr. Cowper. How did you give it?

Walker. In warm milk.

Mr. Cowper. How did the milk look?

Walker. It did not look discoloured in the least.

Baron Hatsell. You said just now your mistress was ill, and that made her melancholy; what illness was it?

Walker. My lord, she had a great pain in her head.

Baron Hatsell. How long had she been troubled with it?

Walker. Ever since last May was twelve months was the beginning of it.

Mr. Jones. Did you ever find her in the least inclined to do herself a mischief?

Walker. No, I never did.

Mr. Cowper. You bought poison twice, did you give all the poison you bought to the dog?

Walker. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. The first and the last?

Walker. Yes, the whole.

Mr. Cowper. How much did you buy?

Walker. I am not certain how much I bought.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, what mischief did it do the dog?

Walker. I cannot tell, he may be alive till now for aught I know.

Mr. Cowper. What mischief did the dog do?

Walker. A great deal, he threw down several things and broke them.

Mr. Jones. Did Mr. Cowper, upon your oath, hear Mistress Stout give you order to make his fire, and warm his bed?

Walker. He knows best, whether he heard it or no; but he sat by her when she spake it.

Mr. Jones. Did she speak of it so as he might hear?

Walker. Yes, she did; for he was nearer than I.

Mr. Jones. And did not he contradict it?

Walker. Not in the least.

Mr. Jones. Was it the old or young woman that gave you the order?

Walker. The young woman.

Mr. Cowper. Pray did the dog lap it, or did you put it down his throat, upon your oath?

Walker. No, he lapt it, upon my oath.

Mr. Jones. Did Mr. Cowper send for his horse from your house the next day?

Walker. I cannot say that; I was not in the way.

Mr. Jones. Did he come to your house afterwards?

Walker. No, I am sure he did not.

Mr. Jones. Was the horse in your stable when it was sent for?—Walker. Yes, sir.

Mr. Jones. And he did not come to your House again, before he went out of town?

Walker. No, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Do you know which way he went out of town?—Walker. No, Sir.

Baron Hatsell. Did Mr. Cowper use to lodge at your house at the assizes?

Walker. No, my lord, not since I came there; the sessions before he did.

Mr. Cowper. Where did you come to invite me to dinner?

Walker. At Mr. Barefoot's.

Mr. Cowper. Then you knew I was to lodge there?

Baron Hatsell. Who wrote the letter on Friday, that Mr. Cowper would lodge there?

Walker. I know not who wrote it, his wife sent it.

Mr. Jones. Did he tell you he would lodge there that night before he went away?

Walker. When he went from dinner he said so.

Mr. Jones. Call James Berry. (Who was sworn.) Now, my lord, we will give evidence of the manner how she was found. Mr. Berry, Do you remember when Mrs. Stout was found by your mill?

Berry. No, indeed, I do not know just what day it was.

Mr. Jones. When you found her, do you remember, how, in what manner she was found?

Berry. Yes; I went out in the morning to shoot a flush of water by six o'clock, and I saw something a floating in the water, so I went out to see what it was, and I saw part of her cloaths.

Mr. Jones. Did you see her face?

Berry. No, not then.

Mr. Jones. Was her face under water, or above?

Berry. No part of her body was above water, only some part of her cloaths.

Mr. Jones. How many foot deep might the water be?—Berry. Five foot deep.

Mr. Jones. And how much was she under water, do you conceive?

Berry. She might be under water about five or six inches.

Mr. Jones. Then the whole body was not under water, was it?—Berry. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Was her face under water?

Berry. Yes.

Baron Hatsell. Did she lie upon her face, or her back?

Berry. She lay upon her side.

Mr. Jones. When she was taken out, were her eyes open or shut?

Berry. Her eyes were open.

Mr. Jones. Was she swelled with water?

Berry. I did not perceive her swelled: I was amazed at it, and did not so much mind it as I should.

Mr. Jones. But you remember her eyes were staring open?—Berry. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Did you see any marks or bruises about her?—Berry. No.

Mr. Cowper. Did you see her legs?

Berry. No, I did not.

Mr. Cowper. They were not above water?

Berry. No.

Mr. Cowper. Could you see them under water?—Berry. I did not so much mind it.

Mr. Cowper. Did she lie straight or double, driven together by the stream?

Berry. I did not observe.

Mr. Cowper. Did you not observe the weeds and trunperry under her?

Berry. There was no weeds at that time thereabouts.

Mr. Jones. Was the water clear?

Berry. No, it was thick water.

Mr. Jones. Was there any thing under her, in the water, to prevent her sinking?

Berry. No, I do not know there was; she lay on her right side, and her right arm was driven between the stakes, which are within a foot of one another.

Mr. Jones. Did any thing hinder her from sinking?—Berry. Not that I saw.

Mr. Jones. Did you help to take her out from the stakes?—Berry. No.

Mr. Jones. Call John Venables.

Mr. Cowper. Mr. Berry, if I understand you right, you say, her right arm was driven between the stakes, and her head between the stakes; could you perceive her right arm, and where was her left arm?

Berry. Within a small matter upon the water.

Baron Hatsell. Did you see her head and arm between the stakes?

Berry. Yes, her arm by one stake, and her head by another.

Mr. Jones. Did her arm hang down, or how?

Berry. I did not mind so much as I might have done.

[Then John Venables was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. Did you see Mrs. Stout, when she was taken out of the water, as she lay in it?

Venables. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Give an account how you found her.

Venables. She was floating upon the water.

Mr. Jones. How? was all her body, or what part in the water?

Venables. She lay upon her right side, and this arm upon the water, rather above the water, her ruffles were upon the water.

Mr. Jones. Did you help to take her out?

Venables. No, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Were her eyes open then?

Venables. Her eyes were open when I saw her, but I did not see her when she was taken out.

Mr. Jones. Did any thing hinder her from sinking?

Venables. I saw nothing to hinder her if she would have sunk.

Mr. Jones. Call Leonard Dell. (Who was sworn.) Did you see this Mrs. Stout in the water?—Dell. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Pray, tell us in what posture she was found?

Dell. I saw her floating in the river; I saw her face and her cloaths:

Mr. Jones. Were her cloaths all above the water?

Dell. Her stays and her coat that she had next her.

Mr. Jones. Were these plainly above the water?—Dell. Some part of them.

Mr. Jones. Did you see her face, was that above the water?

Dell. No, Sir, it was between the piles; she lay on her right side, and her head was between the stakes, and her right arm.

Mr. Jones. Did you help to take her out of the water?—Dell. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Did any thing hinder her from sinking?

Dell. Neither stakes, nor any thing there.

Mr. Jones. Did her arms or neck stick to the stakes?

Dell. Not to my thinking.

Mr. Jones. Was the water clear, or weedy?

Dell. It was very clear.

Mr. Jones. How many foot deep was it?

Dell. I know not but it might be five foot deep.

Mr. Jones. Did you help to take her out of the water?

Dell. Yes, Sir, and we took her and carried her into the meadow just by, and laid her on the bank.

Mr. Jones. Did you observe her face, neck, or arms, to be bruised?

Dell. I saw no bruise at all.

Mr. Cowper. How did you know but her right arm did reach to the ground, since you did not see it?

Dell. We could see her arm lie in this manner between the piles, the right arm was downwards, for she lay on one side.

Juryman. Did you see any arm above in the water?—Dell. No.

Baron Hatsell. You should propose your questions to the court.

Juryman. My lord, I desire to know where was her left arm?

Baron Hatsell. Where was her left arm?

Dell. I cannot tell how it did lie; I did not observe it.

Baron Hatsell. When you took her out of the water, did you observe her body swelled?

Dell. We carried her into the meadow, and laid her on the bank-side, and there she lay about an hour, and then was ordered to be carried into the miller's.

Baron Hatsell. Did you observe that any water was in her body?

Dell. None at all that I could see; but there was some small matter of froth came from her mouth and nostrils.

Juryman. My lord, I desire to know whether her stays were laced?

Dell. Yes, she was laced.

Mr. Cowper. If I take you right, you say she was strait-laced?

Dell. Her stays were laced.

Mr. Cowper. And you say there was froth and foam came out of her mouth and nostrils?

Dell. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Pray what quantity?

Dell. I could hold it all in the palm of my hand.

Mr. Cowper. How was she taken out of the water?

Dell. My lord, we stood upon the bridge, I and another man, where she lay, and he laid hold of her and took her out.

Mr. Jones. And did you not perceive she was hung?—Dell. No, my lord.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, where was she laid when she was taken out?

Dell. In the place called the Hoppers, just by.

Mr. Cowper. How long did she lie there?

Dell. About an hour.

Mr. Cowper. Did you stay there all that time?—Dell. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. And did the froth continue to issue from her mouth and nostrils?

Baron Hatsell. He told you, Mr. Cowper, he could hold it all in the palm of his hand.

Mr. Jones. Call John Uffe. (Who was sworn.) John Uffe, did you see Mrs. Stout when she was taken out of the water?

Uffe. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Give an account of the condition she was in.

Uffe. She lay on one side; I helped to take her out.

Mr. Jones. Did she hang or stick to any thing?

Uffe. There was nothing at all to hold her up; she lay between a couple of stakes, but the stakes could not hold her up.

Mr. Jones. Did you see her after she was taken out?—Uffe. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Did any water come out of her?

Uffe. Nothing at all, only a little froth came out of her nostrils.

Mr. Jones. Call Katherine Dew. (Who was sworn.) Did you see Mrs. Stout taken out of the river?—Dew. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Did you see her in the river before?—Dew. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. How did she lie in the river?

Dew. She lay side-way with her eyes open, and her teeth clenched in her head, with water flowing a little from her face, some part of her and her petticoats were above water.

Mr. Jones. Did nothing hold her from sinking?

Dew. Her right arm lay against the stake.

Mr. Jones. Did you see her after she was taken out of the river?—Dew. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Was she swelled?

Dew. I did not perceive she was swelled at all.

Mr. Jones. Did you handle her?

Dew. No, I touched nothing but her petticoat.

Mr. Jones. Did you observe her legs were in the water?—Dew. No, I did not.

Mr. Cowper. Did you see where her right arm was?

Dew. I could not see her right arm, tho water flowed over it.

Mr. Cowper. Did you see her after this time?

Dew. No, Sir, I saw her taken out, but not afterward.

Baron Hatsell. Did you see her after she lay on the ground?—Dew. Yes, my lord.

Baron Hatsell. How was she then?

Dew. She purged at the nose and one of her eyes; I did not take particular notice after she was out; the notice I took was when she was in the water.

Baron Hatsell. What did you see at her eye?

Dew. Froth, my lord.

Mr. Jones. Did you see her after she was stripped naked?—Dew. No, my lord.

Mr. Jones. Was it a settled frothing, or a purging?—Dew. A purging froth.

Baron Hatsell. Did any body wipe it off?

Dew. No, my lord, I did not see any body do it.

Baron Hatsell. Then there was no new froth came?

Dew. No, my lord, I saw her froth at the nose and one of the eyes as soon as she was taken out, but I did not stay long.

Mr. Cowper. Was she in her stays?

Dew. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Cowper. Was she not laced?

Dew. Yes, she was laced before and behind.

Mr. Jones. Call Thomas Dew. (Who was sworn.) Did you see this Mrs. Stout in the water? Pray give my lord and the jury an account what posture she was in.

Dew. I saw her lying in the water floating, above the water I will not say, but the water ran some small matter over her; her right arm was within the stake, and her left arm without; she lay just upon her side, and I saw her when she was first taken up, and her shoes and stockings were as clean as when they were put on, no mud nor dirt upon them, and I saw her shoes and her stockings, as high as her knee almost; but I saw no dirt.

Mr. Jones. Do you believe she had been sunk to the bottom?

Dew. She did not look as if she had, nor I see no water come from her.

Mr. Jones. Did you observe that she was swelled at all?

Dew. No, nor swelled that I perceived a bit; there was a little froth that came out of her nose, and about her (I cannot say from her eye), in that it was a small quantity.

Mr. Jones. Call Mr. Edward Blackno. (Who was sworn.) Did you see Mrs. Stout when she lay in the water?

Blackno. Yes, I did see her lie in the water floating; I was so near, that I saw the miller's man lift her up by one of her arms out of the water.

Mr. Jones. Was the arm bent or straight?

Blackno. It hung in this manner. (Shewing the court how with his own arm.)

Baron Hatsell. The other witnesses said, she lay on her right side.

Blackno. Yes, she lay on her right side, and her arm in this manner.

Baron Hatsell. Did you observe her to be swelled?

Blackno. I did not see her taken out.

Baron Hatsell. Did you observe any thing to hinder her from sinking?

Blackno. No, I did not, nothing but the water.

Mr. Cowper. I think, Sir, if I heard you right, you say, that this taking her by the arm and stirring her, was before she was taken out of the water; then I would know, after she was stirred, was she let go again? Was you by at the taking of her up?

Blackno. No, I was not.

Baron Hatsell. He told you she was floating when he saw her, and that nothing hindered her from sinking.

[Then William Edmunds and William Page were sworn.]

Mr. Jones. Edmunds, did you see Mrs. Stout when she was in the water?

Edmunds. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Give an account what posture she was in?

Edmunds. She lay against the stake, her head lay against the stake in the river; we were coming up in a barge, and called to a miller to draw the water, but he said he could not, for then she would swim through; and then we came on, and see her lie in the water.

Mr. Jones. Did any thing hinder her from sinking?—Edmunds. Not that I see.

Mr. Jones. Did no part of her legs or arms stick? Did you see her taken out?

Edmunds. No, I did not, I was gone; I did not know whether they would take her out, or no.

Mr. Jones. Page, did you see Mrs. Stout upon the water?—Page. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Tell us how she lay.

Page. She lay floating on the water, on her right side, with her head between the stakes.

Mr. Jones. Did her arms or cloaths, or any thing stick?—Page. Not that I saw.

Mr. Jones. Did any thing hinder her from sinking?—Page. I saw nothing.

VOL. XIII.

Mr. Cowper. Did you see her legs or knees? Page. No, I could not, they were not out of the water.

Mr. Jones. Swear Mrs. Anne Ulse. (Which was done.) Did you see Mrs. Stout in the water?

Ulse. Yes, I helped to pull her out; she lay on one side in the water floating, and the water came over her face.

Mr. Jones. Did she stick by any thing?

Ulse. One of her arms was about the post.

Mr. Jones. How?

Ulse. It got through the grate.

Mr. Jones. But it did not hang?—Ulse. No.

Mr. Jones. Did you take her out?

Ulse. Yes, sir.

Mr. Jones. Did you mind her cloaths?

Ulse. Yes, I turned up her petticoats in the water.

Mr. Jones. Had she gloves on?

Ulse. No, Sir.

Mr. Jones. How were her shoes and stockings?

Ulse. They were not muddy, her stockings were rolled down, she had no garters on.

Mr. Cowper. You say one arm lay through the grate, where lay the other?

Ulse. The other was down in the water.

[William How was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. Did you see Mrs. Stout in the water?

How. Yes, sir, I see her lie upon the water; she lay a float, she might lie three or four inches deep in the water.

Mr. Jones. Did any of her cloaths lie above the water?

How. Some part of her coats lay above the water.

Mr. Jones. Did any thing hinder her from sinking?

How. I saw nothing; I saw them take her out, and did not perceive she hung anyway; she lay with one arm, and her head in the grate, but I did not perceive she hung.

[John Meager was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. Well, do you give an account of what you know of Mrs. Stout being in the water.

Meager. I see Mrs. Sarah Stout floating in the water, her right arm in the grate, and her left arm with the stream.

Mr. Jones. Did she hang or stick by any thing?

Meager. No, neither hang nor stick, she floated.

Mr. Cowper. Did you see some body go through the Blue-coat building about eleven o'clock.

Mr. Meager. No, Sir, I was in bed before nine.

Mr. Jones. Now, my lord, we will give an account how she was when she was stript, and they came to view the body. Call John Dimsdale junior. (Who was sworn.)

Dunsd. My lord, I was sent for at night on Tuesday the last assizes.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, if your lordship please, I have some physicians of note and eminency that are come down from London; I desire they may be called into court to hear what the surgeons say?

Baron Hatsell. Ay, by all means.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, there is Dr. Sloane, Dr. Garth, Dr. Morley, Dr. Gilstrop, Dr. Harriot, Dr. Wallaston, Dr. Crell, Mr. William Cowper, Mr. Bartlett, and Mr. Camlin.—[Who respectively appeared in court.]

Mr. Jones. Give an account how you found Mrs. Stout.

Baron Hatsell. You are a physician, I suppose, Sir?

Dimsdale. A surgeon, my lord. When I was sent for to Mrs. Stout's, I was sent for two or three times before I would go; for I was unwilling after I heard Mrs. Stout was drowned; for I thought with myself, what need could there be of me when the person was dead? But she still sent; and then I went with Mr. Camlin, and found a little swelling on the side of her neck, and she was black on both sides, and more particularly on the left side, and between her breasts up towards the collar-bone; that was all I saw at that time, only a little mark upon one of her arms, and I think upon her left arm.

Mr. Jones. How were her ears?

Dimsdale. There was a settling of blood on both sides the neck, that was all I saw at that time.

Mr. Jones. How do you think she came by it?

Dimsdale. Truly I only gave an account just as I say now to the gentlemen at that time, I saw no more of it at that time, but about six weeks after the body was opened by Dr. Phillips—

Mr. Cowper. My lord, he is going to another piece of evidence, and I would ask him—

Mr. Jones. Let us have done first; how was her ears?

Dimsdale. There was a blackness on both ears, a settling of blood.

Mr. Jones. Call Sarah Kimpson.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, now you may ask him any thing, they have done with him.

Mr. Cowper. I would ask him, whether he was not employed to view these particular spots he mentions at the coroner's inquest?

Dimsdale. I was desired to look upon the face and arms, and breast, because they said there was a settling of blood there.

Mr. Cowper. When you returned to the coroner's inquest, what did you certify as your opinion?

Dimsdale. I did certify there was a settling of blood; but how it came I could not tell.

Mr. Cowper. I ask you, Sir, did not you say it was no rarer than a common stagnation usual in dead bodies?

Dimsdale. I do not remember a word of it.

Mr. Cowper. Sir, I would ask you; you say the spot was about the collar bone; was it above or below?

Dimsdale. From the collar bone downwards.

Mr. Cowper. Had she any circle about her neck?—Dimsdale. No; not, upon my oath.

Mr. Jones. Swear Sarah Kimpson. Did you observe this Mrs. Sarah Stout, when she was stripped, how her body was?—Kimpson. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Pray, give an account of it.

Kimpson. She had a great settlement of blood behind her ear, as much as my hand will cover, and more; and she had a settlement of blood under her collar bone.

Mr. Jones. Did you see nothing about her neck?

Kimpson. Nothing round her neck; on the side of her neck there was a mark.

Mr. Jones. Was there any other part bruised?

Kimpson. Only her left wrist, and her body was very flat and lank.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, what day was it that you saw her?

Kimpson. It was the day she was found.

Mr. Cowper. Was she not laced?

Kimpson. She was laced.

Mr. Cowper. Did you help to stir her?

Kimpson. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Did her body seem to be swelled, or was there any water come from her?

Kimpson. I did not observe the least drop of water that appeared any way.

Mr. Jones. Did you know what did purge from her?—Kimpson. Nothing that I saw.

Mr. Jones. Had not you a child drowned there lately?

Kimpson. Yes, about ten weeks ago.

Mr. Jones. And you found her?

Kimpson. She was drowned at night, and we found her next morning.

Mr. Jones. Where did you find her, at the top, or at the bottom of the water?

Kimpson. At the bottom.

Mr. Jones. How was she?

Kimpson. She was swelled as much as she could hold.

Mr. Jones. Were her eyes shut or open?

Kimpson. Her eyes were shut, and the child was laced as tight as the coat could be.

Mr. Jones. Was the child opened?

Kimpson. Yes.

Mr. Jones. And what was in the body of the child?

Kimpson. It was very full of water.

Mr. Jones. Call Sarah Peppercorn.

Mr. Cowper. You say you viewed the child; had it any settlement of blood?

Kimpson. I saw none.

Mr. Cowper. And you viewed the body?

Kimpson. Yes.

(Then Sarah Peppercorn was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Did you see the body of Mrs. Sarah Stout, after it was stripped and laid out?

Peppercorn. I did, Sir.

Mr. Jones. In what condition did you find her?

Peppercorn. I did not see her till she was brought home to her mother's; and there was a rumour in the town that she was with child, and I was sent for to give an account whether she was or not, and I found she was not; and I helped to pull off her cloaths, and she was very clear as any I ever knew, only had a black place on the side of her head, and in another place about her ear; but how it came I know not.

Mr. Jones. Did you observe how her body was?

Peppercorn. Her body was very well as any woman's could be.

Mr. Jones. Did you observe any water, or any such thing from her?—Peppercorn. No.

Mr. Jones. Was there any purging at her mouth or nostrils?

Peppercorn. A little froth as any body might have.

Mr. Cowper. At what hour did you see her? Peppercorn. I believe it might be nine or ten a'clock.

Baron Hatsell. In the morning?

Peppercorn. Yes, Sir; but I cannot give a just account of the time.

Baron Hatsell. What was you sent to for?

Peppercorn. To know if she was with child; for it was reported she had drowned herself because she was with child; and so her mother desired me to come to give an account that it was not so; and I found that it was not so.

Baron Hatsell. You are a midwife, are you not?—Peppercorn. Yes, my lord.

(Then Elizabeth Husler was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Had you the view of the body of Mrs. Sarah Stout the day you heard she was drowned?

Husler. She was not drowned, my lord; I went thither and helped to pull off her cloaths.

Mr. Jones. In what condition was her body?

Husler. Her body was very lank and thin, and no water appeared to be in it.

Mr. Jones. Was there any water about her mouth and nose?

Husler. Not when I saw her.

Mr. Jones. Did you mind her about her neck and head?

Husler. Yes, yes, there was a settling of blood at the top of the collar bone, just here, and there was a settling of blood upon both her ears, most about her left ear.

Mr. Jones. Swear Ann Pilkington. (Which was done.) Did you see the body of Mrs. Stout after she was drowned?

Pilkington. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. Pray, in what condition was she when she was stript?

Pilkington. I was in the house when she was brought in dead; and old Mrs. Stout desired me to help to lay her out; and taking a view of her, I did not at all perceive her body to be swelled.

Mr. Jones. Was there any water came out upon the moving of it?

Pilkington. No, I did not perceive any; and by a further view, I saw a redness on the left side of her head, and her ear was black; and there was a little mark upon her breast on the left side.

Mr. Jones. What colour was it of?

Pilkington. It seemed reddish and blackish; as to colour, it was like a settling of blood; I cannot tell how to make it out very well.

Mr. Cowper. Had she any circle round about her neck?—Pilkington. No, not that I see.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, did not you make some deposition to that purpose, that you know of?

Pilkington. Sir, I never did, and dare not do it.

Mr. Cowper. It was read against me in the King's bench, and I will prove it; was not Mr. Mead with you at the time of your examination?—Pilkington. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. Did not he put in some words, and what were they?

Pilkington. Not that I know of.

Mr. Cowper. But you never swore so, upon your oath?

Pilkington. No, I do not believe I did; if I did, it was ignorantly.

Mr. Jones. Here is her examination, it is 'cross her neck.'

Mr. Cowper. Was Mr. Young of Hertford, the constable, present when you were examined?

Pilkington. Yes, he was so. The next day Mrs. Stout sent for me again to put on her daughter's shroud, and I was one that helped to draw the sheet away, and there was not one drop of water come from her; and I laid a cloth under her chin, when I helped her into the coffin, but I did not see the least moisture come from her.

Mr. Cowper. What day was it, that you put her into the coffin?

Pilkington. The next day after she was dead.

Mr. Cowper. Do you know nothing of her being conveyed into the barn?

Pilkington. I happened to be in the barn, Mrs. Stout desired me to go with her, and she was brought up in an indecent manner, and I put a sheet about her. I was in Mrs. Stout's house before her daughter was brought thither.

Mr. Jones. Call Dr. Coatsworth, Dr. Nailor, Dr. Woodhouse, Dr. Bide:

(Mr. Coatsworth was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Pray, doctor, had you a view of the body of Mrs. Stout?

Coatsworth. Yes, I had, Sir: I am a surgeon.

Mr. Jones. Pray, give an account of it, and what your opinion was how she came by her death?

Coatsworth. My lord, in April last I was sent for by Dr. Philips, to come to Hertford to see the body of Mrs. Stout opened, who had been six weeks buried; and he told me, that there was a suspicion she was murdered, and that her relations were willing to have her taken up and opened. I came down, I think, on the 27th of April, and lay at Mrs. Stout's house that night; and by her discourse, I understood she wanted to be satisfied, whether her daughter was with child? I told her, it was my opinion we should find the parts contained in the abdomen so rotten, that it would be impossible to discover the uterus from the other parts; however, if she would have been opened, I could not discover whether she was with child, unless the infant was become bony. Her face and neck, to her shoulders, appeared black, and so much corrupted, that we were unwilling to proceed any further; but, however, her mother would have it done, and so we did open her; and as soon as she was opened, we perceived the stomach and guts were as full of wind as if they had been blown with a pair of bellows; we put her guts aside, and came to the uterus, and Dr. Phillips shewed it us in his hand, and afterwards cut it out and laid it on the table, and opened it, and we saw into the cavity of it, and if there had been any thing there as minute as a hair, we might have seen it, but it was perfectly free and empty; and after that, we put the intestines into their places; and we bid him open the stomach, and it was opened with an incision-knife, and it sunk flat, and let out wind, but no water; afterwards we opened the breast and lobes of the lungs, and there was no water: Then we looked on each side, and took up the lobes of the lungs too, to see if there was no water in the diaphragm, and there was none, but all dry. Then I remember I said, this woman could not be drowned, for if she had taken in water, the water must have rotted all the guts: that was the construction I made of it then; but for any marks about her head and neck, it was impossible for us to discover it, because they were so rotten.

Mr. Cowper. You say, this inspection was made about six weeks after she was dead?

Coatsworth. It was made on the 28th of April.

Mr. Cowper. She was drowned on the 13th of March.

Mr. Jones. Did you make an incision into those parts of the neck and head?

Coatsworth. No: I told Mrs. Stout and her son, if you imagine the skull to be injured, I will open the head; for if the scalp be never so rotten, yet if the skull has suffered any impression I shall discover it; they said, they did not suspect a broken skull in the case, and so we did not examine it.

Mr. Jones. But all her other parts were sound?

Coatsworth. Yes, sound to a miracle; for I did not imagine we could find them so.

Mr. Jones. Call John Dimsdale.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I would know, and I desire to be heard to this point: I think where the coroner's inquest have viewed the body, and the relations have been heard, and the body buried, that it is not to be stirred afterwards for any private inspection of parties, that intend to make themselves prosecutors; but if it is to be taken up, it is to be done by some legal authority; for if it should be otherwise, any gentleman may be easily trepanned: for instance, if they should have thought fit, after the coroner's view, to have broken the skull into a hundred pieces, this was a private view altogether among themselves. Certainly, if they intended to have prosecuted me, or any other gentleman upon this evidence, they ought to have given us notice, that we might have had some surgeons among them, to superintend their proceedings. My lord, with submission, this ought not to be given in evidence.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, I think you are not in earnest; there is no colour for this objection; if they did take up the body without notice, why should not that be evidence? unless you think they had a design to forswear themselves.

Mr. Cowper. Had you a Mellus Inquirendum, or any lawful warrant for making this inspection?—Coatsworth. No, there was not.

Baron Hatsell. Suppose they did an ill thing in taking up the body without some order, though I do not know any more ill in taking up that body than any other; but, however, is that any reason why we should not hear this evidence?

Coatsworth. Mr. Camblin, sir Wm. Cowper's surgeon, was there by.

Mr. Jones. Call Mr. Dimsdale, senior. (Who was sworn.) Had you a view of the body after it was taken up?—Dimsdale. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Pray, give your opinion of it.

Dimsdale. On the 28th of April, as I remember, I was sent for down by Mrs. Stout to view the body of her daughter. Her daughter was just taken out of the ground, but not opened; they had just touched the body, but not opened the skin when I came there—

Baron Hatsell. Are you a surgeon?

Dimsdale. Yes, my lord. Finding her head so much mortified, down to her neck, we thought all the parts were seized, and had a consultation, whether we should open her or not; but Mrs. Stout was very much enraged, because a great scandal had been raised, that her daughter was with child; and she said, she would have her opened to clear her reputation. With that we opened her, and found her body as sound as any flesh could be; no manner of putrefication in her lungs or any other part, but she was very full of wind. We searched the stomach and the thorax, and found not one drop of water about it. I was more curious than the rest, and turned away her legs, to see if the coffin was soiled, and the coffin and shroud were not wet. Her uterus was taken out, and I saw no manner of sign of conception. After this we had a consultation to consider, whether she was drowned or not drowned; and we were all of opinion, that she was not drowned; only Mr. Camblin desired he might be excused from giving his opinion, whether she was drowned or not; but all the rest of us did give our opinions, that she was not drowned.

Mr. Jones. Give your reasons, why you believed she was not drowned.

Dimsdale. My reason was this: Because we found no water in her; her intestines were not putrified; for if there had been water in her, that would have caused a fermentation, and that would have rotted the lungs and guts.

Baron Hatsell. Could you tell, so many weeks after, whether she was drowned or not?

Dimsdale. Yes, my lord, for this reason: for if she had been drowned, there had been some sign of water; and if there had been a pint of water, it would have rotted her lights and her guts; and that is done in a week's time by fermentation.

Mr. Cowper. Sir, I desire to know, whether according to reason and your skill, after six weeks time, it is possible there should be water in the thorax?

Dimsdale. I do believe there may be some; for it cannot come out after the body is dead, but by putrefaction; and there was no putrefaction; but it was firm and sound.

Baron Hatsell. What parts would have been putrified by the water?

Dimsdale. The lungs and bowels.

Baron Hatsell. And they were firm?

Dimsdale. They were; and if there had been water, they would have been putrified.

Mr. Jones. Call John Dimsdale, junior.

Juryman. Was her navel started?

Dimsdale sen. No: I never saw such a body in my life.

Mr. Cowper. Did you ever see a body that was drowned, opened six weeks after?

Dimsdale sen. No, never. If a body be drowned a fortnight, the bowels will be so rotten, there will be no coming near it; and I took particular notice, and I did not see one drop of water.

Baron Hatsell. Was the coffin close?

Dimsdale sen. Yes; it was close and dry as any board whatsoever; and all the parts sound, but the head and neck, and left arm.

Mr. Jones. What do you think could be the reason of that?

Dimsdale sen. The left arm was rottener than the other, the neck was rotten before.

Mr. Jones. What did you take to be the cause of it?

Dimsdale sen. I cannot judge of that.

(Call John Dimsdale junior, Who was sworn.)

Dimsdale jun. My lord, the body was opened before I came to see it, and they were drawing up an affidavit, that there was no water in the body; and they desired me to sign it; but I desired first to look into the body; and I did look into it, and turned the intestines aside, and there was no water in it; but the head from the neck was very much putrified.

Mr. Jones. Do you believe she was drowned?

Dimsdale jun. No, I believe not.

Mr. Jones. Did you open the child that was drowned? What difference was there between the body of that child and this?

Dimsdale jun. The child was extremely swelled in the belly and stomach, and had abundance of water in it.

Mr. Jones. Was the child faced that you opened?

Dimsdale jun. It was laid upon the table before me.

Mr. Cowper. How long was it before the child was opened?

Dimsdale jun. It was drowned in the afternoon, and opened the next morning.

Mr. Cowper. You said, Sir, you was asked to sign the affidavit before you saw the body, and you were honest, and would see the body first; pray, who asked you?

Dimsdale jun. All of them did.

Mr. Cowper. Who in particular? If you please, name them.

Dimsdale jun. Mr. Coatsworth, Mr. Philips, Mr. Camblin, &c. they asked me to set my hand to it, because they thought I had seen it before.

(Then Dr. Dimsdale was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Mr. Robert Dimsdale, was you at the opening of the body?

Dr. Dimsdale. I came after it was opened; my brother and I came together.

Mr. Jones. What profession are you of, a physician?

Dr. Dimsdale. Yes: when the body was taken up, they desired us to be there, to inspect the body; but before we came, it happened they had opened the body, and were setting their hands to a paper, a sort of affidavit; and when I came in, they would have had us set our hands; but we would not, till we had looked upon the body, and went and laid it open again, and we did not find the least drop of water neither in the thorax nor abdomen.

Mr. Cowper. Is it possible there should be water in the thorax, according to your skill?

Dr. Dimsdale. Yes, we did think there would have been, if she had been drowned.

Baron Hatsell. Could you expect to find it, so long as six weeks after?

Dr. Dimsdale. We should have expected that or a putrefaction; but we found no putrefaction, neither in the bowels nor intestines, but only upon her head and shoulders, and one arm.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, by what passage does the water go into the thorax?

Dr. Dimsdale. It will be very difficult for me to describe the manner here; but we should have found some in the stomach and intestines.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, Sir, how should it go into the thorax?

Dr. Dimsdale. By the lymphæduct if carried by any means.

Mr. Cowper. When the party is dead, can any water pass into any part of the body?

Dr. Dimsdale. We opened the abdomen of the child that was drowned, and found in the several cavities abundance of water.

Mr. Jones. When a person is dead, can they receive any water after?

Dr. Dimsdale. No, for all the parts are closed and contracted.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, if a dead body be put into the water, will not the water come into the wind-pipe?

Dr. Dimsdale. I question whether it will or no.

Mr. Jones. Was her mouth shut?

Dr. Dimsdale. She was putrified about the head and shoulders, and one arm that I saw was putrified; it was the left arm, as I take it.

Mr. Jones. What is your opinion, as to her death?

Dr. Dimsdale. I believe if she had been drowned, there would have been a putrefaction of the abdomen first; and it was her extreme parts, her arms, her head, and her breast, that was putrified, but her bowels seemed firm and sound.

Mr. Jones. Then you don't think her death was by drowning?—Dr. Dimsdale. No.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, did not you give some certificate or paper, declaring the death of this gentlewoman, before you saw the body at all?

Dr. Dimsdale. No, I did not.

Mr. Cowper. Sir, I would ask you, was not you angry that Mr. Camblin would not join with you in opinion?—Dr. Dimsdale. No.

Mr. Cowper. Did not you tell him that you were a graduate physician, and was angry he would not join with you?

Dr. Dimsdale. Suppose I did.

Baron Hatsell. But did you so or no?

Dr. Dimsdale. Yes, my lord, we had some words about it.

Mr. Jones. Swear Dr. Coatsworth. (Which was done.) Now, my lord, we call these gentlemen that are doctors of skill, to know their opinions of them that are found floating without water in them, how they came by their death.

Dr. Coatsworth. I have not seen many drowned bodies to make observation upon; but it is my opinion, that every body that is drowned, is suffocated by water passing down the wind-pipe into the lungs upon respiration; and at the same time, the water pressing upon the gullet, there will be a necessity of swallowing a great part of it into the stomach: I have been in danger of being drowned myself, and I was forced to swallow a great quantity of water. If a person was drowned, and taken out immediately, as soon as the suffocation was effected, I should not wonder if there were but little water in the stomach and guls; but if it lay in the water several hours, it must be very strange if the belly should not be full of water; but I will not say, it is impossible it should be otherwise.

Mr. Cowper. I desire to know, whether this gentleman attempted to drown himself, or was in danger of being drowned by accident.

Dr. Coatsworth. It was by accident: I was passing up the ship side, and took hold of a loose rope instead of the entering rope, which failing me, I fell into the water.

Mr. Cowper. But you struggled to save yourself from drowning?

Dr. Coatsworth. I did so; I have seen several persons that have been drowned, and they have lain several days, until by fermentation they have been raised; but I never made my observations of any persons that have been drowned above six hours.

Mr. Jones. Did you ever hear of any persons that, as soon as they were drowned, had swam above water?

Dr. Coatsworth. I have not known such a case.

Mr. Cowper. Did you ever know, Sir, a body that was otherwise killed, to float upon the water?

Dr. Coatsworth. I never made any observation of that.

Baron Hatsell. Dr. Browne has a learned discourse, in his Vulgar Errors, upon this subject, concerning the floating of dead bodies; I do not understand it myself, but he hath a whole chapter about it.

[Then Dr. Nailor was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. We ask you the same question that Dr. Coatsworth was asked, What is your opinion of dead bodies? If a body be drowned, will it have water in it or no?

Dr. Nailor. My lord, I am of opinion, that it will have a quantity if it be drowned; but if there be no water in the body, I believe that the person was dead before it was put into the water.

Mr. Cowper. I would ask the doctor one question, my lord, Whether he was not a constant voter against the interest of our family in this corporation?

Dr. Nailor. I never did come to give a vote, but sir William Cowper, or his son opposed me, and said I had no right to vote.

Mr. Cowper. I would have asked the same question of the Dimsdales, if I had remembered it; they are of another party, as this gentleman is.

Baron Hatsell. It is not at all material, as they are witnesses.—Then call Mr. Babington. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Pray, what is your opinion of this matter?

Mr. Babington. I am of opinion, that all bodies that go into the water alive, and are drowned, have water in them, and sink as soon as they are drowned, and do not rise so soon as this gentlewoman did.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, what is your profession, Sir?—Mr. Babington. I am a surgeon.

Mr. Cowper. Because Mr. Jones called you doctor.

Baron Hatsell. Did you ever see any drowned bodies?

Mr. Babington. Yes, my lord, once I had a gentlewoman a patient that was half an hour under water, and she lived several hours after, and in all that time she discharged a great quantity of water: I never heard of any that went alive into the water, and were drowned, that floated so soon as this gentlewoman did; I have heard so from physicians.

Baron Hatsell. I have heard so too, and that they are forced to tie a bullet to dead bodies thrown into the sea, that they might not rise again.

Mr. Cowper. The reason of that is, that they should not rise again, not that they will not sink without it. But I would ask Mr. Babington, whether the gentlewoman he speaks of went into the water voluntarily, or fell in by accident?

Mr. Babington. By accident, but I believe that does not alter the case.

Mr. Jones. Swear Dr. Burnet. (Which was done.) Dr. Burnet, you hear what is the matter in question; what is your opinion of it?

Dr. Burnet. My lord, I think that if any person fall into the water by accident, or throws himself in, the body will receive water as long as it is alive, and there are endeavours for respiration, and after these endeavours are over, there is no water will come in, for all the parts are closed; so consequently there must be water in all probability found in her.

Mr. Jones. What, do they swim or sink?

Dr. Burnet. They sink; I never saw a person drowned taken up without water in my life; but I have seen several full of water.

Mr. Cowper. I think you say when the faculty of respiration ceases, no water comes in.

Dr. Burnet. Yes, that is my opinion.

Mr. Cowper. But the water does pass into them while there are endeavours for respiration?—Dr. Burnet. Yes, that is my opinion.

[Then Dr. Woodhouse was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. Doctor, what is your opinion of this matter?

Dr. Woodhouse. My opinion is, that no person is suffocated by water, but he must have a great deal of water within him, a great deal of water in the stomach, and some in the lungs.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, Sir, did you ever open any of these bodies?

Dr. Woodhouse. Yes, I have opened a child myself that had a great quantity of water in it.

Mr. Cowper. Did you find any quantity of water in the throat?

Dr. Woodhouse. There was some, but a little, but a great deal in the stomach.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, which way can it pass into the thorax?

Dr. Woodhouse. While the person is struggling for respiration, there may be a relaxation of the person must suck in water as well as air, and some water may get into the wind-pipe, and so enter into the lungs.

Mr. Cowper. Is there a passage from the lungs to the thorax?

Dr. Woodhouse. The thorax is the vessel wherein the lungs lie, the lungs in the thorax, the breast is the cavity where the lungs lie, the wind-pipe is the conveyance to the lungs, and a person in respiration takes down some water there, but no doubt the greater quantity will be in the stomach.

Baron Hattell. Pray let me ask you a question: some of the witnesses said, that if a person be drowned, and lies dead a great while, the inwards will be putrified; what is your opinion of it?

Dr. Woodhouse. No doubt, my lord, where water gets into the stomach, or wherever it is, it will putrify very soon.

Mr. Jones. Call Edward Clement. (Who was sworn.) Are not you a seaman?

Clement. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. How long have you been so?

Clement. Man I have writ myself but six years, but I have used the sea nine or ten years.

Mr. Jones. Have you known of any men that have been killed, and thrown into the sea, or who have fallen in and been drowned? Pray tell us the difference as to their swimming and sinking.

Clement. In the year 89, or 90, in Beachy fight, I saw several thrown over-board during the engagement, but one particularly I took notice of, that was my friend, and killed by my side; I saw him swim for a considerable distance from the ship; and a ship coming under our stern, caused me to lose sight of him, but I saw several dead bodies floating at the same time; likewise in another engagement, where a man had both his legs shot off, and died instantly, they threw over his legs; though they sunk, I saw his body float: likewise I have seen several men who have died natural deaths at sea, they have when they have been dead had a considerable weight of ballast and shot made fast to them, and so were thrown over-board; because we hold it for a general rule, that all men swim if they be dead before they come into the water; and on the contrary, I have seen men when they have been drowned, that they have sunk as soon as the breath was out of their bodies, and I could see no more of them. For instance, a man fell out of the Cornwall, and sunk down to rights, and seven days afterwards we weighed anchor, and he was brought up grasping his arm about the cable: and we have observed in several cases, that where men fall over-board, as soon as their breath is out of their bodies they sink downright; and on the contrary, where a dead body is thrown over-board without weight, it will swim.

Mr. Jones. You have been in a fight; how do bodies float after a battle?

Clement. Men float with their heads just down, and the small of their back and buttocks upwards: I have seen a great number of them, some hundreds in Beachy-head fight, when we engaged the French, I was in the old Cambridge at that time. I saw several (what number I will not be positive, but there were a great number, I cannot guess to a score) that did really swim, and I could see them float for a considerable distance.

Mr. Jones. Have you seen a shipwreck?

Clement. Yes; the Coronation, in September 1691, I was then belonging to the Dutchess, under the command of captain Clement; we looked out and see them taking down their masts; we saw the men walking up and down on the right side, and the ship sink down, and they swam up and down like a shoal of fish one after another; and I see them hover one upon another, and see them drop away by scores at a time; and there was an account of about nineteen that saved themselves, some by boats, and others by swimming; but there were no more saved out of the ship's complement, which was between five and six hundred, and the rest I saw sinking downright, some twenty at a time. There was a fisherman brought our captain word, that in laying in of his net he drew up some more close under the decks that were drowned belonging to the Coronation. We generally throw in bags of ballast with them.

Mr. Jones. I suppose all men that are drowned, you sink them with weights?

Clement. Formerly shot was allowed for that purpose; there used to be three-score weight of iron, but now it is a bag or ballast that is made fast to them.

Mr. Jones. Then you take it for a certain rule, that those that are drowned sink, but those that are thrown over-board do not?

Clement. Yes; otherwise why should the government be at that vast charge to allow three-score or four-score weight of iron to sink every man, but only that their swimming about should not be a discouragement to others?

[Then Richard Gin was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. You hear the question; pray what do you say to it?

Gin. I was at sea a great while, and all the men that I see turned over-board had a great weight at their heels to sink them.

Mr. Jones. Then will they swim otherwise?

Gin. So they say.

Mr. Jones. Are you a seaman?

Gin. I went against my will in two fights.

Mr. Jones. Then, gentlemen of the jury, I hope we have given you satisfaction that Mrs. Stout did not drown herself, but was carried into the water after she was killed. That was the first question; for if it be true that all dead bodies when they are put into the water do swim, and the bodies that go alive into the water and are drowned do sink, this is sufficient evidence that she came by her death not by drowning, but some other way. Now, my lord, as to the second matter, and that is to give such evidence as we have against these gentlemen at the bar. Mr. Cowper, it appears, was the last man that any one can give an account of was in her company. What became of her afterwards, or where they went, nobody can tell; but the other witnesses have given you evidence that he was the last man that was with her. I shall only give this further evidence as to Mr. Cowper, that notwithstanding all the civility and kindnesses that passed between him and this family, when the bruit and noise of this fact was spread abroad, Mr. Cowper did not come to consider and consult with old Mrs. Stout what was to be done; but he took no manner of notice of it, and the next day he rode out of town, without further taking notice of it.

Call George Aldridge and John Ascher.

[John Archer was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. Do you know any thing of Mr. Cowper's going out of town about this business of Mrs. Stout's being drowned?

Archer. Yes, I did see him go out of town afterwards.

Mr. Jones. Which way did he go?

Archer. He went the back way from the Glove; I suppose he came that way.

Mr. Cowper. What day was it I went? Is it not the way that I used to go when I got the circuit into Essex?

Archer. Yes, I believe so.

Mr. Cowper. I lodged at Mr. Barfoot's, and he has a back-door to the Glove, where my horse was, and I went the direct way into Essex, and it was Wednesday morning. What day was it you see me go?

Archer. It was on the Wednesday morning.

Mr. Cowper. That was the very day I went into Essex.

[Then George Aldridge was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. When did Mr. Cowper go out of town the last assizes?

Aldridge. On Wednesday.

Mr. Jones. Which way did he go?

Aldridge. He went the way to Chelmsford.

Mr. Jones. Did you not fetch his horse from Stout's?—Aldridge. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Jones. How often did you go for it?

Aldridge. Three times.

Mr. Jones. When?

Aldridge. On Tuesday night I sent once, and went twice myself; the first time there was nobody at home to deliver the horse; so I went to Mr. Stout's, and asked him about the horse, and he said he could not deliver him till the maid went home, and then I went about 11 o'clock and had the horse.

Baron Hutsell. Was it eleven at night?

Aldridge. Yes, my lord.

Mr. Cowper. When I sent you to fetch my horse, what directions did I give you?

Aldridge. You gave me directions to fetch your horse, because you said you should have occasion to go out next morning betimes with the judge.

Mr. Cowper. The reason I sent for my horse was this; when I heard she had drowned herself, I think it concerned me in prudence to send a common hostler for him, for fear the lord of the manor should seize all that was there as forfeited.

Baron Hutsell. There was no danger of that, for she was found 'Non compos mentis.'

Mr. Cowper. No, my lord, I sent before the verdict.

Mr. Jones. It seems you did not think it to go and take horse there yourself, though you put your horse there.

Now, my lord, we will go on, and give the other evidence that we opened concerning these three other gentlemen that came to town; two of them took lodgings at Gurrey's, at five in the afternoon, but did not come in till between eleven and twelve, and then they brought another in with them; and though he had been in town five or six hours, his feet were wet in his shoes, and his head was of a reeky sweat; he had been at some hard labour I believe, and not drinking himself into such a sweat.

Call John Gurrey, Matthew Gurrey, and Elizabeth Gurrey.

[John Gurrey was sworn.]

Mr. Jones. Do you know any of the gentlemen at the bar?—J. Gurrey. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Name who you know.

J. Gurrey. There is Mr. Stephens, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Marson.

Mr. Jones. Pray do you remember when they were lodging at your house?

J. Gurrey. The last assizes; when fifty first came, there was only Mr. Stephens and Mr. Rogers.

Mr. Jones. At what time did they take it?

J. Gurrey. I was at church, and cannot tell that, they hired the lodgings of my wife.

Mr. Jones. What can you say more?

J. Gurrey. I was in at night when they came; there came three of them at eleven at night, whereof Mr. Marson was the third person, and he said he was destitute of a lodging, and he asked for a spare bed; my wife told him she had one, but had let it; whereupon Mr. Stevens and Mr. Rogers said he should lodge with them; so they went up all together, and they called for a fire to be kindled, and asked for the landlord, which was I, and they asked me to fetch a bottle of wine; and I told them I would fetch a quart, which I did; and then they asked me to sit down and drink with them, which I did; and then they asked me if one Mrs. Sarah Stout did not live in town, and whether she was a fortune? I said Yes. Then they said they did not know how to come to the sight of her; and I said I would shew them her to-morrow morning, not questioning but I might see her sometime as she was coming down the street; so they said they would go to see her. Mr. Rogers and Mr. Stephens charged Mr. Marson with being her old sweetheart; saith Mr. Marson, she hath thrown me off, but a friend of mine will be even with her by this time.

Baron Hatsell. What o'clock was it then?

J. Gurrey. I reckon eleven of the clock when they came in.

Baron Hatsell. Did you observe in what condition Mr. Marson was in?

J. Gurrey. I did not observe, only that he was hot, and but by his wig; I see his head was wet, and he said he was just come from London, and that made him in such a heat.

Mr. Jones. Had he shoes or boots on?

J. Gurrey. I did not observe that.

Mr. Jones. What did they do the next day?

J. Gurrey. The next morning I heard this party was in the water; I sat up all night, and was fain to wait till my daughter came down to look after the shop; and then I went to see her, and she was removed into the barn, and they were wiping her face, closing her eyes, and putting up her jaws; and as I came back these persons were walking, and I met Mr. Marson and Mr. Stephens, and told them the news; said I, this person has come to a sad accident: say they, so we hear; but nevertheless we will be as good as our word, and go and see her. I went with them and overtook Mr. Rogers; and Marson said, we are going to see Mrs. Stout. O landlord! said Rogers, you may take up that rogue (pointing at Mr. Marson), for what he said last night; but I did not think, they speaking so jocularly, that there was any suspicion of their being concerned in the murder. A second time I went, the barn-door was locked; I knocked, and they opened it, and let us in, and they uncovered her face to let me see her, and I touched her; and looking about for them they were gone, and I cannot say they see her or touched her: Then Mr. Marson and they were consulting how to send a great coat to London; and I directed them to a coachman at the Bell-inn; but I did not hear he went to enquire after the coachman; then they went to your lordship's chamber, and I went home; and about eleven o'clock I saw Mr. Marson and Mr. Stephens coming down with Mr. Spencer Cowper.

Mr. Marson. I did not go out that night after I came in.

Mr. Jones. No; we agree that. Did you see Mr. Cowper and these gentlemen together?

J. Gur. Only at eleven o'clock on Tuesday noon, Mr. Cowper, Mr. Marson, and Mr. Stephens were coming down to the market place.

Mr. Jones. Did not they take their leave of you when they went away from you that forenoon?

J. Gur. No; only in the morning they told me they would send the word at noon if they intended to lodge there.

Mr. Marson. I desire to know of Mr. Gurrey, if his sister was not in the room when we came in?

J. Gur. She was in our house that day; but whether when they came in I cannot tell.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, have you not had some discourse with your sister, the widow Davis, concerning some suspicion that you had of Sarah Walker, that hath been produced as a witness?

J. Gur. I do not remember any such.

Mr. Cowper. Then did not you say these words, We must not concern ourselves with Sarah Walker, for she is the only witness against the Cowpers?

J. Gur. I cannot remember any such thing.

Baron Hatsell. You may answer according to the best of what you remember; if you say you have forgot when you have not, you are forsworn.

Mr. Cowper. If your lordship pleases to give leave to Mr. Gurrey to recollect himself, I ask him, Whether he did not talk with his sister Davis about some suspicion his wife and he had about Sarah Walker, the maid-servant of the deceased?

J. Gur. I believe there might be some talk of a person that was seen to go into the church-yard at some distance with Sarah Walker.

Mr. Cowper. Did your wife say that she did suspect that person?—J. Gur. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. Did your wife say they behaved themselves strangely, and that she would have persuaded the widow Blewitt to have watched her?—J. Gur. There was something of that.

Mr. Cowper. Was there not some such words, that they must not meddle with Sarah Walker, for she is the witness against the Cowpers?

J. Gur. I said, Do not concern yourself with Sarah Walker, for fear of taking off her evidence.

Mr. Cowper. Pray did not the widow Davis warm the sheets for these gentlemen?

J. Gur. She was with my wife, but I cannot say whether she warmed the sheets.

Mr. Cowper. When they came home, had you any lodgers that wanted to come home? Had not you one Gape?

J. Gur. I cannot say whether he was in before or after them.

Mr. Cowper. Did not you say to your sister Davis, Now these gentlemen are in bed, if Mr. Gape would come home, our family would be quiet?—J. Gur. I do not remember that.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, did not you go to look for Mr. Gape?

J. Gur. Yes, I went to Hockley's.

Mr. Cowper. Who did you employ to speak to Mr. Gape?—J. Gur. Mrs. Hockley.

Mr. Cowper. When you came home to your own house, and after you had been at Hockley's to speak with Mr. Gape, what account did you give of the time of night, and other particulars?

J. Gur. I gave no account of the time.

Mr. Cowper. Not to Mrs. Davis?

J. Gur. I cannot tell whether I did or no.

Mr. Cowper. Did not you say, Mr. Gape asked Mrs. Hockley what a'clock it was?

J. Gur. No, I do not remember that; but Mrs. Hockley went in, and told him what time of night it was; it was eleven or twelve of the clock, whether I cannot say.

Mr. Jones. Call Martha Gurrey. (Who was sworn.) Which of these gentlemen do you know?

Mrs. Gur. Mr. Marson, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Stephens.

Mr. Jones. What time of the night was it when they came to your house? give an account of it, and what you heard them say.

Mrs. Gur. It was a little after five, or thereabouts, that they came—

Mr. Jones. Who came?

Mrs. Gur. Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Rogers, and there was one Mr. Gilbert, that married a first cousin of mine; he came and asked me for my husband; and I asked him his business, and he said he wanted to speak with him.

Mr. Jones. Pray, come to these men; when did they come to your house?

Mrs. Gur. They hired the lodging at five of the clock. When they first came to see them I was not at home: Mr. Gilbert brought them, and as I was coming along the street I saw Mr. Gilbert walking off, and would not look at me.

Mr. Jones. When did they go out?

Mrs. Gur. They never staid there.

Mr. Jones. When did they come in again?

Mrs. Gur. Between eleven and twelve.

Baron Hatsell. What did they do when they came in again?

Mrs. Gur. I was laying on some sheets two pair of stairs when they came, and then there was three of them; so they saw me a little after, and begged my excuse for bringing in another; for they said it was so late that they could not get a lodging any where else: and said, if I thought fit, the gentleman should lie with them: And I told them I liked it very well.

Mr. Jones. What firing had they?

Mrs. Gur. The firing I laid on in the morning, and they sent for my husband to fetch them some wine.

Mr. Jones. What did you hear them talk on?

Mrs. Gur. They discoursed with my husband, and asked him if he knew Mrs. Sarah Stout; and one of them said to Mr. Marson, I think she was an old sweetheart of yours; Ay, said he, but she turned me off, but a friend of mine is even with her: And Mr. Rogers said he was in with her; and afterwards said, her business was done. They had a bundle, that was wrapt up in a pure white cloth, like to an apron, but I cannot say it was an apron; and there was a parcel hanging loose by it; and when he laid it down he said, he would pass his word Mrs. Sarah Stout's courting days were over; and I said, I hoped it was no hurt to the gentlewoman; and then I looking upon Mr. Marson, saw him put his peruke aside, and his head reeked, and he told them he was but just come from London that night, which made him disappointed of a lodging.

Mr. Jones. What did you hear them say about any money?

Mrs. Gur. I asked them how they would have their bed warmed? And Mr. Marson answered, very hot: With that I went down to send my daughter up, and she could not go presently; I told her then she must go as soon as she could.

Baron Hatsell. Pray, do not tell us what passed between you and your daughter: What do you know of these gentlemen?

Mrs. Gur. I went to the next room, to see if every thing was as it should be; I hearkened, and they had some discourse about money, and I heard somebody (I do not know who it should be except it were Mr. Stephens) answer and say, the use money was paid to night; but what money they meant, I cannot tell.

Mr. Jones. What did you find when they were gone?

Mrs. Gur. Sir, I found a cord at the end of the trunk.

Mr. Jones. Was it there in the morning, or before they came?

Mrs. Gur. No, it could not, for I swept my room, and wiped down the dust.

Mr. Jones. Was the cord white?

Mrs. Gur. No, it was more dirty than it is now, for my husband and I have worn it in our pockets.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, who brought the cord down from above stairs?

Mrs. Gur. My daughter that lived with me, and she laid it upon the shelf.

Mr. Cowper. Did not you hear there was a coroner's inquest sitting?

Mrs. Gur. The next day at night I did hear of it.

Mr. Cowper. Why did not you go to the coroner's inquest and give an account of it there?

Mrs. Gur. I told my husband of it, and I asked my husband if he did not hear what they said concerning Mrs. Sarah Stout? And he answered, yes, they ought to be taken up for the words they said last night: Why, saith I; do not you take notice of it? I think you ought to take them up. But he went out of doors, and I saw no more of him till the afternoon. When I heard the words, I thought somebody had stole away and got to bed to her.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, if your husband heard these words, why did not he go to the coroner's inquest?

Mrs. Gur. I did speak to him to have them taken up.

Mr. Cowper. Why did he not do it?

Mrs. Gur. He said he would not do it; he did not know but it might cost him his life.

Mr. Jones. How came you after this to discover it?

Mrs. Gur. Because I was so troubled in mind I could not rest night nor day; and I told him if he would not tell of it, I would tell of it myself, for I was not able to live.

Elizabeth Gurrey was sworn.

Mr. Jones. Pray, do you know Mr. Rogers, Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Marson?

E. Gur. I know Mr. Marson, and these are the other gentlemen, I reckon.

Mr. Jones. What discourse did you hear from them?

E. Gur. Mr. Marson asked the other gentlemen how much money they had spent? the other answered, what was that to him; you have had forty or fifty pounds to your share. Then the other asked him, whether the business was done? And he answered, he believed it was; but if it was not done, it would be done to night. Then, my lord, he pulled a handful of money out of his pocket, and swore he would spend it all for joy the business was done.

Mr. Jones. Was Mr. Cowper's name mentioned?

E. Gur. I heard them mention Mr. Cowper's name, but not Mrs. Sarah Stout.

Mr. Jones. What condition was the gentleman's shoes in?

E. Gur. I think it was Mr. Marson, his shoes were very wet and dirty; one of them was very hot, and he wiped his head with his handkerchief.

Mr. Jones. Now, my lord, we have done as to our evidence. Mr. Marson pretended, he was just then alighted and come from London, and was in a great heat, and his shoes were wet. I wonder what Mr. Marson had been doing; for when he was examined, he said, he came to town about eight of the clock, and went to the Glove and Dolphin inn, and stayed there till he came to his lodging. Now it was a wonderful thing that he should come wetted from a tavern, where he had been sitting four or five hours together.

Then the Examination of Mr. John Marson was read:

The EXAMINATION OF JOHN MARSON, taken before me, this 27th day of April, 1699.

"Who being examined where he was on Monday the 13th of March last, saith, That he was at the borough of Southwark (he being an attorney of the said court) till past 4 of the clock in the afternoon; and saith, that he set out from Southwark for Hertford soon after, and came to Hertford about 8 the same afternoon, and put up his horse at the sign of —, an inn there, and then went to the Hand and Glove, together with Godfrey Gimbart, esq. Ellis Stephens, William Rogers, and some others, where they stayed till about eleven of the clock at night, and then this examinant went thence directly to the house of John Gurrey, with the said Stephens and Rogers, who lay altogether in the said Gurrey's house all that night. And being asked what he said concerning the said Mrs. Sarah Stout, deceased, this examinant saith, that on Sunday the 12th of March last, this examinant being in company with one Thomas Marshall, and telling him that this examinant intended the next day for Hertford, with the marshal of the King's Bench, the said Thomas Marshall desired this examinant and the said Stephens, who was then also in company, that they would go and see the said Sarah Stout (his sweetheart.) He confesseth, that he did ask the said Gurrey, if he would shew this examinant where the said Stout lived; telling the said Gurrey that his name was Marshall, and asked him if he never heard of him before; and jocularly said, that he would go to see her the next morning, but doth not believe that he said any thing that any friend was even with the said Sarah Stout, or to such like effect. And doth confess, that he did the next day, upon the said Gurrey's telling him that the said Stout was drowned, say, that he would keep his word, and would see her. And saith, that meeting with Mr. Cowper (who is this examinant's acquaintance) he believes he did talk with him concerning the said Stout's being drowned, this examinant having seen her body that morning.

"JOHN MARSON."

Cogn. Die et Anno antedict.

Coram J. Holt.

Mr. Jones. All that I observe from it, is this: That he had been five hours in town, and when he came to his lodging, he came in wet and hot, and said he was just come from London.

Marson. I had rid forty miles that day, and could not be soon cold.

Baron Hatsell. They have done now for the king; come, Mr. Cowper, what do you say to it?

Mr. Jones. If your lordship please, we will call one witness more, Mary Richardson. Mrs. Richardson, do you know Mr. Marson, or any of these gentlemen?

Mrs. Richardson. They came on Tuesday night to the Bell at Hoddesdon, and lay there, and one of the gentlemen, when I was warning the sheets, asked me if I knew Mrs. Sarah Stout? And I said, Yes. He asked me if I knew which way she came to her end? And I told him, I could not tell.

Mr. Jones. Is that all? What did they say more?

Mrs. Richardson. They did desire and wish it might be found out how it came about; and one gentleman took no notice of her at all. They had a little bundle, but what was in it I cannot tell, but there I saw it bound up in some coloured stuff or other, but what it was I cannot tell.

Mr. Jones. Is that all you can say?

Mrs. Richardson. Yes, that is all.

Mr. Jones. Then we have done.

Baron Hutsell. Come, Mr. Cowper, what do you say to it?

Mr. Cowper. Now they have done on the part of the king, my lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, I must beg your patience for my defence. I confess it was an unfortunate accident for me (as Mr. Jones calls it) that I happened to be the last person (for aught appears) in the company of a melancholy woman. The discourse occasioned by this accident had been a sufficient misfortune to me, without any thing else to aggravate it; but I did not in the least imagine that so little, so trivial an evidence as here is, could possibly have affected me to so great a degree, as to bring me to this place to answer for the worst fact that the worst of men can be guilty of.

My lord, your lordship did just now observe, that I have appeared at the bar for my clients; but I must say too, that I never appeared for myself under this, or the like circumstances, as a criminal, for any offence whatsoever.

Mr. Jones very well said, when he spoke on the part of the king. That if this gentlewoman was murdered, the crime was villainous, base, barbarous, and cruel; and for my part I think so too; the crime would be so great, that it could never be sufficiently condemned: but at the same time I may aver, that to suppose a murder without good grounds for it, and afterwards to charge innocent men with it knowingly and maliciously, is to a trifle as base and barbarous as the murder itself could be. My lord, I speak for my own part; I know not at what price other men may value their lives; but I had much rather myself was murdered than my reputation; which yet I am sensible hath suffered greatly, hitherto by the malice and artifice of some men, who have gone pretty far in making this fact, as barbarous as it is, to be credited of me. And therefore I must beg your lordship's and the jury's patience, while I not only defend my life, but justify myself from these things that have unjustly aspersed me, by the conspiracy and artifice of my accusers.

My lord, in all the evidence that hath been given, I must observe, that there is no positive evidence, with submission, to induce the jury or any one to believe the general, that this gentlewoman was murdered; but they go upon suppositions and inferences, which are contradicted by other circumstances, in the very evidence of the prosecutor, that make full as strong to prove she was not murdered, as that she was; so that, as it stands, it can amount only to a bare supposition that she was murdered by any body.

Then, as to the evidence that particularly relates to myself, or the gentlemen who stand with me at the bar, that they or I were concerned in it (if she was murdered) there is not one syllable of proof; at most, it amounts but to make us suspect a murder, not proved, but only suspected: this I observe upon the evidence, as it now stands without answer, as it has been given on the king's part: and how far, in the case of life, men shall be affected with evidence of this nature, which neither proves the murder in general, nor that they did it in particular; though no defence was made, or any further answer given, I must submit to your lordship's and the jury's judgment.

But, my lord, I do not doubt but I shall be able to wipe away even that remote suspicion by my defence: they have been long in their evidence for the king, and therefore I must beg your patience while I give a particular answer to every part of it, in as good a method as I am able: and I will waste as little time as may consist with the justifying my reputation; for which I know your lordship will have as tender a regard, to see it doth not suffer unjustly, as for my life itself.

And I promise your lordship, I shall trouble you with no evidence which is not express and plain; no innuendoes or suspicious; but I shall prove fully and clearly, in the first place, that there was no ground at all, in this case, to suppose she was murdered by any one but herself.

The first fact that they insisted upon to infer a murder from it, was, that the body was found floating: now, my lord, that fact, I am able by the evidence I have, as well as from that of the prosecutor, to deny; for the fact was directly otherwise, that is, she was not found floating.

And whereas the prosecutor's witnesses, who have been produced to this point, are obscure and poor men, and your lordship observes, have been taught to say generally that she floated; which, when they are required to explain, and describe how she lay, they contradict themselves in, by shewing she lay sideways between the stakes, and almost all under water. Now I shall give your lordship and the jury a full and particular account and description from the parish officers, men employed by the coroner to take the body out of the water, of the very manner and posture in which it was first found; which they are much better able to do than the prosecutor's witnesses, having seen her before all or most of those people; and these officers clearly agree, that her body was under water when found, except some small appearance of her petticoats, near or on the surface of the water; which may be very easily accounted for, because the stakes the witnesses mention, and which are driven into the ground cross the river, to prevent weeds and trumpefy from running into the mill-stand, as the witnesses have already said, about a foot distance from one another, and are set with their feet from the mill, and their heads inclining toward the mill with the stream. Now, my lord, every one knows, that though a drowned body will at first sink, yet it is buoyant, and does not go downright and rest in one place like lead; for a human body is seldom or never in a stream found to lie where it was drowned: a body drowned at Chelsea has been often found by fishermen at London, and that before it came to float above water. Now, if a body is so buoyant, as that it is driven down by the impellent force of the current (though it do not float above water) it seems a consequence, that when it comes to be stopped and resisted by the stakes, which lie with their heads downward, inclining with the stream, the stream bearing the body against the stakes, must needs raise it upwards to find another passage if possible, when the ordinary and natural is obstructed. I have seen, I remember, that where weeds have been driven down a river, and have been roused along at the bottom, when they have come down to a board or stakes of a wyer, or turnpike, they have been by the force of the water raised up against those boards or stakes, and forced over them, though without such obstruction they had undoubtedly continued to roul under the water. I do not know of any other symptom they pretend to, of her not being drowned, from any thing observed of her in the water. Then, as to the flatness of her belly, when she was put into her coffin, I shall shew it is a common and natural accident; sometimes drowned bodies are swelled more, sometimes less, sometimes not at all: I think it hardly deserves a physician to prove that a body may be drowned with very little water; that a man may be drowned by strangling or suffocation, caused by a little water in the lungs, without any great quantity of water received in the body, is a certain and established truth; for I am told that when respiration ceases, the party dies, and can receive no more water after that: so that nothing is to be inferred from a body's having more or less water found in it, especially if your lordship will give me leave to observe this distinction, where a body is voluntarily drowned, and where it is, drowned by accident; for people that fall in by accident do struggle and strive as long as they can; every time they rise they drink some water into the stomach, to prevent its passing into the lungs, and are drowned no sooner than needs must; but persons that voluntarily drown themselves, to be sure desperately plunge into the water, to dispatch a miserable life as soon as they can; and so that little quantity in the lungs which causes death may be the sooner taken in; after which no more is received: and I hope by physicians it will appear there is good ground for this difference.

The next is the evidence that the surgeons have given on the other part, relating to the taking this gentlewoman out of her grave after she had been buried six weeks. Whether this ought to have been given in evidence, for the reasons I hinted at, in a criminal case, I submit to your lordship; but as it is, I have no reason to apprehend it, being able to make appear, that the gentlemen who spoke to this point have delivered themselves in that manner, either out of extreme malice, or a most profound ignorance; this will be so very plain upon my evidence, that I must take the liberty to impute one or both of those causes to the gentlemen that have argued from their observations upon that matter.

And now, if your lordship will but please to consider the circumstances under which they would accuse me of this horrid action, I do not think they will pretend to say, that in the whole course of my life I have been guilty of any mean or indirect action; and I will put it upon the worst enemy I have in the world to say it. Now, for a man in the condition I was in, of some fortune in possession, related to a better, in a good employment, thriving in my profession, living within my income, never in debt (I may truly say not five pounds at any one time these years past), having no possibility of making any advantage by her death, void of all malice, and, as appears by her own evidence, in perfect amity and friendship with this gentlewoman, to be guilty of the murdering her, to begin at the top of all baseness and wickedness, certainly is incredible.

My lord, in this prosecution my enemies, seeing the necessity of assigning some cause, have been so malicious to suggest before (though not now, when I have this opportunity of vindicating myself publicly), that I have been concerned in the receipt of money for this gentlewoman, had her securities by me; and sometimes that I had been her guardian, or her trustee, and I know not what. I now see the contrivers and promoters of that scandal, and they know it to be base, false, and malicious; I never was concerned in interest with her, directly or indirectly, and so I told them when I was before my lord chief justice: it is true, it was then just suggested by the prosecutors, I then denied it, and I deny it still. I thank God, I have not been used, nor have I need, to deny the truth.

My lord, you find the prosecutors have nothing to say to me upon this head, after all the slanders and stories they have published against me, of my having money in my hands which belonged to the deceased: But though they do not stir it, I will, and give your lordship a full account of all that ever was in that matter. When I lodged at Hertford, some time since, she desired me to recommend to her a security for 200*l.* if it came in my way; my lord, when I came to town, I understood that one Mrs. Puller, a client of mine, had a mortgage formerly made to her by one Mr. Loftus, of Lambeth in Surrey, for the like sum, and that she was willing to have in her money: I wrote to this gentlewoman, the deceased, to acquaint her of the security; she thereupon did send up 200*l.* and some odd pounds for interest (the account of which I produced to my lord chief justice); this money was sent to me by Mr. Cranfield, as I have been informed, and by him given to Mr. Toller's clerk, and by him brought publicly to me: my lord, this mortgage I immediately transferred by assignment, endorsed on the back of it, and Mrs. Habberfield, a trustee for Mrs. Puller, signed and sealed it, and that very 100*l.* and interest due, was at one and the same time paid to Mrs. Puller, and by her the principal was paid to her daughter, in part of her portion. All this was transacted the beginning of December last, and she was not drowned till the 13th of March following: and my lord, these people that are now the prosecutors, did own before my lord chief justice that they had found this mortgage among the deceased's writings in her cabinet at the time of her death. Now, my lord, I say, that saving this one service I did her, as I said in December last, I never was otherwise concerned with her in the receiving or disposing of any of her money; nor had I ever any of her securities for money in my keeping; and I defy any adversary I have to shew the contrary.

My lord, as there appears no malice, no interest, so they have proved for me that there was no concealment of shame, to induce me to commit so barbarous an action; otherwise, perhaps, now they find they can assign no other cause, they would content themselves to give that reason, and fling that scandal at me: and though I take it by the experience I have had of them, they did not design to do me any favour, yet I thank them, in endeavouring to vindicate her honour, they have secured my reputation against that calumny; and though I am satisfied, as I said, they did not intend me kindness, yet I thank God, they have given me a just opportunity to take advantage of their cunning for the clearing of my innocence in that particular.

Then, my lord, not to rest it here, but to satisfy the jury and the world how this gentlewoman came to destroy herself: I shall give the clearest evidence that was ever given in any court, that she murdered herself. When I enter upon this proof; I must of necessity trespass upon the character of this gentlewoman that is dead. I confess this is a tender point, it is a thing I would willingly be excused from, and it is, not without a great deal of reluctance and compulsion forced from me. That she was melancholy the prosecutors themselves have proved; but I must of necessity shew you the occasions and reasons of it, and the witnesses will tell your lordship what desperate resolutions she had been under formerly, and that will lead me to near the time of her death, to shew why, and upon what accidents, she made away herself. I will not enumerate particulars by way of opening; only I must tell your lordship, that some letters of her's must of necessity be produced, which truly, as I said, I should not meddle with, if I had not these innocent gentlemen here to defend as well as myself. Perhaps it may be said, that in honour I ought to conceal the weakness of this gentlewoman; but then, in honour and justice to these gentlemen that are falsely accused with me, I cannot do it: I hope this one reason will excuse me to the world, for I have no other that could have obliged me to bring these letters upon the stage. I solemnly protest, if I stood here singly in the case of my own life, upon the evidence given against me, I take it to be so inconsiderable, I would not do it; but I must do it, to shew that these gentlemen also are innocent, and to preserve them, because I am satisfied in my own mind they are so. My lord, when I have done that, I shall shew your lordship in the next place, that it is utterly impossible I could be concerned in this fact, if I had had all the motives and provocations in the world to have done it; I shall shew your lordship, in point of time it could not be.

The maid Sarah Walker, who is the single witness, I take it, that says any thing in the least relating to me, said but now the clock had struck eleven before she carried up the coals, and about a quarter of an hour after, while she was warming the bed above stairs, she heard the door clap, and some time after that she came down and found that I and her mistress were gone. Now in point of time I shall prove it utterly impossible I could be guilty of the fact I am accused of, being seen to come into the Glove-inn, as the town-clock struck eleven, and staying there more than a quarter of an hour, was, after several things done at my lodging, in bed before twelve o'clock, and went no more out that night, as I shall prove. As for that little circumstance of sending for my horse, which they have made use of all along to back this prosecution, their very telling me of that matter, shews how much they are put to their shifts to justify their accusing me; I say in prudence I ought to have done what I did: I sent for him on the Tuesday; but, as their witness saith, I told him at the time I bid him fetch my horse, not to use then, nor till by the course of the circuit I was to go into Essex with the judges the next morning; and until then the prosecutor's witness, who is the hostler of the Glove-inn, was ordered to set him up there, to litter him down, and to take care of him and feed him, and that he should be ready for me to go to Chelmsford on the morrow, whither I went with the other counsel the next morning, being Wednesday: and this, my lord, is the whole of that matter.

My lord, this business slept near two months after the coroner's inquest before I heard of it, or imagined myself to be concerned in it, and was never stirred till two parties, differing on all other occasions, had laid their heads together: I beg leave to let your lordship a little into that matter, to shew you how this prosecution came to be managed with so much noise and violence as it hath been. I can make it appear, that one of the greatest of the Quakers, Mr. Mead by name, has very much, and indirectly too, concerned himself in this matter: it seems they fancy the reputation of their sect is concerned in it: for they think it a wonderful thing, nay, absolutely impossible (however other people may be liable to such resolutions,) that one who was by her education entitled to the 'light within her,' should run headlong into the water, as if she had been possessed with the devil; of this they think their sect is to be cleared, though by spilling the blood of four innocent men. The other sort of people that concur with the Quakers in this prosecution, I shall mention, now I come to observe what the witnesses are that have been produced against me; some of them I have nothing to object to, but that they are extreme indigent and poor, and have been helped by the prosecutor; those that are so, say nothing as to me; others, who live in this town, and give their opinions of the manner of her death, are possessed with much prejudice against me, upon feuds that have risen at the elections of my father and brother in this town; and these, with the Quakers, have wholly drest up this matter for several ends; the Quakers to maintain the reputation of their sect; and the others, to destroy, or break at least, the interest of my family in this place: but however effectual these designs may have been to have made a great noise in the world out of nothing, I am satisfied now that I am in a court of justice, where no person's reputation, much less his life, will be sacrificed to the policy or malice of a party without proof; and therefore I have taken up so much of your time, to set the true rise of this prosecution before you in a clear light.

My lord, as to my coming to this town on Monday, it was the first day of the assizes, and that was the reason that brought me hither: before I came out of town, I confess, I had a design to take a lodging at this gentlewoman's house; having been invited by letter so to do; and the reason why I did not was this: my brother, when he went the circuit, always favoured me with the offer of a part of his lodging, which out of good husbandry I always accepted: The last circuit was in parliament time, and my brother being in the Money-chair, could not attend the circuit as he used to do; he had very good lodgings, I think one of the best in this town, where I used to be with him; these were always kept for him, unless notice was given to the contrary. The Friday before I came down to the assizes, I happened to be in company with my brother and another gentleman, and then I shewed them the letter by which I was earnestly invited down to lie at the house of this gentlewoman during the assizes (it is dated the 9th of March last); and designing to comply with the invitation, I thereupon desired my brother to write to Mr. Barefoot, our landlord, and get him, if he could, to dispose of the lodgings; for, said I, if he keeps them they must be paid for, and then I cannot well avoid lying there: my brother did say he would write, if he could think on it; and thus, if Mr. Barefoot disposed of the lodgings, I own I intended to lie at the deceased's house; but if not, I looked on myself obliged to lie at Mr. Barefoot's. Accordingly I shall prove, as soon as ever I came to this town, in the morning of the first day of the assizes, I went directly to Mr. Barefoot's (the maid and all agree in this), and the reason was, I had not seen my brother after he said he would write, before I went out of London; and therefore it was proper for me to go first to Mr. Barefoot's, to know whether my brother had wrote to him, and whether he had disposed of his lodgings or not. As soon as I came to Mr. Barefoot's, there was one Mr. Taylor, of this town, came to me, and I in his hearing asked Mr. Barefoot, his wife, and maid-servant, one after another, if they had received a letter from my brother to unbespeak the lodgings; they told me no, that the room was kept for us; and I think they had made a fire, and that the sheets were airing. I was a little concerned he had not writ; but being satisfied that no letter had been received, I said immediately, as I shall prove by several witnesses, If it be so, I must stay with you, I will take up my lodging here: Thereupon I alighted, and sent for my bag from the coffee-house, and lodged all my things at Barefoot's, and thus I took up my lodging there as usual. I had no sooner done this, but Sarah Walker came to me from her mistress to invite me to dinner, and accordingly I went and dined there; and when I went away, it may be true, that being asked, I said I would come again at night; but that I said I would lie there, I do positively deny; and knowing I could not lie there, it is unlikely I should say so. My lord, at night I did come again, and paid her some money that I received from Mr. Loftus, who is the mortgager, for interest of the 200*l.* I before mentioned (it was 6*l.* odd money, in guineas and half-guineas): I writ a receipt, but she declined the signing of it, pressing me to stay there that night; which I refused; as engaged to lie at Mr. Barefoot's, and took my leave of her; and that very money which I paid her was found in her pocket, as I have heard, after she was drowned.

Now, my lord, the reason that I went to her house at night was, first, as I said, to pay her the interest money; in the next place, it was but fitting, when I found myself under a necessity of disappointing her, and lying at Barefoot's, to go to excuse my not lying there, which I had not an opportunity at dinner-time to do. My lord, I open my defence shortly, referring the particulars to the witnesses themselves, in calling those who will fully refute the suppositions and inferences made by the prosecutor, whom first, my lord, I shall begin with, to shew there is no evidence of any murder at all committed; and this, I say again, ought to be indisputably made manifest and proved, before any man can be so much as suspected for it.

Baron Hatsell. Do not flourish too much, Mr. Cowper; if you have opened all your evidence, call your witnesses; and when they have ended, then make your observations.

Mr. Cowper. Then, my lord, I will take up no more of your time in opening this matter. Call Robert Dew. (Who appeared.) When Mrs. Sarah Stout drowned herself, was not you a parish officer?

Dew. I was. I was next house to the Coach and Horses; and about six o'clock came a little boy (Thomas Parker's boy), and said there was a woman fallen into the river. I considered it was not my business, but the coroner's, and I sent the boy to the coroner, to acquaint him with it, and the coroner sent word by the boy, and desired she might be taken out; so I went to the river and saw her taken out: she lay in the river (as near as I could guess) half a foot in the water; she was covered with water; she had a striped petticoat on, but nothing could be seen of it above water. I heaved her up, and several sticks were underneath her, and flags; and when they took her out, she frothed at the nose and mouth.

Mr. Cowper. How was she? Was she driven between the stakes?

Dew. She lay on the right side, her head leaning rather downwards; and as they pulled her up, I cried, 'Hold, hold, hold, you hurt her arm;' and so they knelt down and took her arm from the stakes.

Mr. Cowper. Did you see any spot upon her arm?—Dew. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Cowper. What sort of spot was it?

Dew. It was reddish: I believe the stakes did it; for her arm hit upon the stake where she lay.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, how do these stakes stand about the bridge of the mill?

Dew. I suppose they stand about a foot asunder; they stand slanting, leaning down the stream a little.

Mr. Cowper. Could you discern her feet?

Dew. No, nothing like it, nor the striped petticoat she had on.

Mr. Cowper. Might not her knees and legs be upon the ground, for what you could see?

Dew. Truly, if I were put upon my oath, whether they were so, or not, I durst not swear it; sometimes the water there is four feet, sometimes three and a half; I believe her feet were very near the bottom.

Mr. Cowper. Are not the stakes nailed with their head against the bridge?

Dew. They are nailed to the side of the bridge.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, describe the manner in which they took her up.

Dew. They stooped down, and took her up.

Mr. Cowper. Did they take her up at once?

Dew. They had two heavings, or more.

Mr. Cowper. What was the reason they did not take her up at once?

Dew. Because I cried out, 'They hurt her arm.'

Mr. Cowper. Was she not within the stakes?

Dew. No, this shoulder kept her out.

Mr. Cowper. When you complained they hurt her arm, what answer did they make you?

Dew. They stooped down and took her arm out from between the stakes; they could not have got her out else.

Mr. Cowper. After she was taken out, did you observe any froth or foam come from her mouth or nose?

Dew. There was a white froth came from her, and as they wiped it away, it was on again presently.

Mr. Cowper. What was the appearance of her face and upper parts at that time?

Dew. She was so much disfigured, I believe that scarce any of her neighbours knew her, the slime of the water being upon her.

Mr. Cowper. Did you see her maid Sarah Walker at that time?—Dew. No.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, do you intend to spend so much time with every witness? I do not see to what purpose many of these questions are asked.

Mr. Cowper. I have done with him; call Young.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, I would not have you straiten yourself; but only ask those questions that are pertinent;

Mr. Cowper. Pray, give an account of what you know of the matter.

Young. On Tuesday morning, between 5 and 6 o'clock, last assizes—

Mr. Cowper. What officer was you?

Young. I was constable.

Mr. Cowper. Was you employed by the coroner?

Young. Not by him in person. Between five and 6 o'clock some of the men that came into my yard to work, told me a woman was drowned at the mill; I staid a little and went down to see, and when I came there I saw a woman, as they had told me, and I saw part of her coat lie on the top of the water to be seen, and I looked strictly and nicely within the bridge, and saw the face of a woman, and her left arm was on the outside the stakes, which I believe kept her from going through; so I looked upon her very wishfully, and was going back again; and as I came back I met with R. Dew and two of my neighbours, and they asked me to go back with them, and said they were going to take her up, and being constable, I told them I thought it was not proper to do it, and they said they had orders for it; so I being constable went back with them, and when I came there I found her in the same posture as before; we viewed her very wishfully; her coat that was draped near the stakes was seen, but none of her other parts, or her legs; and after we had looked a little while upon her, we spoke to Bell and Doe to take her up, and one of them took hold of her coat till he brought her above water; and as her arm drew up, I saw a black place, and she laid sideways, that he could not take her up till they had let her down again, and so they twisted her out sideways; for the stakes were so near together that she could not lie upon her belly, or upon her back; and when they had taken her up, they laid her down upon a green place, and after she was laid down, a great quantity of froth (like the froth of new beer) worked out of her nostrils.

Baron Hatsell. How much do you call a great quantity?

Young. It rose up in bladders, and run down on the sides of her face, and so rose again; and seeing her look like a gentlewoman, we desired one Ulse to search her pockets, to see if there were any letters, that we might know who she was; and the woman did, and I believe there was twenty or more of us that knew her very well when she was alive, and not one of us knew her then; and the woman searched her pockets, and took out six guineas, ten shillings, three pence halfpenny, and some other things; and after that I desired some of my neighbours to go with me and tell the money; for when it came to be known who she was, I knew we must give an account on it, and I laid it upon a block and told it, and they tied it up in a handkerchief, and I said I would keep the money, and they should seal it up to prevent any question about it; and during all this while of discourse, and sealing up the money, the froth still worked out of her mouth.

Mr. Cowper. Have you measured the depth of the water? What depth is it there?

Young. I measured the water this morning, and it was so high that it ran over the floodgate, and the height of it was about four foot two inches; but sometimes it is pent up to a greater height than it is to day.

Mr. Cowper. Was it higher to day than when the body was found?

Young. To the best of my remembrance, it was as high to day as it was then.

Mr. Cowper. Was any part of the body above water?

Young. No, nor nothing like the body could be seen.

Mr. Cowper. Could you see where her legs lay?

Young. No, nor nothing but her upper ends, which were driven against the stakes.

Mr. Cowper. Pray give an account how long she lay there, and when she was conveyed away?

Young. I stayed a quarter of an hour, and then I went and sealed up the money at my own house, so that I did not see her removed.

Mr. Jones. Was any body there besides yourself at this time?

Young. Yes; twenty people at the least.

Mr. Jones. Now here is ten of them that have sworn that the body was above the surface of the water.

Baron Hatsell. No, her cloaths, they say, were, but the body was something under the ship no more with that fact, but I will give you an account of the coroner's inquest, how diligent they were in their proceedings, and produce a copy of the inquisition itself, that she was found to have drowned herself.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, that is no evidence, if it be produced in order to contradict what these witnesses have said, that have been examined for the king; but if you will prove, that they have sworn otherwise before the coroner than they now do, then you say something, otherwise the coroner's inquest signifies nothing as to the present question.

Mr. Cowper. Call Thomas Wall. I am loth to be troublesome; but if you please to favour me, I desire to know of them, whether they do admit there was an inquisition, and that she was found 'non compos mentis,' and did kill herself.

Mr. Jones. We do, admit it.

Juryman. We desire it may be read.

Baron Hatsell. Why, will not you believe what they agree to on both sides?

Juryman. If they do agree so, I am satisfied.

Mr. Cowper. Thomas Wall, pray, do you give an account of what you knew of Mrs. Stout's being taken up.

Wall. My lord, I was one of the jury, that viewed her at the place where she was laid when she was taken up, and there was no marks upon her, only a little mark about her ear, and something near her collar bone; that was all I see upon her.

Mr. Cowper. Do you know any thing of any surgeons being employed to view those marks?

Wall. My lord, we had several persons that came before us that we examined; we had a dispute concerning these marks what might effect them, and we desired Mr. Dimdale and Mr. Camlin to see them, that we might be the better satisfied; and they both went down and viewed the body after it was brought down to Mrs. Stout's; and they came back, both of them, and Mr. John Dimdale told us, that these marks were no more than were usual in such cases, and it was only the stagnation of blood.

Mr. Cowper. Was it the old man or the young man?

Wall. It was the young man.

Mr. Cowper. Usual did he say?

Wall. I can tell the very words, I have them writ down.

Mr. Cowper. Pray do so, for he has denied it here.

Wall. (Looks on his paper.) Here it is. Mr. Dimdale and Mr. Camlin came to us, and Mr. Dimdale spake, and said these marks are usual, or might be usual; or if they were marks, it was no more than was usual in such cases; and that it was the stagnation of blood.

Mr. Cowper. Now you have your notes in your hand, pray, what did Sarah Walker say to you as to the time I went from Mrs. Stout's?

Wall. Sarah Walker said, it was about eleven o'clock when she took up coals to warm the bed, but she said she could not nor did not know when Mr. Cowper went out, for she warmed the bed, and Mr. Cowper not coming up; she took up some more coals, and tarried a little longer, and nobody coming up, she went down, and found Mr. Cowper was gone, and she looked into the parlour, and her mistress was gone.

Baron Hatsell. The woman said the same thing.

Mr. Cowper. It is necessary in this particulars to the time.

Baron Hatsell. She told you the clocks did differ.

(Then Mr. Bowden was called.)

Mr. Cowper. Well, what do you know of the taking up of Mrs. Stout?

Bowden. I went with the rest of the neighbours to view her, and I did perceive it was Mrs. Sarah Stout's body, though some questioned it: I do believe I was the second person that discovered it was she; and, my lord, I did see a great deal of froth that came out of her mouth and nostrils.

Mr. Cowper. Did you go about to wipe it away?

Bowden. No, but some other persons did; it came out in a great quantity.

Mr. Jones. How much do you call a quantity?

Bowden. Her mouth and nostrils were very full of it.

Mr. Jones. Was not her mouth shut?

Bowden. I did not observe that.

Mr. Cowper. How long had she lain there before you came?

Bowden. I believe I was there in half an hour; as soon as I heard the report of it I went down.

Mr. Cowper. Call Mr. Shute.

Baron Hatsell. Well, what can you say to this matter?

Shute. Sir, I was summoned upon the jury upon the coroner's inquest; and I perceived when I was there, that the same stuff worked out of Mrs. Stout's nostrils as worked out of the child's.

Baron Hatsell. What child is that you speak of? Is it the child that was drowned in the same place as Mrs. Stout was?—Shute. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I am very tender how I take up your lordship's time; and therefore I will not trouble you with any more witnesses upon this head; but, with your lordship's leave, I will proceed to call some physicians of note; and, enunue, to confront the learning of the gentlemen on the other side.—Dr. Sloane, you were in court when these gentlemen delivered their opinion concerning Mrs. Stout's having no water in her; I desire you would give your opinion in that matter.

Dr. Sloane. I have not heard them very particularly or distinctly, because of the great crowd; some of them I have; cases of this kind are very uncommon, and none of them have fallen directly under my own knowledge. As to my opinion of drowning, it is plain; that if a great quantity of water be swallowed by the gullet into the stomach, it will not suffocate or drown the person: Drunkards, who swallow freely a great deal of liquor, and those who are forced by the civil law to drink a great quantity of water, which in giving the question (as it is called) is poured into them by way of torture to make them confess crimes, have no suffocation or drowning happen to them: But on the other hand, when any quantity comes into the windpipe, so as it does hinder or intercept the inspiration, or coming in of the air, which is necessary for respiration, or breathing, the person is suffocated. Such a small quantity will do, as sometimes in prescriptions, when people have been very weak, or forced to take medicines, I have observed some spoonfuls in that condition (if it went the wrong way) to have choked or suffocated the person: I take drowning in a great measure to be thus; and though it is very likely when one struggles he may (to save himself from being choked) swallow some quantity of water, yet that is not the cause of his death, but that which goes into the windpipe and lungs. Whether a person comes dead or alive into the water, I believe some quantity will go into the windpipe; and I believe, without force after death, little will get into the stomach, because that it should, swallowing is necessary, which after death cannot be done.

Baron Hatsell. Pray, doctor, I understand you say this; that in case a person is drowned, that there may be but little water in the stomach?

Dr. Sloane. That it is accidental, my lord.

Baron Hatsell. But what do you say to this? If there had been water in the body, would it not have putrified the parts after it had lain six weeks?

Dr. Sloane. My lord, I am apt to think it would have putrified the stomach less than the lungs, because the stomach is a part of the body that is contrived by nature partly to receive liquids; but the contrivance of the lungs is only for the receiving of air; they being of a spongy nature, the water might sink more into them than the stomach; but I believe it might putrify there too after some time. I am apt to think, that when a body is buried under ground, according to the depth of the grave, and difference of the weather and soil, the fermentation may be greater or lesser, and that according to the several kinds of meats or liquids in the stomach, the putrefaction will likewise vary; so that it seems to me to be very uncertain.

Baron Hatsell. But when they are in a coffin, how is it then?

Dr. Sloane. No doubt there will be a fermentation more or less, according as the air comes more or less to the body. Indeed it may be otherwise, where the air is wholly shut out, which is supposed to be the way of embalming, or preserving of dead bodies of late, without the use of any spices, which is thought in a great measure to be brought about by the closeness of the coffin, and hindering of the air from coming into the body.

Mr. Cowper. Is it possible, in your judgment, for any water to pass into the thorax?

Dr. Sloane. I believe it is hardly possible that any should go from the windpipe into the cavity of the thorax, without great violence and force; for there is a membrane that covers the outside of the lungs, that will hinder the water from passing through it into any part without them.

Mr. Cowper. Now, do you think it possible to find water in a drowned body after six weeks time?

Dr. Sloane. I am apt to think if there was any quantity in the lungs, the sponginess of the part would suck up some part of it. As to the stomach, I have not known it tried; but it is like, if there was a great fermentation, a great deal of it would rise up in vapours or steams, and go off that way.

Mr. Cowper. Dr. Garth, I cannot tell whether you were in court when the surgeons who are witnesses for the king gave their evidence.

Dr. Garth. Yes, I was.

Mr. Cowper. Then I desire you, Sir, to give your opinion as to those particulars.

Dr. Garth. I observed in this trial, the first gentleman called for the king that spoke to this matter was Mr. Coatsworth: He saith he was sent for to open her, upon an aspersion of her being said to be with child. I agree with him in what he speaks to that point, but must differ with him where he infers she was murdered, because he found no great quantity of water in her, as also her head extremely mortified, but not her lungs (lungs and bowels I think were used promiscuously.) Now, my lord, as to the matter of putrifaction, I think it is not much material whether there be any water or no in the cavities of the body; if water would hasten putrifaction, it would do it as well in the lungs as otherwise; there is always some water in the lymphducts there, the breaking of which may be one occasion of catarrhs. As to what relates to the putrifaction of the head, it may happen from a stoppage of the reflux blood, which is staid there in a great quantity, through the suffocation in the water, or from the nearness of the brain, which is observed often to mortify first.

The next was Mr. Dimsdale (I would speak to them all in order if my memory would permit); I think he was of the same opinion as Mr. Coatsworth; he laid the stress of his suspicion upon the mortification of the head, which I think is not at all material, no more than what they infer from her floating; it being impossible the body should have floated, unless it had rested, or had been entangled among the stakes, because all dead bodies (I believe) fall to the bottom, unless they be prevented by some extraordinary tumour. My lord we have not only philosophy, but experiments for this. The witnesses all agree she was found upon her side, which to suppose her to float in this posture, is as hard to be conceived, as to imagine a shilling should fall down and rest upon its edge rather than its broad side; or that a deal board should rather float edgewise than otherwise; therefore it is plain she was entangled, or else the posture had been otherwise.

As to the quantity of water, I do not think it necessary it should be very great. I must own, the water will force itself into all cavities where there is no resistance. I believe when she threw herself in, she might not struggle to save herself, and by consequence not sup up much water. Now there is no direct passage into the stomach but by the gullet, which is contracted or pursed up by a muscle in nature of a sphincter: for if this passage was always open like that of the wind-pipe, the weight of the air would force itself into the stomach, and we should be sensible of the greatest inconveniences. I doubt not, but that some water fell into her lungs, because the weight of it would force itself down; but if we consider the wind-pipe with its ramifications as one cylinder, the calculation of its contents will not amount to above twenty-three or twenty four solid inches of water, which is not a pint, and which might imperceptibly work and fall out. I remember I offered a wager at Garraway's coffee-house to a gentleman here in court.

Baron Hatsell. Pray, doctor, tell us your opinion as to what the seaman said, and also as to what Dr. Sloane said, whether water in the body will putrify it?

Dr. Garth. I say not; for in some places they keep flesh-meat from corrupting by preserving it in water, and it is well known it will putrify less so, than when exposed to air.

Baron Hatsell. But what do you say as to the sinking of dead bodies in water?

Dr. Garth. If a strangled body be thrown into the water, the lungs being filled with air, and a cord left about the neck, it is possible it may float because of the included air, as a bladder would; but here is neither cord, nor any mark of it, nor nothing but a common stagnation.

Baron Hatsell. But you do not observe my question; the seaman said, that those that die at sea, and are thrown overboard, if you do not tie a weight to them, they will not sink what say you to that?

Dr. Garth. My lord, no doubt in this they are mistaken. The seamen are a superstitious people, they fancy that whistling at sea will occasion a tempest: I must confess I never saw any body thrown over-board, but I have tried some experiments on other dead animals, and they will certainly sink; we have tried this since we came hither. Now, my lord, I think, we have reason to suspect the seaman's evidence; for he saith, that threescore pound of iron is allowed to sink the dead bodies, whereas six or seven pounds would do as well. I cannot think the commissioners of the navy guilty of so ill husbandry; but the design of tying weights to their bodies, is to prevent their floating at all, which, otherwise would happen in some few days; therefore, what I say is this, that if these gentlemen had found a cord, or the point of it, about the neck of this unfortunate gentleman, or any wound that had occasioned her death, they might then have said something.

Mr. Cowper. Do you apprehend that any quantity of water can enter into the cavity of the thorax?

Dr. Garth. It is impossible there should till the lungs be quite rotten; there is no way but by the lungs, which are invested with so strong a membrane, that we cannot force breath with our blow-pipes through it; and there is a great providence in such a texture; for if there were any large pores in the membrane, the air would pass through it into the cavity of the thorax, and prevent the dilatation of the lungs, and by consequence there would be an end of breathing.

Mr. Cowper. Dr. Morley, pray, be pleased to give your opinion of these matters.

Dr. Morley. Those which seem to be questions of greatest moment, are whether there was a necessity for this body (if drowned) to have a great quantity of water in it, and whether bodies thrown dead into the water float. To the first I answer positively, that there is no absolute necessity that she should have a great quantity of water in her; and I think the question Mr. Cowper asked Dr. Coatsworth, whether he had like to have been drowned by accident or design, suits with my assertion; for if this gentleman did voluntarily drown herself, she then, in all likelihood, threw herself into the water, with a resolution of keeping her breath for a speedy suffocation; and then if upon the first endeavours for respiration (which naturally must be) she drew into her lungs two ounces of water, it was the same thing to drowning of her, as if there had been two tun. We see the same thing done by divers in order to save themselves, as it happened to this unfortunate gentleman, in her design of destroying herself: if a diver, before he comes to the surface of water, should so far mistake his power of holding his breath, that he should be forced to endeavour respiration, the little water he drew into his lungs by his attempt to respire, may drown him. We last night drowned a dog, and afterwards dissected him, and found not a spoonful of water in his stomach, and, I believe, about two ounces in his lungs; while we were doing this, we drowned another, and he lay at the bottom and did not float: no more would he have done, if he had been hanged before thrown into the water: we took him up, and opening him, we found much about the same quantity of water in his lungs, and little or none in his stomach. They both froth'd at nose and mouth, because the water coming into the little bladder of the lungs, and there meeting with air, a commotion arose between the water and air, which caused the froth. To the second question, I think if bodies new-killed swim, it is by accident; for the reason that bodies swim, is because by purification they rarify, by rarification they grow lighter, which brings them to the top of the water.

Mr. Cowper. I desire to know if any man of skill in prudence would give his opinion?

Baron Hatsell. This is not a proper question.

Mr. Cowper. Then I will ask it thus: do you think, doctor, it is to be known six weeks after, if a person was drowned?

Dr. Morley. I think it is morally impossible.

Mr. Cowper. Can there be any water in the thorax?

Dr. Morley. By an imposthume or some violence to nature, possibly; but I think no otherwise.

Mr. Cowper. Dr. Woollaston, what is your opinion, if a person be drowned, whether it can be discovered six weeks after?

Dr. Woollaston. My lord, I think it is impossible to be known; for if there had been never so much water in the body at first, it could not lie there so long, but must of necessity have forced its way out. We see in persons that die of dropsies, that the water will work itself out (and sometimes burst the body) before it is buried; and I am sure, if it do so in dropsies, where there are no visible passages for it to get out at, it must do so much more in drowned persons, where the water lies only in the stomach and guts, and has nothing to hinder its working out when it ferments, as it always doth.

Mr. Cowper. Have you ever made any experiments in that nature, doctor?

Dr. Woollaston. I have made no experiments, but I have seen a very particular instance.

Baron Hatsell. That is very well; pray let us hear it, doctor.

Dr. Woollaston. My lord, about three years since, I saw two men that were drowned out of the same boat. They were taken up the next day after they were drowned: one of them was indeed prodigiously swelled, so much that his cloaths were burst in several places of his sides and arms, and his stockings in the seams; his hands and fingers were strangely extended; his face was almost all over black; but the other was not in the least swelled in any part, nor discoloured; he was as hale, I believe, as ever he was in his life-time; and there was not the least sign of any water in him, except the watery froth at his mouth and nostrils. My lord, this I saw myself, and took very particular notice of it.

Mr. Jones. Did you see these bodies taken out of the water yourself, doctor?

Dr. Woollaston. No, Sir.

Mr. Jones. How long had they been taken out when you saw them?

Dr. Woollaston. I enquired, and to the best of my memory, it was that same day.

Baron Hatsell. But what do you think, doctor, of a person's being drowned without sinking in any water?

Dr. Woollaston. My lord, what is taken in is, I believe, chiefly on the surface of the water.

when they open their mouths for breath, and the water that rises in they are forced to drink down, to keep it from the lungs; but when the head is quite under water, I don't think it is possible for any quantity to get down into the stomach; because it being breath they open for, the very first water they take in would of necessity fill the lungs; and, when the breath is stopped, I don't see how they can swallow.

Mr. Cowper. Dr. Gelstrop, what is your opinion of this matter?

Dr. Gelstrop. I don't think they can make any judgment of persons being drowned after six weeks time.

Mr. Cowper. Can any water get into the thorax?

Dr. Gelstrop. No, not unless the lungs be purtified.

Mr. Cowper. Is a great quantity of water necessary to persons dying by drowning?

Dr. Gelstrop. No; only so much as may hinder respiration.

Mr. Cowper. Now, my lord, I would call Mr. William Cowper; and because of his name, I must acquaint your lordship, that he is not at all related to me, though I should be proud to own him if he were so: he is a man of great learning, and, I believe, most people admit him the best anatomist in Europe. Mr. Cowper, pray will you give your opinion of this matter.

Mr. W. Cowper. My lord, I hope what I shall say will not be suspected because I am of the same name, for this gentleman is an utter stranger to me.

Baron Hatsell. Pray, Mr. Cowper, without any apology, give your opinion concerning persons drowned, and how it is with them in their inward parts.

Mr. W. Cowper. I will give you a short account, I hope to your satisfaction too, my lord. I will not only speak from reason, but give you the testimony of the experiments I have made upon this occasion. My lord, I heard it made a mighty argument, that this person had no water that seemed to flow out; but the witnesses agree that there was a froth. Now, my lord, it was not reasonable to expect any thing but froth. My lord, had she been thrown into the water, and made her utmost efforts, which she would then have done to have saved herself, and been often buoyed up to the top of the water, so doubt but she would have swallowed a considerable quantity of water before she had been drowned; and it may be expected to flow from her, if her head had been inclined downwards.

This is a truth that no man can deny, who is acquainted with any thing of this nature, that when the head of an animal is under water, the first time it is obliged to inspire (or draw in air) the water will necessarily flow into its lungs, as the air would do if it were out of the water; which quantity of water (if the dimensions of the windpipe, and its branches in the lungs, be considered) will not amount to three inches square, which is about three ounces of water. Nor is a greater quantity of water in the windpipe necessary to choke any person, if we do but reflect what an ebullition is caused by its meeting with the air which remained in the lungs, whereby a small quantity of water is converted into froth, and the channel of the windpipe, and those of the bronchia, are filled with it, insomuch that no air can enter the lungs for the office of respiration. After a suffocation is thus commenced (I am apt to think) all regular animal actions are perverted, and particularly that of swallowing (or deglutition); and what water flows into the lungs at the instant, or after this suffocation, is from its own weight, which is more or less as the body is farther under, or nearer the surface of the water. My lord, I do not speak this by way of conjecture or hypothesis, but I have made experiments, which have suggested what I here offer. I shall by the bye tell you how fallacious the first experiment was, when I proposed to satisfy myself, whether a dead body would float in water? it happened that a spaniel, that had a great deal of long hair, was hanged for this purpose, which I found to swim on the surface of the water; but when I considered that his hair might buoy him up, I caused another dog, which had shorter and less hair, to be hanged and put into the water, which (agreeable to what I had always conceived of a human body) sunk directly to the bottom. In order to satisfy myself what quantity of water was necessary to enter the body of an animal, and cause a suffocation in water, I caused three dogs, when alive, to be suddenly plunged under water till they were stifled; one was before I left London; the other two I made the experiment on last night, in the presence of Dr. Sloane and Dr. Morley, and we could not compute there was more than three ounces of water in their lungs, and none that we could perceive in their stomachs.

Dead bodies necessarily sink in water, if no distention of their parts buoy them up; this distention sometimes happens before death, at other times soon after, and in bodies that are drowned after they lie under water: This enlargement of them is caused by a rarefaction of the humours within the cavities, and the bodies necessarily rise to the surface of the water. Your lordship may infer this from what the seamen told you; and the great weight they use to fasten to their bodies that die of disease, was not of such use to sink them, as it was to prevent their floating afterwards; so that the weight was necessary for those that were killed, as well as those that died of diseases.

It is so commonly known, that the contents in the stomach of a dead body are discharged by the mouth and nostrils, so soon as it begins to ferment, and the belly becomes distended, that it is no wonder that water, if the greatest quantity of that had been in the stomach, or any thing else that was fluid, must be forced from them six weeks after death.

My lord, I cannot but think it ridiculous to expect water in the cavity of the thorax; it is such a conceit as nothing in nature can account for, in the lungs, had suffered some apposition, or the like, whereby the water may pass their outward membranes into that cavity.

Mr. Cowper. With your lordship's favour, I now think it a proper time to make this observation. The witnesses that have given evidence for the king do say, they believe she was not drowned; but they have not pretended to say how she died otherwise.

Baron Hatsell. That is very true.

Mr. Cowper. Dr. Crell, I desire you will be pleased to give an account of this matter.

Dr. Crell. My lord, I have little to say in this affair, the physicians that have been examined already having made it out, that persons who are drowned may have but little water in their bodies; but I have taken what pains I could, upon so short warning, and I will tell you the opinion of several eminent authors. My own opinion is, that a very small quantity of water, not exceeding three ounces, is sufficient to drown any body; and I believe that the reason of the suffocation, or of any person's being stifled under water, is from the intercepting of the air, that the person cannot breathe, without which he cannot live. Now, my lord, I will give you the opinion of several ancient authors.

Baron Hatsell. Pray, doctor, tell us your own observations.

Dr. Crell. My lord, it must be reading, as well as a man's own experience, that will make any one a physician; for without the reading of books of that art, the art itself cannot be attained to: besides, my lord, I humbly conceive, that in such a difficult case as this, we ought to have a great deference for the reports and opinions of learned men: Neither do I see any reason why I should not quote the fathers of my profession in this case, as well as you gentlemen of the long robe quote Coke upon Littleton in others: But I shall not trouble the court long; I shall only insist upon what Ambrose Parey relates in his chapter of Renunciations. He was chief surgeon to Francis the 1st, employed by him in most of his sieges and battles against the emperor Charles the 5th, and consequently must observe, and could not be ignorant of such like casualties in such great bodies of men. He tells us, that the certain sign of a man's being drowned, is an appearance of froth about his nostrils and mouth. Now, my lord, I think that every one of the king's evidences observed it in the present case, and a woman swore, that she saw her purge at the nose; which could not be, as he declares, if the person had been strangled, or otherwise killed before. As to the quantity of water requisite to drown a person, I believe that three ounces, or less, is enough; to wit, as much as will fill the windpipe, and so stop the breathing of the person drowning. I am not now to descend upon matter of fact, whether she drowned herself; but my firm opinion is, that she was drowned; for though sometimes, not always, there is water found in the bodies of such persons; yet wherever it be, besides the lungs, it is superfluous as to this end, and accidental upon violent strugglings.

Mr. Cowper. I desire Mr. Harriot may be asked what observations he hath made concerning this matter.

Mr. Harriot. My lord, when I was a surgeon in the fleet, I made it always my observation, when we threw men overboard that were killed, some of them swam, and some sunk; and I remember particularly, when the Sandwich was burnt, we saw abundance leap off from on board, and they sunk directly, but in a little time I observed some swim again.

Baron Hatsell. When a dead body is thrown overboard, does it sink or swim?

Mr. Harriot. I always observed that it did sink: When we were in the channel, and in time of peace, we never threw any overboard but we put some weight to them; but it was not to make them sink, but for decency sake, that they might not be driven to shore when they began to float.

Mr. Cowper. I desire that Mr. Bartlet may be asked to the same purpose.

Mr. Bartlet. I have been in several of the king's ships of war that have been disabled and forced to lie by, in several engagements between the French and English, and I never saw any bodies float, either of the men that were killed in our ship, or in the ships that have been near us; I have not seen a body upon the surface of the water.

Baron Hatsell. Another witness said, that after an engagement he saw them swimming.

Mr. Bartlet. I cannot tell what he saw, my lord; but what I say I am ready to make oath of.

Mr. Cowper. Dr. Camlin, will you please to give my lord and the jury an account whether you were employed by the coroner's inquest to view the body of Mrs. Stout after she was drowned, and the marks upon it, and tell my lord your opinion of it?

Mr. Camlin. I was sent for by the coroner and the jury that sat upon the body of Mrs. Sarah Stout, the coroner being then at her mother's house, and the coroner desired Mr. Dimsdale and me to go and take notice of the marks upon her neck, and upon her breast: We viewed all about, and perceived a mark under her left ear; we looked to see if there was any confusion, and we perceived a settlement of blood upon her breast, and another upon her arm; and when we came back, Mr. Dimsdale made a report, I stood by him at that time, that it was only a common settlement.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, Mr. Camlin, was the spot above or below the collar bone?

Mr. Camlin. Below the collar bone.

Mr. Cowper. What did Mr. John Dimsdale say then concerning this matter?

Mr. Camlin. I understood that he was of opinion, that it was only a common stagnation of blood, that happens in the case of drowned people.

Baron Hatsell. Did he say so to the jury?

Mr. Camlin. Mr. Dimsdale spake for us both, and I understood him, that it was a stagnation that did commonly happen to drowned people; and that was my opinion of it too.

Mr. Cowper. And that you agreed to be your report?—Mr. Camlin. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, Mr. Camlin, was you present when the child that was drowned in the same place was taken up?

Mr. Camlin. Yes; it was taken up some time after, near the same place, as I was told, and there was more and greater signs of the stagnation of blood on the body of this child, than on the body of Mrs. Stout; the child's face was black and discoloured.

Baron Hatsell. How old was the child?

Mr. Camlin. Between ten and eleven, as near as I could guess.

Baron Hatsell. Had Mrs. Stout any signs of being strangled when you saw her first?

Mr. Camlin. Nothing at all, that I could discern.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, I will give you no more trouble upon this head; I shall go now to the next thing I opened, and shall prove substantially, that this gentlewoman is not only more to be suspected to have murdered herself than to be murdered by any body; but it is almost a certainty that she was the cause of her own death. Mr. Firmin I would begin withal, if he be here. (But he not presently appearing.) Then, my lord, if you please, I will desire Mr. Bowd in the mean time to give your lordship an account of what he knows of the melancholy of this gentlewoman.

Mr. Bowd. It was much about this time twelve-month I had some business in London, and she sent to me, to know when I should go to London; and I waited upon her before I went, and she desired me to do some business for her; and when I returned, I acquainted her with what I had done; and sitting together in the hall, I asked her, what is the matter with you? Said I, there is something more than ordinary; you seem to be melancholy. Saith she, you are come from London, and you have heard something or other: said I, I believe you are in love. In love! said she. Yes, said I, Cupid, that little boy, hath struck you home: she took me by the hand; Truly, said she, I must confess it; but I did think I should never be guilty of such a folly: and I answered again, I admire that should make you uneasy; if the person be not of that fortune as you are, you may, if you love him, make him happy, and yourself easy. That cannot be, saith she: the world shall not say I change my religion for a husband. And some time after I had been in London, having bought some India goods, she came to my shop and bought some of me for a gown, and afterwards she came to pay me for it; and I asked her, How do you like it? have you made it up? No, said she, and I believe I shall never live to wear it.

Mr. Cowper. Pray how long is it since?

Bowd. It was about February or January before her death. I asked her, why she did not come to my house oftener? She said, she had left off all company, and applied herself to reading; and company was indifferent to her.

Mr. Cowper. Mr. Firmin, will you please to inform my lord and the jury what you know of Mrs. Sarah Stout's being melancholy?

Firmin. I did observe about three quarters of a year ago, that she was melancholy; I cannot say that she acknowledged herself to be so, but I have charged her with it.

Mr. Cowper. Did you believe she was melancholy when you charged her with it?

Firmin. Yes, I did.

Mr. Cowper. Mrs. Bendy, if you please to inform the court what you know of this gentlewoman's being melancholy.

Mrs. Bendy. Sir, I can say she always acknowledged herself extremely melancholy; and when I have asked her how she did, she has said, pretty well in health, but so much troubled with melancholy she could not tell what to do with herself.

Mr. Cowper. Did she tell you any thing particularly?

Mrs. Bendy. It disordered her so, she said, that she had rather have chosen sickness than so much disorder in her mind.

Mr. Cowper. Have you any thing more to recollect?

Mrs. Bendy. Nothing but what I heard from Mrs. Cowper.

Baron Hatsell. How old was this gentlewoman?

Mrs. Bendy. About six-and-twenty.

Mr. Cowper. Call Mrs. Jane Low, Martha Grub and Mrs. Cowper. Mrs. Low, pray do you inform my lord and the jury what you know concerning the melancholy of Mrs. Sarah Stout, and when you first observed it?

Mrs. Low. It was a week before Whitsuntide was twelve-month.

Mr. Cowper. What did she say then?

Mrs. Low. She often complained to me, that she was very melancholy and uneasy; one time particularly, as we were walking together in the fields, I asked her the occasion of it; and she told me, that was a secret; but she said, she led a very melancholy life: said I, I am apt to believe you are in love; she did not disown it, and with a little more speaking she owned she was. I asked her who the person was; she said, that should be a secret, but it would end her days: said I, a woman of your fortune may command any body: she shook her head and said, no; perhaps, said I, he may not be a Quaker, and you may be afraid of disobliging your mother; but if you tell your mother that your life depends upon it, your mother (rather than lose her only child) will consent to it: she said, no; it was a person she could not marry; and shook her head, and looked very melancholy.

Mr. Cowper. When was this?

Mrs. Low. This was the week before Whitsuntide; and in Whitsun-week she saw the often, and said, she would take her full swing of melancholy when her mother was away; and she used to lie a-bed that week.

Mr. Cowper. Have you observed any melancholy in her since?

Mrs. Low. Yes, at several times.

Mr. Cowper. Do you remember any thing of an intermitting fever?

Mrs. Low. Yes; she told me her melancholy had occasioned an intermitting fever; and I mentioned Dr. Baile to her, and she said her distemper lay in her mind, and not in her body, and she would take nothing, and the sooner it did kill her the better.

Mr. Cowper. Did she say any thing of her disposition to reading?

Mrs. Low. She said, nothing delighted her now, neither reading nor any thing else.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, Sarah Walker, when I asked her if she did not observe the melancholy of her mistress, and whether she had not said that her mistress had been melancholy? denied that she had said so: pray have you heard her say any thing to that purpose?

Mrs. Low. I have often asked her how her mistress did, and she would answer, very much indisposed, but not otherwise.

Mr. Cowper. Mrs. Cowper, what do you know of Mrs. Stout's melancholy?

Mr. Cowper. My lord, this is my brother's wife.

Mrs. Cowper. About spring was twelve months she came up to London, and I believe it was not less than once or twice a week I saw her; and I never had an opportunity to be an hour alone with her at any time but I perceived something of her melancholy. I have asked her the reason of it several times, and sometimes she seemed to dislike her profession, being a Quaker; and sometimes she would say, that she was uneasy at something that lay upon her spirits, which she should never outlive; and that she should never be well while she was in this world. Sometimes I have endeavoured to persuade her out of it seriously, and sometimes by raillery, and have said, are you sure you shall be better in another world? And particularly I remember I have said to her, I believe you have Mr. Marshall in your head; either have him, or do not trouble yourself about him; make yourself easy either one way or another; and she hath said no, in an indifferent way, I cannot make myself easy: Then I have said, marry him; no, saith she, I cannot. Sometimes with company she would be diverted, and had frequently a way of throwing her hands, and shewed great disturbance and uneasiness. This time twelvemonth, at the summer amaze, I was here six days, and knew her every day; and one time, among other discourses she told me she had received great disturbance from one Theophilus, a widdowman, and a Quaker, who coming down to visit Mrs. Stout, that was then lame, she had gathered about 80 or 90 people together to hear him preach; and she said he directed his discourse to her, and exasperated her at that rate, that she had thoughts of seeing nobody again, and said, she took it extremely ill to be so used, and particularly, that he told her that her mother's falling outwardly in the bath should be a warning that she did not fall inwardly; and such a canting stuff, as she called it; and she said, that Theophilus had so used her, that she was ashamed to shew her head. Another time, the same week, she had a fever, and she said, she was in great hopes it would end her days; and that she neglected herself in doing those things that were necessary for her health, in hopes it would carry her off, and often wished herself dead. Another time, which I think was the last time I saw her, it was at my sister's lodgings, and I sent for her to drink a dish of tea with us, and she came in a great toss and melancholy: Said I, what is the matter, you are always in this humour? Saith she, I cannot help it, I shall never be otherwise. Saith my sister, for God's sake keep such thoughts out of your head as you have had, do not talk any more of throwing yourself out of window: Saith she, I may thank God that ever I saw your face, otherwise I had done it, but I cannot promise I shall not do it.

Baron Hutsell. What is your name, madam?

Mr. Cowper. It is my brother's wife, my lord. I desire Mrs. Toller may give an account of what she knows as to her being melancholy.

Mrs. Toller. My lord, she was once to see me, and she looked very melancholy, and I asked her what was the matter? and she said, something had vexed her that day; and I asked her the cause of it, and she stopped a little while, and then said, she would drown herself out of the way.

Baron Hutsell. How long ago was this?

Mrs. Toller. About three quarters of a year ago.

John Stout. I desire to know whether she has always said so, or not told another story.

Mrs. Toller. I told you no story; it may be I did not say so much to you, but I said she talked something of drowning. I have been with her when Mr. Cowper's conversation and name has been mentioned, and she said she kept but little company; that sometimes she went to Mrs. Low's, and that she kept home but civil modest company, and that Mr. Cowper was a civil modest gentleman, and that she had nothing to say against him.

Mr. Cowper. This is Mrs. Ellis Toller, my lord.

Ellis Toller. My lord, she came to see me some time after Christmas, and seemed not so cheerful as she used to be; and I, what is the matter? Why are you not so merry as you used to be? Why do you not come often to see me? Saith she, I do not think to go abroad so much as I used to do, and said, it would be as much a rarity to see her go abroad, as to see the sun shine by night.

Mr. Cowper. Mrs. Grub, what do you know concerning Mrs. Stout's pulling out a letter at her brother, Mr. John Stout's? Give an account of it, and what she said upon that occasion.

Mrs. Grub. I have a daughter that lives at Guernsey, and she sent me a letter, and I prayed Mrs. Sarah Stout to read the letter; and while she was reading it I cried; saith she, why do you cry? said I, because my child is so far off. Saith she, if I live till winter is over, I will go over sea as far as I can for the land.

Baron Hatsell. What was the occasion of her saying so?

Mrs. Grub. I was washing my master's study; Mrs. Sarah Stout came in, and I had a letter from my daughter at Guernsey, and I prayed Mrs. Sarah Stout to read it, and she read my letter, and I cried, and she asked me, why I cried? said I, because my child is so far off: Saith she, if I live to winter, or till winter is over, I will go over sea as far as I can for the land.

Mr. Cowper. Now, my lord, to bring this matter of melancholy to the point of time, I will call one witness more, who will speak of a remarkable instance that happened on Saturday before the Monday when she did destroy herself.

Call Mr. Joseph Taylor. Pray, will you inform the court and jury of what you observed on Saturday before the Monday on which Mrs. Stout destroyed herself.

J. Taylor. I happened to go in at Mr. Firmin's shop, and there she sat the Saturday before this accident happened, the former assizes, and I was saying to her, Madam, I think you look strangely discontented; I never saw you dressed so in my life: Saith she, the dress will serve me as long as I shall have occasion for a dress.

Mr. Cowper. In what posture did she appear in the shop?

J. Taylor. She appeared to be very melancholy.

Mr. Cowper. What part of her dress did you find fault with?

J. Taylor. It was her head cloaths.

Mr. Cowper. What was the matter with them?

J. Taylor. I thought her head was dawbed with some kind of grease or charcoal.

Mr. Cowper. What answer did she make?

J. Taylor. She said, they would serve her time.

Mr. Cowper. As to this piece of evidence, if your lordship pleases, I desire it may be particularly taken notice of; it was her head-dress that she said would serve her time.

Pray, Mr. Taylor, was you at Mr. Barefoot's when I came there on Monday morning?

J. Taylor. Yes; I went up stairs with you into your chamber.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, what did I say to Mr. Barefoot?

J. Taylor. You asked him if they had received a letter from your brother, and he said, No, not that he knew of, but he would call his wife, and he did call his wife, and asked her if she had received a letter, and she said, No; then said you, I will take up this lodging for mine; and accordingly you went up stairs, and I went with you, and staid there about four times as long as I have been here.

Mr. Cowper. Are you very sure that I said, I would take up my lodgings there?

J. Taylor. Yes, I am very sure of it.

Baron Hatsell. What time of the day was it?

J. Taylor. It was the fore part of the day: while I was there, my lord, Mrs. Sarah Stout's maid came to invite Mr. Cowper to her house to dinner.

Mr. Cowper. Did you know any thing of my sending to the coffee-house?

J. Taylor. You sent to the coffee-house for your things.

Baron Hatsell. Did Mr. Cowper use to sit at Mrs. Barefoot's?

J. Taylor. His brother did, but I do not know whether this gentleman did, but at that time he took up that place for his lodging; and said, it was all one, my brother must pay for it, and therefore I will take it up for myself.

Mr. Cowper. Call Mrs. Barefoot and her maid.

[But they not presently appearing.]

Mr. Cowper. My lord, in the mean time I will go on to the other part of my evidence, in opening of which I shall be very short.

My lord, my wife lodging at Hertford, occasioned me frequently to come down. Mrs. Stout became well acquainted with her: When business was over in the long vacation, I resided pretty much at Hertford, and Mr. Marshall came down to pay me a visit, and this introduced his knowledge of Mrs. Stout. When she was first acquainted with him she received him with a great deal of civility and kindness, which induced him to make his addresses to her, as he did, by way of courtship. It happened one evening that she and one Mrs. Crook, Mr. Marshall and myself, were walking together, and Mr. Marshall and Mrs. Crook going some little way before us, she took this opportunity to speak to me in such terms, I must confess, as surprized me. Says she, Mr. Cowper, I did not think you had been so dull. I was inquisitive to know in what my dulness did consist. Why, says she, do you imagine I intend to marry Mr. Marshall? I said I thought she did, and that if she did not, she was much to blame in what she had done: No, says she, I thought it might serve to divert the censure of the world, and favour our acquaintance. My lord, I have some original letters under her own hand which will make this fully manifest; I will produce the letters after I have called Mr. Marshall. Mr. Marshall.

Mr. Marshall. If your lordship pleases, it was in the long vacation I came down to spend a little of my leisure time at Hertford; the reason of my going thither was, because Mr. Cowper was there at that time. The first night when I came down I found Mrs. Sarah Stout visiting at Mr. Cowper's lodgings, and there I first came acquainted with her; and she afterwards gave me frequent opportunities of improving that acquaintance; and by the manner of my reception by her, I had no reason to suspect the use it seems I was designed for. When I came to town, my lord, I was generally told of my courting Mrs. Stout, which I confess was not then in my head; but it being represented to me as a thing easy to be got over, and believing the report of the world as to her fortune, I did afterwards make my application to her; but upon very little trial of that sort, I received a very fair denial, and there ended my suit; Mr. Cowper having been so friendly to me, as to give me notice of some things, that convinced me I ought to be thankful I had no more to do with her.

Baron Hatsell. When did she cast you off?

Mr. Marshall. I cannot be positive as to the time, my lord, but it was in answer to the only serious letter I ever writ to her; as I remember, I was not over importunate in this affair, for I never was a very violent lover.

Baron Hatsell. Well, but tell the time as near as you can.

Mr. Marshall. I believe it was a second or third time I came down to Hertford, which is about a year and a half since; and, during the whole of my acquaintance with her, I never till then found her averse to any proposal of mine; but she then telling me her resolution was not to comply with what I desired, I took her at her word, having partly by my own observation, but more by Mr. Cowper's friendship, been pretty well able to guess at her meaning.

Mr. Cowper. Because what you say may stand confirmed beyond contradiction, I desire you to say whether you have any letter from her to yourself?

Mr. Marshall. Yes, I have a letter in my hand which she sent me, upon occasion of some songs I sent her when I came to town, which she had before desired of me; and this is a letter in answer to mine; it is her hand-writing, and directed to me.

Baron Hatsell. How do you know it is her hand-writing?

Mr. Marshall. I have seen her write, and seen and received several letters from her.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, shew it Mr. Beale.

Mr. Beale. I believe it to be her hand; I have seen her write, and have a receipt of hers.

Clerk of Arr. It is directed to Mr. Thomas Marshall at Lyons-inn, and dated Sept. 26, 1697.

"Sir,

Sept. 26, 1697.

"Yours came very safe; but I wish you had explained your meaning a little more about the accident you speak of; for I have been puzzling my brains ever since; and without I shall set myself to conjuring, I cannot imagine what it should be, for I know of nothing that happened after you went away, nor no discourse about you, only when we were together, the company would sometimes drink your health, or wish you had been there, or the like; so that I fancy it must be something Mr. — has invented for diversion; though I must confess we have a sort of people here, that are inspired with the gift of foreknowledge, who will tell one as much for nothing as any astrologer will have a good piece of money for. But to leave jesting, I cannot tell when I shall come to London, unless it be for a night and away, about some business with my brother, that I must be obliged to attend his motions; but when I do, I shall remember my promise, although I do not suppose you are any more in earnest than myself in this matter. I give you thanks for your songs and your good wishes, and rest

Your Loving Duck."

Mr. Cowper. Have you any more letters?

Mr. Marshall. Yes, I have another letter here; but before it is read, I think it will be proper to give the court an account of the occasion of its being writ. I waited on Mrs. Stout one evening at her lodgings in Houndsditch, and at our parting she appointed to meet me the next day; and to excuse her not coming according to that appointment, she sent me this letter.

Cl. of Arr. It is directed to Mr. Thomas Marshall; it is without date.

"Mr. Marshall,

"I met unexpected with one that came from H—d last night, who detained me so long with relating the most notorious inventions and lyes that are now extant amongst those people, that I could not possibly come till it was late; and this day was appointed for business, that I am uncertain when it will be finished; so that I believe I cannot see you whilst I am in town. I have no more at present, but that I am

Your obliged Friend."

Mr. Cowper. Now, my lord, if your lordship please, I proceed to shew you, that I went not so much voluntarily as pressed by her to come to this house, and for that I will produce one letter from her to myself; and, my lord, I must a little inform you of the nature of this letter. It is on the outside directed to Mrs. Jane Ellen, to be left for her at Mr. Hargrave's coffee-house. For her to direct for me at a coffee-house, might make the servants wonder and the post-man might suspect, and for that reason she directed it in that manner. There was Mr. Marshall by when I received it, and I can prove the hand by Mr. Beale.

Mr. Marshall. My lord, I verily believe I was by, and that Mr. Cowper shewed me this letter immediately on receipt of it, as he had done several others from the same hand.

Cl. of Arr. This is directed for Mrs. Jane Ellen. It is dated March the 5th, without any year.

"Sir,

March the 5th.

"I am glad you have not quite forgot that there is such a person as I in being; but I am willing to shut my eyes, and not see any thing that looks like unkindness in you, and rather content myself with what excuses you are pleased to make, than be inquisitive into what I must not know. I should very readily comply with your proposition of changing the season, if it were in my power to do it, but you know that lies altogether in your own breast: I am sure the winter has been too unpleasant for me to desire the continuance of it; and I wish you were to endure the sharpness of it but for one hour, as I have done for many long nights and days; and then I believe it would move that rocky heart of yours, that can be so thoughtless of me as you are: But if it were designed for that end, to make the summer the more delightful, I wish it may have the effect so far, as to continue it to be so too, that the weather may never overcast again; the which if I could be assured of, it would recompense me for all that I have ever suffered, and make me as easy a creature as I was the first moment I received breath. When you come to H—d pray let your steed guide you, and do not do as you did the last time; and be sure order your affairs to be here as soon as you can, which cannot be sooner than you will be heartily welcome to Your very sincere Friend."

"For Mrs. Jane Ellen at Mr. Hargrave's, near Temple-bar, London."

Mr. Cowper: Though it is directed to Mrs. Jane Ellen, it begins in the inside, 'Sir,' and it is dated the 5th of March, next before the 13th. Baron Hatsell. What March was it?

Mr. Marshall. I kept no account of the time, but I am very positive, by the contents, that Mr. Cowper shewed me this letter, and I read it, but by my now remembrance, it should be longer since than March last.

Mr. Cowper. It was March last. That which will set Mr. Marshall's memory to rights is this other letter, which I received at the Rainbow, when he was by, and he read it; and it importing me to a matter of this kind, I did produce it to my brother and him; they both knew of it, and both read it, and that will refresh his memory concerning the date of the other.

Mr. Marshall. My lord, I was in the coffee-house with Mr. Cowper when he received this letter; and he afterwards shewed it to Mr. William Cowper, at the Covent-garden tavern, when I was by.

Cl. of Arr. This is dated the 9th of March, and directed to Mrs. Jane Ellen, at Mr. Hargrave's.

"Sir;

March 9.

"I writ to you by Sunday's post, which I hope you have received; however, as a confirmation, I will assure you I know of no inconvenience that can attend your cohabiting with me, unless the grand jury should thereupon find a bill against us; but I won't fly for it, for come life, come death, I am resolved never to desert you; therefore according to your appointment I will expect you, and till then I shall only tell you, that I am Yours, &c."

"For Mrs. Jane Ellen at Mr. Hargrave's, near Temple-bar, London."

Mr. Cowper. If your lordship please, I will further prove this letter by my brother.

Mr. W. Cowper. I can bear my brother witness, that when he has been advised to make these letters part of his defence he hath expressed great unwillingness, and has said, nothing but the life of these gentlemen could incline him to it.

My lord, all I can say to this matter is this: I do remember, that when she was one time in London, I think it was about a year and a half since, I am not positive as to the time, but when she was in London, my brother came in the morning to my chamber in the Temple, and after some discourse, he told me he had received a letter from Mrs. Stout that day, wherein he said, she intended him a visit at his chamber that afternoon; he told me at the same time, that his friend Mr. Marshall had some thoughts of her, and therefore for that, as well as other reasons, he would decline receiving the visit intended him; and upon consideration, this was the method agreed upon: at that time I lived with my father in Hatton Garden; and this gentlewoman having writ in the same letter I now speak of, that she designed to dine there, and to come from thence in the afternoon; says my brother, you may casually, as it were, take occasion to say at dinner, that my business obliges me to go to Deptford in the afternoon, as in good earnest it did, as he then told me; and from that she may take a hint of my not being at home, and so save herself the disappointment of coming to my chamber. I told him I would find an opportunity of doing it if I could. At dinner my father happened to ask me, as he often did, when I saw my brother? I took this hint, and said I had seen him at my chamber in the morning, and that he was gone to Deptford that afternoon about some law business. My lord, Mrs. Stout was then at the table. I no sooner said it, but I observed she changed colour presently, and rose with her napkin, and went into the back-yard, and we saw her through a sash-window fall into a woman's fit of swooning; and they gave her the assistance that is usual in such cases.

My lord, the next thing I can speak to is this: The parliament sitting late the Friday before the Monday of the last assizes at Hertford, I came late from dinner, I had dined about seven o'clock, as I remember; and having occasion to speak with my brother, I found him out by enquiry at the Covent-garden-tavern, and there was Mr. Marshall of Lion's-inn with him. I had not drunk above a glass, or two of wine, but my brother began with me, and said, I seldom trouble you with affairs of mine, but now I do not know well how to avoid it. I have received an importunate letter, which I will shew you; it came from a lady, whose name I believe you will guess; so he pulled it out of his pocket and read it so often, because of the oddness of the expression, that I can say, I am sure this is the very letter he shewed me at the Covent-garden tavern the Friday before the last assizes; saith he, the occasion of my shewing it, is not to expose a woman's weakness, but I would not willingly lie under too many obligations; nor engage too far in the other way, would I be at an unnecessary expense for a lodging. Upon this subject there was some discourse, I think, foreign to this purpose; and therefore I would not trouble your lordship with a repetition of it; that which is material is this; I did undertake to write to Mr. Barefoot's to dispose of his lodgings, where I used to be at the time of the assizes, and my brother with me. I said I would write the next day, being Saturday; but when I should have writ, it was very late, and I was weary, being then tied down to the business of parliament; and partly for that reason, and partly in point of discretion, which I had upon my second thoughts, that it would be better for my brother's business to be at Mr. Barefoot's, which is near the court, and in the market-place, I did neglect writing; and though I thought of it about eleven o'clock, yet, as I said, partly for one reason, and partly for the other, I did not write that time. My lord, my brother could know nothing of this matter; for I did not see him from the Friday he shewed me the letter, till he went to the assizes; so that he could not know before he was at Hertford, that I had not writ. My lord, I say, as to this letter, I am sure he shewed me the Friday next before the last assizes.

Baron Hatsell. Let me see that letter. (Which was shewn his lordship.)

Mr. Cowper. My lord, one or two of the jury seem to question whether the letters are sufficiently proved; for their satisfaction, I will further prove them. Call Mr. John Beale, William Oaker, and Mrs. Low. My lord, Mr. Beale is one of their own sect.

[The Witnesses proved her hand.]

Jury. My lord, we are satisfied.

Baron Hatsell. I believe you may ask her mother, she will tell you whether it be her daughter's hand.

Mrs. Stout. How should I know! I know she was no such person, her hand may be counterfeited.

Baron Hatsell. But if it were written in a more sober stile, what would you say then?

Mrs. Stout. I shan't say it to be her hand, unless I saw her write it.

[Then the Letter was shewn to Mr. Stout.]

Mr. Stout. It is like my sister's hand.

Baron Hatsell. Do you believe it to be her hand?

Mr. Stout. No, I don't believe it; because it don't suit her character.

Baron Hatsell. But do you think she might not conceal from you what were her inward thoughts?

Mr. Stout. Not in such a degree as this.

Mr. Cowper. Call Mrs. Barefoot and her maid. I desire they may be asked what they know about my taking of lodgings at their house.

Baron Hatsell. This is taken for granted.

Mrs. Barefoot. When you came to my house, you asked me, if I had received a letter from your brother? And I told you, no.

Mr. Cowper. What did I say to that?

Mrs. Barefoot. Then you asked me, if I expected you? And I told you, yes; by reason I had heard nothing from you.

Mr. Cowper. Where did I lodge that night?

Mrs. Barefoot. I had prepared the lodging before you came, expecting you or Mr. Cowper your brother.

Mr. Cowper. And I did come?

Mrs. Barefoot. Yes, as you used to do.

Mr. Cowper. Did I send for my things from the coffee-house?

Mrs. Barefoot. Yes, you did; and I carried them up in your chamber as I used to do.

Baron Hatsell. Where did Mr. Cowper dine that day?

Mrs. Barefoot. Mrs. Stout sent her maid to desire him to come to dinner at their house; whether he went thither or no, I cannot say, but he went out.

Mr. Cowper. What time did I come into my lodging that night?

Mrs. Barefoot. It was a little after eleven.

Mr. Cowper. You are sure I came in a little after eleven?—Mrs. Baref. Yes.

Mr. Jones. By what clock? By the town clock?—Mrs. Baref. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. Did I go out any more that night?—Mrs. Baref. No.

Mr. Cowper. Is your maid there?

Mrs. Barefoot. Yes.

Baron Hatsell. What is your name?

Mrs. Hanwell. Mary Hanwell.

Mr. Cowper. Pray, what time was it I came to my lodging?

Mrs. Hanwell. You came in a little after eleven o'clock.

Mr. Cowper. Are you very positive in that?

Mrs. Hanwell. Yes, I am very positive.

Mr. Cowper. What was done before I went to bed?

Mrs. Hanwell. My lord, I went up, and made a fire, and then I came down again, and then I went up and warmed Mr. Cowper's bed; and then he desired another blanket, and I came down for it; and all this took up a considerable time; and Mr. Cowper was in bed before twelve o'clock.

Mr. Cowper. Did I go out again that night?

Mrs. Hanwell. No, you went out no more.

Mr. Cowper. Now, if your lordship pleases, I would explain that part of Sarah Walker the maid's evidence, where she says her mistress ordered her to warm the bed, and I never contradicted it. Your lordship observes the words in the last of the two letters, 'No inconvenience can attend your cohabiting with me;' and afterwards, 'I won't fly for it. For come life, come death, I am resolved,' and so on.—I had rather leave it to be observed, than make the observation myself, what might be the dispute between us at the time the maid speaks of. I think it was not necessary she should be present at the debate; and therefore I might not interrupt her mistress in the orders she gave; but as soon as the maid was gone, I made use of these objections; and I told Mrs. Stout, by what accident I was obliged to take up my lodging at Mr. Barefoot's; and that the family was sitting up for me: that my staying at her house under these circumstances, would in probability provoke the censure of the town and country; and that therefore I could not stay, whatever my inclination otherwise might be; but, my lord, my reasons not prevailing, I was forced to decide the controversy by going to my lodging; so that the maid may swear true, when she says I did not contradict her orders.

Baron Hatsell. I believe you have done now, Mr. Cowper?

Mr. Cowper. No, my lord, I have more evidence to give. Call Elizabeth Spurr. If your lordship pleases to observe, I have already proved by two witnesses, that I was actually at Mr. Barefoot's a little after eleven; so that if I was to rest upon this proof, here is not the least article of time, in which it can be supposed I was employed in this matter: but, says Sarah Walker, the maid, to obviate (I presume) this evidence of mine, our house-clock went faster than the town-clock. Now, to answer this too, I shall further prove to your lordship, that before I came to my lodging, I was at the Glove and Dolphin inn, where I had a little account of about six or seven shillings, as I remember, for horse-keeping, and which I then paid.

Mr. Cowper. Do you remember my coming to your house, and at what time?

E. Spurr. The clock struck eleven, just as you came into the door.

Mr. Cowper. How long did I stay at the Glove?

E. Spurr. About a quarter of an hour.

Mr. Cowper. How far is it from the Glove and Dolphin to Mrs. Stout's house?

E. Spurr. About a quarter of a mile, or not quite so far.

Mr. Cowper. Call Mary Kingitt, and George Man; (who not then appearing) in the mean time, I would observe to your lordship, that to go from Mrs. Stout's house to the place where she was drowned, and to return from thence to the Glove and Dolphin, will take up at least half an hour; as I shall prove, and then the matter will stand thus? Says Sarah Walker, you went about a quarter after eleven; but our clock went half an hour too fast: then according to her account, I went three quarters after ten by the town-clock; and if it requires (as I say, I shall prove it does) half an hour to go to the place where she was drowned, and to return from thence to the Glove inn, that would make it a quarter past eleven when I came to the inn by the town clock, which it was not; and if I staid there a quarter of an hour (which is proved I did not), it must be half an hour after eleven when I came to my lodging by the same clock, which it was not; so that I think this matter as to the time is very clear. My lord, to prove the time it requires to go from Mrs. Stout's to the place where she was drowned herself, and to return to the Glove, I desire sir William Ashurst may be called.

Sir W. Ashurst. My lord, I cannot say I walked as fast as I could, but I went with a gentleman I see here to satisfy myself about the probability of this matter; I walked as people usually do, and I found it took up half an hour and a minute, when I walked with that gentleman.

Baron Hatsell. Who was with you, Sir?

Sir W. Ashurst. Mr. Thompson was with me the time I mention. I walked it before with sir Thomas Lane.

Mr. Thompson. My lord, indeed it will take a complete half hour.

Mr. Cowper. I desire sir Thomas Lane may give you an account of the distance between one place and the other.

Sir T. Lane. Sir William Ashurst and I did walk to the place mentioned, and we were careful to take notice of the time, and it took up about three quarters of an hour, according to my observation; and we did not stay at all by the way, except just to look upon the hospital.

Mr. Cowper. Now, my lord, Mary Kingitt and George Man, the servants at the Glove, are come: pray, Mrs. Kingitt, do you remember my coming into the Glove and Dolphin?—M. Kingitt. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. How long did I stay there?

M. Kingitt. About a quarter of an hour.

Mr. Cowper. What was my business there?

M. Kingitt. You came and enquired what you owed.

Baron Hatsell. What o'clock was it then?

M. Kingitt. I thought it was about eleven; our other maid told it eleven.

Mr. Jones. How came you to take notice of the time?

M. Kingitt. She heard the clock go eleven, but I did not.

Mr. Cowper. Was there any dispute about the account?

M. Kingitt. You asked the hostler how that came to stand in the book concerning the horse; for you told him, you thought you had paid some part of it; and he told you, you had not.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, with your lordship's favour, I would ask George Man a question to the same point. Do you remember my coming into the Glove and Dolphin?

G. Man. Yes.

Mr. Cowper. How long did I stay there?

G. Man. You staid but a quarter of an hour, as near as I can guess.

Mr. Cowper. I will now call a witness to prove that this maid, Sarah Walker, is not so cautious and careful how she swears, as I think she ought to be.

[Call Mrs. Mince.]

Baron Hatsell. Pray, wherein hath Sarah Walker said any thing that is false?

Mr. Cowper. In this; I asked her when she gave evidence, whether she went out to see for her mistress all that night, and whether her mistress did not use to stay out a-nights, and whether she herself had not used to say so? If your lordship pleases to remember, she said no. Pray, Mrs. Mince, what have you heard Mrs. Stout's maid say concerning her mistress, particularly as to her staying out all night?

Mrs. Mince. She hath said, that her mistress did not love to keep company with Quakers; and that she paid for her own board and her maid's; and that, when she entertained any body, it was at her own charge. And she hath said, that Mrs. Stout used to ask, who is with you, child? and she would not tell her; and that she did entertain her friends in the summer-house now and then with a bottle of wine; and when her mother asked who was there? her mistress would say, bring it in here, I suppose there is none but friends: and after the company was gone, she used to make her mother believe that she went to bed; but she used to go out and take the key with her, and sometimes she would go out at the window; and she said particularly, one time she went out at the garden window, when the garden door was locked, and that she bid her not sit up for her, for she would not come in at any time.

Baron Hatsell. Did ever Sarah Walker tell you that Mrs. Stout staid out all night?

Mrs. Mince. She hath said, she could not tell what time she came in, for she went to bed.

Mr. Cowper. Now, if your lordship please, I will prove to you, if it may be thought material, that Gurrey, at whose house these gentlemen lodged, should say, that if I had visited Mrs. Stout, none of all this had been (upon so little an omission it seems did this prosecution depend). To which I give this answer, my lord; I never did once go to visit her in my life, she knows it. Now, for a man officiously to make a new visit in the time of the assizes, one engaged in business as I was, and especially upon so melancholy an occasion; I say, for me to go officiously to see a woman I never had the least knowledge of, would have been thought more strange (and justly might have been so) than the omission of that ceremony. For my part, I cannot conceive what Mr. Gurrey could mean, this being the case, by saying, that if I had visited Mrs. Stout, nothing of this had happened.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Cowper, he is not the prosecutor, I think it is no matter what he said.

Mr. Cowper. I take it, my lord, with humble submission, it is material, as he is a principal witness against these gentlemen; and the rather, for that he now pretends, that what he did was out of conscience. My lord, I have only one thing more to say, I know not whether it will be requisite for me, or no, to give some account of myself. Sir William Ashurst, if you please.

Sir W. Ashurst. My lord, if I had not had a good opinion of this gentleman, I had not come on purpose to hear this cause, which has made so great a noise all England over.

Baron Hatsell. But what do you say as to Mr. Cowper's reputation, for which you are called?

Sir W. Ashurst. I always thought Mr. Cowper to be a gentleman of singular humanity and integrity; he is an officer in London, and as to his management of his office, I think no man ever performed it better, or has a better reputation in the place where he lives.

Sir T. Lane. My lord, I came hither on purpose to own this gentleman, and indeed he deserves to be owned by his friends, and those that know him; his character is altogether untainted with us, he has gained a good reputation in the business wherein he is concerned, he has behaved himself in his office which he holds of the city of London very honestly and well; I never knew him discover any ill nature in his temper; I think he cannot be suspected of this or any other act of barbarity.

Mr. Cowper. My lord, in the next place I would call Mr. Cox, who has the honour to serve in parliament for the borough of Southwark, and has been my near neighbour these eight or nine years. If you please, Mr. Cox, give an account what reputation and character I have in that place.

Mr. Cor. My lord, I live in Southwark, where Mr. Cowper lives: I have lived by him eight or nine years; I know him to be a person of integrity and worth, all the neighbours court his company. I take him to have as much honour and honesty as any gentleman whatsoever; and, of all men that I know, he would be the last man that I should suspect of such a fact as this is: I believe nothing in the world could move him to entertain the least thought of so foul an act.

Mr. Cowper. Mr. Thompson, I desire you would be pleased to give an account of what you know of me?

Mr. Thompson. If you please, my lord, the first acquaintance I had with Mr. Cowper was in our childhood, I had the honour to go to Westminster school with him; I did not renew my acquaintance with him till about five years ago; since that time I have been often with him, and have several times had occasion to ask his advice in matters relating to his profession; and I think no man more faithful in the service of his client than he is, and I am sure he is very deserving of the esteem of any man, and I believe he never entertained a thought of so foul and barbarous a fact as this, of which he is accused.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Marson, you have heard the evidence, what do you say to it?

Mr. Marson. My lord, our business at Hertford was this: Mr. Ellis Stephens and I went down, he is clerk of the papers of the King's bench, and Mr. Rogers is steward of the King's bench, and it was their duty to wait upon my lord chief justice, with the marshal of the King's bench, out of town; and on Monday morning we went to my lord chief justice's house in Lincoln's Inn-fields, as we used to do, and there set out; but I, being an attorney of the borough court, could not with any convenience go farther with them than to a place which I think is called Kingsland, and therefore I returned to my business in Southwark, where I attended the court, as was customary and necessary for me to do, and set forth from thence at past four in the afternoon: by the way, as I remember, about Waltham-Cross, I met one Mr. Hanks, a clergyman of my acquaintance, who had been likewise to attend my lord chief justice to Hertford, and was returning from thence; with some persuasion I prevailed with him to go back again with me to Hertford, telling him, I did not know the way; and we galloped every step of it, because night was coming on; it was about eight o'clock when we came in. Mr. Hanks and I found the marshal, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Rutkin, and others of the marshal's acquaintance, at the coffee-house; and truly when I came in, I might, for aught I know, be in a sweat with riding so hard as we did, but even then I was not in such a sweat as the witness would have it. My lord, we went from thence to the Glove and Dolphin, and stayed there till about eleven o'clock. Mr. Rogers and I had a dispute who should lie with Mr. Stephens at the now witness Mr. Gurrey's; at last it was agreed between us to go to Gurrey's to see what convenience he could make for us, and to drink a glass of wine at our lodging; but afterwards it came in Mr. Rutkin's head that he was to lie with the marshal, and for that reason, he said, he would go back again; and accordingly he went, and Mr. Hanks with him, after they had seen us into our lodgings, and Mr. Stephens, Mr. Rogers and I drank three bottles of wine together, Mr. Gurrey, our landlord, was sent to fetch it; and afterwards in jocular conversation, I believe Mr. Stephens might ask Mr. Gurrey if he knew one Mrs. Sarah Stout? And the reason why he asked that question our witness will explain. I believe he might likewise ask, what sort of woman she was? and possibly I might say the words, 'My friend may be in with her, though I remember not I did say any thing like it; but I say there is a possibility I might, because I had heard she had denied Mr. Marshall's suit, and that might induce me to say, My friend may be in with her, for all that I remember. I confess Mr. Rogers asked me what money I had got that day, meaning at the borough court? I answered, fifty shillings; saith he, we have been here a spending our money, I think you ought to treat us, or to that purpose. As to the bundle mentioned, I had no such, except a pair of sleeves and a neckcloth. As to the evidence which goes to words spoken, the witnesses have fruitful inventions; and as they have wrested and improved the instances I have been particular in, so have they the rest, or otherwise forged them out of their own heads.

Baron Hatsell. Mr. Rogers, what do you say to it?

Mr. Rogers. We came down with the marshal of the King's bench, it rained every step of the way, so that my spatterdashes and shoes were fain to be dried; and it raining so hard, we did not think Mr. Marson would have come that day, and therefore we provided but one bed, though otherwise we should have provided two, and were to give a crown for our night's lodging. We went from the coffee-house to the tavern, as Mr. Marson has said, and from the tavern the next way to our lodging, where there was some merry and open discourse of this gentlewoman; but I never saw her in my life, nor heard of her name before she was mentioned there.

Mr. Stephens. We never stirred from one another, but went along with the marshal of the King's bench, to accompany my lord chief justice out of town, as is usual.

Baron Hatsell. I thought it had been as usual for him to go but half the way with my lord chief justice.

Mr. Rogers. They generally return back after they have gone half the way, but some of the head-officers go throughout.

Mr. Stephens. It was the first circuit after the marshal came into his office, and that is the reason the marshal went the whole way.

Baron Hatsell. Did not you talk of her courting days being over?

Prisoners. Not one word of it; we absolutely deny it.

Mr. Stephens. I never saw her.

Mr. Jones. Mr. Marson, did you ride in boots?

Mr. Marson. Yes.

Mr. Jones. How came your shoes to be wet?

Mr. Marson. I had none.

Call Mr. Heath, Mr. Hunt, and Mr. Foster,

Mr. Marson. Mr. Hunt, will you please to acquaint my lord and the jury with what discourse we had on Sunday night before the assizes, at the Old Devil tavern at Temple-bar?

Hunt. On Sunday night I happened to be in company with Mr. Marson, and three or four more of Clifford's-inn, and there was a discourse of the marshal's attending my lord chief justice out of town to Hertford, and Mr. Marson said, 'It may be the marshal may require my waiting upon him too;' and the whole company being known to Mr. Marshall, and there being a discourse of Mr. Marshall's courting of Mrs. Stout, saith one of the company, 'If you do go to Hertford, pray enquire after Mr. Marshall's mistress, and bring us an account of her.'

Mr. Jones. Who was in company?

Hunt. There was Mr. Heath, Mr. Foster, Mr. Marson, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Bever, and Mr. Marshall.

Mr. Marson. Now it was this discourse that gave us an occasion to talk of this woman at Gurrey's house, which we did openly and harmlessly. Mr. Foster, do you remember any thing of our talking of this gentlewoman on Sunday night?

Foster. Yes; I and they were talking, that they should go to Hertford the next day, to was to the marshal, in compliment to my lord chief justice, and go as far as Hertford; and there being a report, that Mr. Marshall courted this woman, we put it in a jesting way, 'Pray, enquire after Mr. Marshall's mistress, how the match goes on; for there was some wagers between him and the company, who should be married first.' And so, in a jocular way it went about, and Mr. Marson or Mr. Stephens said, 'They would do their endeavour, and they would enquire after the lady, and give as good an account of her as they could.'

Mr. Stephens. If you please, my lord, we will call another to this purpose.

Baron Hatsell. No, I think you need not, it seems not material.

(Then Mr. Hanks was called.)

Hanks. I came as far as Waltham's-cross to wait upon my lord chief justice; I stayed there till about four or five o'clock, and then set out for London; and I met with Mr. Marson, who importuned me to go back with him to Hertford; and accordingly I did so, and we came in about seven or eight at night, and we enquired after the marshal of the King's bench, and where he had set up his horses, and we found him in the coffee-house just by the court, and we went and set up our horses, and came again to him; from thence we went to the Glove and Dolphin tavern; these three gentlemen and the marshal, and one Mr. Rutkin came afterwards to us, and we staid till about eleven at the Glove and Dolphin.

Mr. Marson. Do you remember how we rid?

Hanks. Yes, very hard.

Baron Hatsell. What time did you come into the tavern?

Hanks. Between seven and eight, as I remember.

Baron Hatsell. And did you stay there till past eleven?

Hanks. Till about eleven, little more or less; we went away together in order to drink a glass of wine with them at their lodging; but Mr. Rutkin considering that he was to drink a glass of wine, and lie with the marshal, thought it would disturb the marshal; 'So,' saith he, 'I will not go in; but we saw them go into their lodgings, and returned to the Bull, where we eat part of a fowl, and I was never out of Mr. Marson's company all that time.'

Mr. Marson. When you took your leave of me, do not you remember that the door was clapped to?—Hanks. I cannot remember that.

Mr. Marson. Mr. Gurrey saith, I never went out after I came home. Mr. Rutkin, pray, give an account to my lord, and the gentlemen of the jury, of what you know of my coming to Hertford?

Rutkin. My lord, I came to wait on the marshal of the King's bench to Hertford, and when we were come to Hertford we put up our horses at the Bull, and made ourselves a little clean, we went to church, and dined at the Bull, and then we walked in and about the court, and diverted ourselves till about seven o'clock; and between seven and eight o'clock came Mr. Marson and Dr. Hanks to town, and then we agreed to go to the Dolphin and Glove to drink a glass of wine: the marshal went to see an ancient gentleman, and we went to the Dolphin and Glove, and staid there till past ten o'clock, and after the reckoning was paid we went with them to their lodging, with a design to take a glass of wine; but then I considered I would lie with the marshal, and for that reason I resolved not to go in, but came away, and went to the Bull-inn, and drank part of a pint of wine, and afterwards went to the next door to the Bull-inn, where I lay with the marshal.

Mr. Jones. What time did the gentlemen go to their lodging?

Rutkin. I am not positive as to that, but I believe it was about eleven o'clock.

Mr. Marson. If your lordship pleases, now I will call some persons to give an account of me. Mr. Cox.

Cox. I have known Mr. Marson a long time, and had always a good opinion of him; I do not believe 5,000*l.* would tempt him to do such a fact.

Mr. Marson. Captain Wise, I desire you would please to speak what you know of me?

Mr. Cowper. My lord, because these gentlemen are strangers in the country, I think, if in taking an account of any evidence for myself there is any thing occurs to me that they may have a just advantage of, I think I ought not to conceal it, for I am as much concerned to justify their innocence as my own. The principal witness against them is one Gurrey; and I will prove to you, that since he appeared in this court, and gave his evidence, he went out in a triumphant manner, and boasted, that he, by his management, had done more against these gentlemen than all the prosecutor's witnesses could do besides. To add to that, I have another piece of evidence that I have been just acquainted with: my lord, it is the widow Davis, Gurrey's wife's sister, that I would call.

Major Lane. My lord, I have known Mr. Marson ever since he was two years old, and never saw him but a civilized man in my life; he was well bred up among us, and I never saw him given to debauchery in all my life.

Baron Hatsell. Where do you live?

Major Lane. In Southwark, my lord.

Baron Hatsell. Well, what do you say, Mrs. Davis?

Mrs. Davis. I came to the house where these gentlemen lodged; I was in about half an hour, and my sister asked me to sit two or three pair of sheets: when I had aired the sheets, she asked me to go up and help to lay them on; and before I had laid them on, these gentlemen came into the room.

Baron Hatsell. What hour?

Mrs. Davis. By the time of my going out again, I believe it might be about ten, or something better, and they drank three quarts of wine, and they had some bread and butter and and after my brother went to fetch Mr. Gabe-lly, my dear house, from Hockley's.

Mr. Cowper. I only beg leave to observe, that Gurley denied that he went for him.

Baron Hatsell. Ay; but this signifies very little, whether it be true or false.

Mrs. Davis. The next day after, these gentlemen were about the town; and she said, she did believe they were come to clear a young man (a minister's son) that was tried at the bar for robbing the mail: I asked why she thought so? She said, she was sure of it: and I asked her, How she could be sure of it, when she was never told so? Why, said I, do they accuse these gentlemen? They ought rather to take up the gentleman that was with Mrs. Stout's maid; and she said, If they took up Mrs.
Stout's maid, they should have never a witness.

Baron Hatsell. Who was that that was talking with Mrs. Stout's maid?

Mrs. Davis. I do not know, but she said she did not like their actions; and therefore she ought to have been examined who she was with.

Cent. Wise. I have known Mr. Marson several years, and he is a person of as fair reputation as any in the Borough.

Reading. I have been acquainted with Mr.
Marson 20 years, he lives near the house where I now do: he has a general good character among his neighbours, for a fair man in his practice, an honest man, and a man of good conversation.

Baron Hatsell. Well, Mr. Stephens, what do you say?

Stephens. I desire sir Robert Austin to give an account of me.

Sir R. Austin. I have known Mr. Stephens many years; his brother is captain in a neighbouring country; he is reckoned not only an honest man in his practice, but has the general character of a good-natured man; and he is so far from being a person likely to do such an action, that, for a younger brother, he was very well provided for; his father left him 1,000*l*. and he is clerk of the papers, which is reputed worth 100*l*. a year, and is in good practice besides.

Jurymen. I have known him several years, and he has the same reputation sir Robert has given him.

Sir J. Shaw. I know Mr. Stephens, and his brother captain Stephens: as to this gentleman, he hath always behaved himself well in our country, and hath the character of an honest gentleman.

Evans. I have known him for these eight years, and to be a very civil person, and well educated, and never heard but a good character of him: I have also known Mr. Marson these ten years, and never saw any ill by him, and do believe, that he or the other would not have done such an ill thing to have gained this country.

Menlove. My lord, Mr. Stephens was my

VOL. XIII.

patron, and he behaved himself very honestly with me. And since that, I have kept a correspondence with him, and I believe he would not do such a thing for all the world.

Baron Hatsell. Call somebody to speak for
Mr. Rogers; if there be any.

Evans. My lord, Mr. Rogers hath a general character in Southwark, for a very honest man.

Mr. Rogers. Pray call Mr. Lygoe. Sir, please to give my lord and the court an account
what you know of me.

Lygoe. My lord, I have known all the three gentlemen at the bar, but particularly Mr. Rogers and Mr. Stephens, from their infancy: I have employed them both in business several times, and always found them fair practisers; and believe neither of them would be guilty of doing an ill act.

Mr. Rogers. Call Mr. Thurlby. Sir, pray give the court an account how I behaved myself in your service.

Baron Hatsell. Come, Mr. Thurlby, what do you say of Mr. Rogers?

Thurlby. My lord, Mr. Rogers lived with me about eight years, in which time I frequently trusted him with very great sums of money; I ever found him just and faithful, and cannot believe, that any money could tempt him to do an act of this kind.

Mr. Jones. My lord, we insist upon it, that Mr. Cowper hath given a different evidence now from what he did before the coroner; for there he said he never knew any distraction, or love-fit, or other occasion she had to put her upon this extravagant action. Now, here he comes, and would have the whole scheme turned upon a love-fit. Call John Mason. (Who was sworn.)

Baron Hatsell. What do you say, Sir, to this matter?

Mr. Stout. When Mr. Cowper was examined before the coroner, he was asked, If he knew any reason why she should do such a thing?
and he said, she was a very modest woman, and he knew no cause why she should do such a thing as this. John Mason, was you by when Mr. Cowper gave evidence before the coroner?—Mason. Yes.

Mr. Jones. What did he say?

Mason. He said he did not know any thing was the cause of it, but she was a very modest person.

Mr. Jones. Was he upon his oath?

Mason. Yes, he was.

Baron Hatsell. When did he say this?

Mason. It was the same day she was found

Mr. Jones. Did they ask him any question if he knew any person that she was in love with?

Mason. He said he knew but of one, and his name was Marshall, and Mr. Marshall told him, That he was always repulsed by her.

Mr. Stout. I desire John Archer, may be asked the same question. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Was you present with the coroner's inquest?

J. Archer. Yes.

Mr. Jones. Was Mr. Cowper examined by them?—J. Archer. Yes, he was.

Mr. Jones. What did he say concerning Mrs. Stout then?

J. Archer. They asked him, If he knew any occasion for Mrs. Stout's death? And he said, he knew nothing of it, or of any letters.

Mr. Cowper. Then I must call over the whole coroner's inquest to prove the contrary.

Baron Hatsell. Did they ask him concerning any letters?

J. Archer. They asked him, If he knew of any thing that might be the occasion of her death?

Baron Hatsell. I ask you again, if they asked him if he knew of any letters?

J. Archer. My lord, I do not remember that.

Mr. Stout. I would have called some of the coroner's inquest, but I was stopped in it.

Juryman. We have taken minutes of what has passed: If your lordship please we will withdraw.

Baron Hatsell. They must make an end first.

Mr. Jones. If your lordship please, we will call one witness to falsify one piece of their evidence, and that is one widow Larkin. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Jones. Do you remember one Mr. Rutkin being at your house?—Larkin. Yes.

Mr. Jones. At what time did he come in?

Larkin. Between nine and ten of the clock.

Mr. Jones. Was the marshal then in the house?

Larkin. No; the marshal did not come till near an hour after.

Mr. Jones. Did not he go out afterwards?

Larkin. Not that I know of.

Mr. Rutkins. I am satisfied it was past eleven when I came in.

Baron Hatsell. It is likely it may be true; for I believe they did not keep very good hours at that time.

Mr. Stout. I desire to call some witnesses to my sister's reputation.

Mr. Jones. My lord, they would call witnesses to this gentlewoman's reputation; I believe the whole town would attest for that, that she was a woman of a good reputation. Indeed they have produced some letters without a name, but if they insist upon any thing against her reputation, we must call our witnesses.

Baron Hatsell. I believe nobody disputes that; she might be a virtuous woman, and her brains might be turned by her passion, or some distemper.

Gentlemen of the jury, you have heard a very long evidence. I am sure that you cannot expect that I should sum it up fully; but I will take notice of some things to you that I think are most material; and if I omit any thing that is material, I would desire Mr. Jones (that is counsel for the king) and Mr. Cowper to put me in mind of it.

The indictment against the prisoners at the bar is for a very great crime, it is for murder, which is one of the most horrid of all crimes. You are to consider first what evidence you have heard to prove it; and though there be no direct proof, you are to consider what is circumstantial.

They do begin with Sarah Walker, who was Mrs. Sarah Stout's maid; and she tells you, that Mrs. Cowper, when he came to this town on Monday the 15th of March last, came to Mrs. Stout's house and dined there, and went away about four o'clock in the afternoon; but she tells you, that the Friday before, there came a letter from Mr. Cowper's wife to Mrs. Stout, to let her know that Mr. Cowper would come and lodge at their house at Hertford at the assizes; so that when he came, she thought that he had intended to have done according to that letter. She saith, that after dinner Mr. Cowper went away, and came again at nine at night, and there he supped; he was desired so to do, (and indeed had been invited to dinner also that day) and she doth say that after supper there was a fire made in his chamber (for this young gentlewoman, Mrs. Stout, pressed him to lie at their house), and she ordered the maid to warm his bed; and I believe, says she, Mr. Cowper heard her say so, for he was nearer to her than I, at that time, and he doth not deny but that he heard it. She says, that accordingly she went up to warm the bed; and having stayed there a while, she heard the door clap; and when she came down into the parlour, where she had left them, they were both gone, and that she could not tell what the meaning of it was; and they waited for her all night, old Mrs. Stout and this maid, and she did not come in all night, nor was afterwards seen alive; but Mr. Cowper was the last person seen in her company.

The other witnesses that came afterwards, speak concerning the finding of the body in the river, and tell you in what posture it was. I shall not undertake to give you the particulars of their evidence; but they tell you she lay on her right side, the one arm up even with the surface of the water, and her body under the water; but some of her cloaths were above the water; particularly one says, the ruffles of her left arm were above the water. You have heard also what the doctors and surgeons said on the one side and the other, concerning the swimming and sinking of dead bodies in the water; but I can find no certainty in it; and I leave it to your consideration.

Another circumstance they build on, and which seems to be material, is, of her belly being lank, and that there was no swelling; whereas, say they, when a person is drowned, there is a great deal of water goes in, and makes the belly to swell; but here was no swelling that morning she was taken out, and no water came out of her mouth and nostrils, only a little froth there was, and her belly was lank. But say they, on the other side, that may very well be; for, perhaps she might be choaked immediately, as soon as she was in the water; and, say they, you may not wonder at that; for if she went to drown herself, she would endeavour to be choaked as soon as she could; for those persons that are drowned against their own consent do swallow a great deal of water, but those that drown themselves do not swallow much water, for they are choaked immediately by the water going into the windpipe; that we commonly call going the wrong way. The doctors and surgeons have talked a great deal to this purpose, and of the water's going into the lungs or the thorax; but unless you have more skill in anatomy than I, you would not be much edified by it. I acknowledge I never studied anatomy; but I perceive that the doctors do differ in their notions about these things. But, as to matter of fact, it is agreed to by all the witnesses for the king, that her body was lank, her belly was thin, and there was no sign of any water to be in it: they on the other side tell you, that her stays was on, and she was strait-laced, and that might occasion her belly's being so small, and hinder the water from going in.

Gentlemen, I was very much puzzled in my thoughts, and was at a loss to find out what inducement there could be to draw in Mr. Cowper, or these three other gentlemen, to commit such a horrid, barbarous murder. And on the other hand, I could not imagine what there should be to induce this gentlewoman, a person of a plentiful fortune, and a very sober good reputation, to destroy herself.

Now, gentlemen, I must confess, the evidence that the defendants have given by these letters, if you believe them to be this gentlewoman's hand-writing, do seem to fortify all that Mr. Cowper's witnesses have said, concerning her being melancholy: It might be a love distraction, and she might have been a virtuous woman for all that; for it might be a distemper which came upon her, and turned her brains, and discomposed her mind; and then no wonder at her writing thus, in a manner different from the rest of the actions of her life. Gentlemen, you are to consider and weigh the evidence, and I will not trouble you any more about that matter.

As to these three other gentlemen that came to this town at the time of the last assizes, what there is against them you have heard: they talked at their lodging at a stranger rate, concerning this Mrs. Sarah Stout, saying, her business is done, and that there was an end of her court-ing-days, and that a friend of theirs was even with her by this time. What you can make of it, that I must leave to you; but they were very strange expressions; and you are to judge whether they were spoken in jest, as they pretend, or in earnest. There was a cord found in the room, and a bundle seen there, but I know not what to make of it. As to Mrs. Stout, there was no sign of any circle about her neck, which, as they say, must have been, if she had been strangled: some spots there were; but it is said, possibly those might be occasioned by rubbing against some piles or stakes in the river. Truly, gentlemen, these three men, by their talking, have given great cause of suspicion; but whether they, or Mr. Cowper, are guilty or no, that you are to determine. I am sensible I have omitted many things; but I am a little faint, and cannot repeat any more of the evidence.

Jury. We have taken minutes, my lord.

Baron Hatsell. Well then, gentlemen, go together, and consider your evidence; and I pray God direct you in giving your verdict.

[Then one was sworn to keep the jury, and in about half an hour the jury returned.]

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed in your verdict?—Onnes. Yes.

Cl. of Arr. Who shall say for you?

Onnes. Foreman.

Cl. of Arr. Speefer Cowper, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Look upon the prisoner. How say you? Is he guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?—Foreman. Not guilty.

In like manner the jury did give their verdict, that John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and William Rogers were Not guilty.

The CASE of SPENCER COWPER, esq. JOHN MARSON, ELLIS STEPHENS, and WILLIAM ROGERS; gentlemen.* [Published by them in 1699.]

First, in general;

THE said four gentlemen were in very good employments, and easy in their circumstances; Mr. Marson and Mr. Stephens are attorneys at law, in good business, and Mr. Rogers, a scrivener, in Queen-street, London, and of un-spotted reputations; the last an utter stranger to Mr. Cowper; when at once they were accused of being together, with the basest and most execrable crime that the greatest villain in the world is capable of committing.

Nay, in one respect, they were accused of doing what the most hardened in wickedness never did; that is to say, of having contracted the guilt, and run the imminent hazard of murder, without any temptation or provocation to it, or other cause whatsoever.

For it has pleased the Providence of God to

* The Mr. Cowper's Case made so great a noise, and he made so considerable a figure in life, it is thought proper to insert those curious things that were wrote at that time relating to it. [Not a former Edition.]

force their innocence with such circumstances, that their very enemies and prosecutors (though to make their calumny to gain credit in the world, it was necessary they should assign some cause; and therefore they made it be reported, that it was done for the sake of gain to Mr. Cowper) never once had the impudence at the trial so much as to suggest the same, or any other cause, though often put in mind of it: nor can they yet, with all their malice, intent, much less prove, the least ground or reason that could incite them, or any of them, to the committing a sin so unnatural in itself, and so generally detested and punished, as well in this world as that to come.

And all this without any proof that a murder was committed by any one; it being the verdict of the coroner's inquest, fairly impanelled (on the fresh view of the body, on consulting two surgeons and a midwife, who then had the view likewise, and a full examination, which lasted near six hours), that the deceased drowned herself, being 'non compos mentis': and it is humbly presumed, that all unprejudiced persons who heard that matter fully canvassed at the trial, on the entire circumstances of the case, were convinced there was no ground to believe the contrary.

So that nothing but the zeal of some Quakers for the reputation of their sect, to clear it from being liable to the same infirmities the rest of the world are, assisted by the heat of faction, which is in most boroughs, could ever have stirred up a prosecution, and have made so much noise in the world, with it, out of such matter.

Next, as to Particulars;

Mr. Cowper, the day on which the deceased's body was found, was examined, among many others, before the coroner's inquest; and which is very remarkable, did then freely give an exact and full account of every the least circumstance of fact that has been at any time since proved, or pretended to be proved against him, throughout the whole prosecution.

When the circuit was ended (for this accident happened while the assizes were holding at Hertford), which unhappily drew these gentlemen to that town, about a month after the sitting of the said coroner's inquest, the said four gentlemen were severally sent for, and readily came to the lord chief justice Holt, and were examined; and what they then informed the chief justice of, on such sudden and several examinations, has not been falsified or contradicted in the least, but on the contrary was constantly adhered to, and at last proved and made good at their trial.

That after their said first examination they were dismissed without bail, and thereby had an opportunity of flying; as undoubtedly they would have done if conscious of any guilt. Then they were sent for a second time and examined, and admitted to bail; and afterwards (the prosecutors having in the mean time collected several informations and certificates, containing observations and opinions of the posture and manner in which the deceased's body was found, and what appeared on view thereof, five weeks after it had been buried by the prosecutors, and used before as they pleased) Mr. Cowper and Mr. Marson were committed, and the other two still continued upon bail.

It is remarkable, that in procuring these informations and certificates, and in the whole conduct of the process (so far as carried on in the country), the prosecutors applied themselves at Hertford to those very persons, and those only, who they knew were professed enemies to Mr. Cowper's relations, upon account of controversies arising at elections, and otherwise.

Mr. Marson, on his Habeas Corpus, was afterwards admitted to bail: but Mr. Cowper appearing in the King's-bench, on the like writ, the court was equally divided as to his being bailed, and consequently he was remanded to prison.

There he lay all Trinity term, 1699; and part of the long vacation, for the space of two months, till the assizes at Hertford drew near; and then, upon enquiring at the crown office, not hearing that any writ was sued out for his removal, in order to his trial at Hertford, he caused a writ to be issued out for that purpose, fearing his enemies designed to keep him in gaol, or at least to continue the slander and prosecution as long as they could: The prosecutors understanding this, sued out the like writ at their instance: and Mr. Cowper was removed on that writ, lest going on his own writ should have shewn too great a confidence in his innocence, which was not to be endured.

These few steps of the proceeding, out of many of the like nature (which are omitted to avoid length) may serve to shew that the prosecution was far from being a faint one, but was industrious and artificial to the last degree, and was (unluckily for the four gentlemen concerned) assisted by a circumstance not material to the justice of their cause, but notoriously true: that an election interest was thought in great measure to depend upon carrying on the accusation: which was the harder upon the four gentlemen, for that none of them were at all concerned in that controversy, and three of them not so much as in a wish one way or other.

Notwithstanding this unhappy juncture, on their trial their innocence was so clear, that they were acquitted, to the satisfaction of all indifferent persons there present.

After the trial, which was at the summer assizes, in the year 1699, their prosecutors, that they might be further vexatious, and keep up the talk against these four gentlemen (though they had nothing to object to the fairness of the trial, nor any defect in their preparations towards it), immediately sought out for an heir male to bring in an appeal, to try them again, and put them to fresh charges, and keep them longer under the suspicion of an great an infamy on the very same evidence, without any pretence of the least addition to it.

In the same long vacation, 1699, they found out the infant, Henry Stout, (whose name was afterwards made use of for bringing the appeal) and might have sued out the writ of appeal either before the then next Michaelmas term, or in it, in the vacation following, or in Hilary term after; but their end was purely malicious to crush the accused with the calumny; and therefore to keep up the same as long as possible, the writ was not sealed till the very last seal within the year after the deceased drowned herself, and not above three or four days before the end of that year (the time limited by the law for bringing such writ), and then too without the consent; nay without the privity or knowledge either of the plaintiff himself, or of his mother, (his guardian by nurture) without whose approbation the writ, by law, should not have been sued out, nor an infant engaged in such a prosecution for blood, which after a fair acquittal is adjudged innocent.

About a month after the said time limited by law for the bringing the said writ was passed, (after several letters had been sent to the same person, which made no mention of the appeal) a letter was sent either from some of the prosecutors, or by their order, to an aunt of the infant, desiring the child might be sent up to sue an appeal; which the said aunt said she read to the mother, and was the first notice pretended to be given; but the aunt being asked (when this matter was examined before the lord keeper) if she then knew the meaning of the word Appeal? she owned she then did not; and the mother, to whom the letter was read, admitted before the lord keeper, she did not then know what it meant, it not being explained in the letter; but that she imagined it was some proceeding in order to put her child into possession of the deceased's estate, or some part thereof, which the said Mary Stout (to induce the mother to part with her child, and help the said Mary Stout to prove his pedigree) had before fraudulently caused to be insinuated to her.

And thus the appellant or his mother (who only could legally do it) were so far from having sued out this writ within the year and day, that they never heard of it till a month after, and then only as aforesaid; so that the said writ was unlawfully sued out.

As soon as the mother and the infant (the plaintiff) came to understand what had been doing, and that nothing was done towards letting the child have any part of the estate, but only to prosecute a suit of revenge after an acquittal, against gentlemen of good characters, and where no murder at all had been proved; they declared their utter dislike of the proceeding, and, without so much as treating with any of the said four persons prosecuted, or with any employed by them (purely from an abhorrence of the action, and their resentment of the cheat put upon them; and the advice of their friends, as contrary to good conscience, and their interest, to let Mary Stout the petitioner have the proving the infant's pedigree in an appeal; which was hostile to the lands in Mary Stout's possession,) went with an uncle and aunt of the infant, and demanded the writ of the sheriff, tendering him his fee for the return thereof, which he (not then knowing of any guardian-assignment) delivered to them; and though it should be admitted, that the sheriff in so doing did not strictly pursue the mandate of the writ, which requires a return at the day in court; yet the same mandate is in most original writs, and notwithstanding the sheriff never scruples to deliver the party his own writ, with the return. And in this case the plaintiff and his mother, and two of his nearest relations, demanding the writ, and the sheriff having no notice of any other guardian, it seems as excusable in the sheriff, as if a plaintiff of full age had come for his own writ: but it is admitted the court of King's-bench was of opinion, that the sheriff in strictness is to return his writ at the day and place mentioned in the return; and for not doing so, the sheriff was fined and paid two hundred marks.

The sheriff, before the said fine, was, by order of the King's-bench, examined very strictly on interrogatories in writing, tending, among other things, to discover how far the appellees were concerned in procuring the writ from the sheriff; to which the sheriff answered on oath fully, in writing, and very truly denied all correspondence with the appellees, or any on their behalf, touching the delivery of the said writ, all reward, or promise, or security; and, in short, that he never knew of the appellants and the other persons coming to him, nor any ways had heard thereof, till he saw them: and then delivered the writ and return to them, as believing it fair and lawful so to do; and for no other reason whatsoever.

Notwithstanding the petitioner preferred her petition to the now lord-keeper (by advice of her counsel) to grant her a new writ of appeal in the same form, as having sufficient authority so to do: and the said infant, the appellant, and his mother, preferred another petition to the said lord-keeper, disowning the former writ, as sued forth without their consent; that they never knowingly approved thereof, and desiring that no new writ might issue in the infant's name: and the lord-keeper, being assisted by the master of the rolls, the late lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, the lord chief baron, and Mr. Justice Powell, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, the appellant and his mother appeared, and owned their said petition; and on a full hearing on both the said petitions, and counsel on both sides, the said lord-keeper, master of the rolls, lord chief justice, lord chief baron, and judge Powell, were all of opinion unanimously.

1. That the Chancery had power to relieve in such case, and renew the writ, if it were just so to do.

2. But, that in this case it was not just or reasonable.

The reasons then, and yet, insisted on to maintain the latter of these points, were these:

1. Because the appellant infant, or his mother, guardian by nurture, had no notice that the writ was sued out, till above a month after the year and day past; and consequently the writ was never well sued out: it being in no body's power, by law, but the appellants, to sue out such writ; and in case of infancy, as well as in the case of an appellant of full age, the writ is sued out in the person of the appellant, and should be done by the consent of his next friends; and no guardian assigned hath any thing to do therewith till the writ be pending.

2. Because it appeared, that as soon as ever the appellant and his mother knew what was doing, they renounced the said writ, and, to prevent prosecuting the same, went and withdrew it from the sheriff, together with an uncle and aunt of the infant.

3. Because the appellees were none of them in the least privy to this transaction, nor did the petition pretend to prove or alledge they were: But on the contrary, the sheriff, having been examined on the strictest interrogatories that could be framed, had, on his oath, acquitted all the appellees from having the least to do in that matter, but that he did it as conceiving it lawful and usual to deliver the plaintiff in any action his own writ; and not knowing at that time that any guardian was assigned to prosecute the same.

4. It is a maxim in law, that what is done amongst others ought not to hurt a third person; and as the appellees would have been delayed and kept under calumny by this means, without their fault; so no security could be given them that the new writ should be literally the same with the former, as it ought to be; and no writ being now legally to be prosecuted against them, they ought not to be deprived of the benefit and protection of the law, without any act or default in them so much as pretended or assigned by the petition.

5. The infant by law plaintiff in appeal, has, notwithstanding his guardian, such power over the suit, that three cases were cited wherein the infant was by the court permitted to be nonsuited, without and against the consent of the guardian assigned to prosecute the same; and no instance is to be found; wherever an infant was denied so to be nonsuited.

6. If an infant may desist from prosecuting a writ depending, without consent of his guardian assigned, it is much more unreasonable such guardian assigned should force the plaintiff to have or sue out such writ, especially to be restored to it whether he will or no, in an extraordinary manner; which reason is enforced in this case by the unprecedented applying to the legislative power in this matter.

7. To make good the last reason, a petition was presented to the lord-keeper by the plaintiff and his mother, against having the writ, and disavowing their knowledge of the effect of the former writ; and both, with an uncle and aunt of the plaintiff, appeared to justify that petition; and the woman avowed, that when she parted with her son, to sue the appeal, she thought that it was in order to obtain the deceased's estate, as the petitioner had fraudulently induced her to believe.

8. The appellant and his mother insisted, that the infant being heir at law to the deceased, and so entitled to her estate unless some way diverted by will or settlement (which the petitioner would never satisfy them in,) and the petitioner, with her son John Stout, being in possession of that estate, they thought it very improper the petitioner should have the proving the plaintiff's pedigree in an appeal, which was his title to an estate the petitioner held from him; for recovery whereof the infant and his mother, as guardian, preferred their bill in Chancery; which suit is still depending.

These Reasons were enforced by several considerations, shewing, that this writ of appeal, of all others, ought not to be favoured:

1. Because sued out clandestinely and fraudulently, as aforesaid, by one who had no power.

2. Because deferred two whole terms after the acquittal on the judgment, and not taken out till the last seal, about four days within the year; which shews they did not design justice, but to spin out a scandal as long as they could, maliciously and vexatiously.

3. An acquittal on indictment, was a bar to an appeal at the common law; and though that bar be taken away, stat. H. 7. (which let in the indictment within the year and day) lest persons should procure themselves to be acquitted on indictments by faint prosecutions; yet, since this prosecution was far from faint, the appellees in this case are within the reason and equity of that plea; and the rather, for that the petitioner, who would prosecute this appeal, was the principal prosecutor of the indictment, and did it with all imaginable industry, assisted by the united interest of the Quakers, and the prejudice of a party in the town of Hertford, disoblged on the score of elections.

4. Appeals have not been favoured since the stat. H. 7, except in cases of conviction, and pardon obtained by surprise, or after some clear or fresh discovery by additional evidence; which neither is, nor can be pretended.

THE CASE OF MRS. MARY STOUT, WIDOW.

In March, 1699, being within the space of a year after the supposed murder of Mrs. Sarah Stout, a writ of appeal was sued out of the high court of Chancery, against Spencer Cowper, esq. John Marson, Ellis Stevens, and William Rogers, gentlemen, in order for the trial of them, at the suit of one Henry Stout, heir at law to the deceased, and the appellant named in the writ of appeal, who at the time of suing out such writ was about the age of ten years.

Mrs. Stout, the mother of the deceased, after such appeal was sued out, caused the same to be delivered to one Mr. Bostock Toller, the under-sheriff for the county of Hertford, in order for his apprehending of the appellees mentioned in the said writ. And she fearing lest he would be either remiss or unmindful in the due execution thereof, some short time after she sent a neighbour of hers to Mr. Toller, to know what he had done, or would do, with the writ? Whether he had executed the same, or whether he would return the parties were not to be found? Which message was duly carried, with a particular account, that Mrs. Mary Stout, the mother of the deceased, was the person that sent the same. To which Mr. Toller returned this answer, 'Mrs. Stout is a very busy, uneasy woman; but however, when the writ is out, I will make such return thereof as the law directs.'

Mrs. Stout having received such an answer, and expecting to have a return of the writ, according to Mr. Toller's promise, on the 13th of April following, was, in order thereto, and for the further designed prosecution of the matter, duly admitted guardian to the appellant; and as such, on the 15th of the same month of April, being the first day of the then Easter-term, appeared personally in the court of King's-bench, in order to arraign the appellees, in case the under-sheriff should have returned them taken.

Upon such attendance of Mrs. Stout, Mr. Toller was frequently called, pending the whole time the court sate, (the writ being then returnable) to make a return of the writ: but he made default, and instead thereof Mr. Marson, one of the appellees, appeared in court, and prayed either to be arraigned or discharged; though the writ was not then, or ever since, seen or returned in court; so that such Mr. Marson's motion appearing only to be a shew, or bravado, no damage or advantage being to be sustained or gained to him thereby, the same was rejected.

Upon the second day of the same term, the court of King's-bench was moved on the behalf of Mrs. Stout, that a short day might be appointed peremptorily for Mr. Toller to make his return. But then (though Mr. Marson knew of the writ of appeal's coming to Mr. Toller's hand, as appears by his praying an arraignment but the day before) it was suggested in court, that no writ of appeal was ever left with Mr. Toller against the appellees: and upon such suggestion, Mrs. Stout then lost the benefit of her motion, and was forced the next day to get an affidavit of the delivery of the writ, which she accordingly did; and thereupon she moving again for a peremptory return, then the under-sheriff's receipt of the writ of appeal was granted, and thereupon a rule of court obtained to compel him to appear, and make a return of the writ; which rule was served; and thereupon Mr. Toller soon after attended, and by affidavit informed the court, that upon the 16th day of the same month of April (which was a day after the return of the writ, and three days after Mrs. Mary Stout was admitted guardian to the appellant) he delivered up the writ into the infant's hand.

Upon which account given by Mr. Toller, the court of King's-bench ordered him to be examined upon interrogatories, touching the delivery of the writ; and accordingly Mrs. Stout the guardian prepared the same, but could not without considerable difficulty get him examined (being forced to be at the charge of two or three orders of court, for that purpose, before he came). At last his examination was taken, in and by which he owes the receipt of the writ of appeal; and that he was informed, that Mrs. Mary Stout, the mother of the deceased, prosecuted the said writ; that she sent the same to him; and that the infant, the appellant, was a perfect stranger to him, when he delivered it into his hands: but then, to extenuate the matter on his own behalf, the reasons he alledges in his examination for such his delivery, are, that the appellant came with the mother, uncle, aunt, and one Mr. Woodford, an old acquaintance of his, for the writ; and that Mr. Woodford informed him of the reality of the appellant, and his relations; and delivered him a note under the hand of William Cowper, esq. purporting the same, that the infant was the plaintiff in the appeal; that one of the women was his mother, and that the other man and woman were his uncle and aunt; which, together with the ready answers they gave to such questions as Mr. Toller asked them, induced him to believe them to be the real parties; as in his examination he sets forth.

Mr. Toller says further, That on the 26th of the same month of April he desired the infant, his mother, uncle, and aunt, to deliver him back the writ; but they declared, that the infant with advice had burnt the same.

Mr. Toller in his examination gives this account; That some short time before his receipt of the writ, he received a letter from Mr. Will. Cowper, to know whether any writ of appeal was come to his hands against Mr. Spencer Cowper; to which he answered there was none; that some short time after such writ was come to his hands, he received another letter from Mr. William Cowper, to the same effect as the former; to which Mr. Toller answered there was; and sent him the contents of the said writ: that after such writ came to his hands, Mr. Spencer Cowper sent him a letter, to know whether he had received any writ against him; to which Mr. Toller informed him he had. So that by Mr. Toller's own examination a perfect correspondence is owned; and an intelligence from time to time, and from one party to another, is given.

That upon the last day of the said term, Mr. Toller's examination was reported to the court of King's-bench; who, upon hearing the same, were of opinion, that he was guilty of an high misdemeanour, and was in contempt of that court; and thereupon was committed to the marshal, and fined 200 marks.

That Mrs. Stout having received no satisfaction for the blood of her daughter, by the under-sheriff's being so fined, did petition the now lord keeper for a new writ; the time being elapsed then for the suing out of another in course: at which time also there was a cross petition preferred in the infant's name, praying; that no new writ of appeal should be sued out in his name. And the subject matter of both petitions being debated before the now lord-keeper, the master of the rolls, the late lord chief justice Treby, the lord chief baron Ward, and Mr. justice Powell; upon such debate it not then appearing, by any positive proof, that the appellees in the writ, nor any of them, were privy to the destruction of the writ; it was therefore thought hardly reasonable that a new writ should be granted; which was a great cause of Mrs. Stout's petition being rejected.*

Now Mrs. Stout's petition was grounded purely upon another bottom, (she not imagining that such an objection would have been started), for she was advised, that if justice had been obstructed, whether it had been by accident or design, in either case a suitable remedy might have been found: as, supposing the writ of appeal had been accidentally burnt when in the sheriff's custody, as it really was when it was out, in respect to have a discovery of truth, the court, which first gave the writ (she was advised by counsel learned in the law) could supply the loss of it.

Had she imagined that all the appellees would have so much as instanced their total

* The Case is reported in lord Raymond and other books. It is observable that great men have entertained different opinions.

In the Report of the Case (Stout v. Towler), in 12 Mod. 372, (See, also, lord Raymond's Report of the Case, Rex v. Towler), it is said that Treby, Ch. Just. C. B. and others, alleged that an appeal was a revengeful, odious prosecution, and therefore deserved no encouragement.

On which occasion, Holt, chief justice, with great vehemence and zeal, said, that he wondered that any Englishman should brand an appeal with the name of an odious prosecution; that for his part he looked upon it to be a noble prosecution, and a true badge of English liberties. See per contra the Case of Bigbye v. Kennedy, A. D. 1770, reported by Burrow.

Lord Nottingham, in his 'Treatise on the King's Power of granting Pardons in cases of Impeachment,' (see a Note in vol. 7, p. 1524, of this Collection) p. 19, sect. 59, says, 'An appeal of murder, because the king cannot pardon it, is therefore an odious suit in law, and is tied to more strictness and formality than any other suit whatsoever: nor do any of these statutes which were made on purpose to cure defects of form extend to appeals.'

In the Case of Bigbye v. Kennedy, as reported by Burrow, the proceedings on an appeal of murder are set forth with great particularity. Sir William Blackstone, in his re-ignorance as to the destruction of the writ, she could have much better prepared herself to have given them an answer; she could have set forth how the infant, his mother, and the appellees' attorney, went in a coach with four horses to the under-sheriff at Hertford, and there took the writ of appeal from him; and from thence brought it to London; she could have informed the court of a more particular intelligence, lately confirmed, concerning the destruction of the writ, by whose order, and at whose chamber the same was burnt; which matters, if yet examined, will sufficiently evince whether the appellees, or some one of them, were privy or not to the destruction of the writ.

There was an objection against Mrs. Stout's petition, that the writ of appeal was never well sued out (the infant, nor his mother, not knowing of the same till afterwards); but to that, besides the proofs Mrs. Stout could have given to the contrary, she was, and is still advised, that her being duly admitted guardian, by the free consent of the infant (though subsequent in time to the suing out of the writ), the same in law is very authentic, and makes the same well sued out. And it is presumed, that no person will say, that the lord-keeper, and the other judges, did all agree to the contrary, upon debate of the matters before them.

It was mightily insisted upon by the counsel for the appellees, at the hearing of both petitions, as if Mrs. Stout should cause herself to port of that case, says, "I was present at the Old Bailey, on the trial and conviction of the appellees in February; and it was indeed a most foul murder: but, through the powerful mediation of their sister, who was intimately connected with some persons of quality, a conditional pardon for transportation was obtained for Matthew, who struck the stroke; and he was on-board a tender, when the appeal was exhibited at the Old Bailey. Patrick had been respited two or three times, on the very mornings appointed for his execution." And the appeal was at last taken up and prosecuted by a set of persons in London, who were in violent opposition to the government; merely to raise an odium and popular clamour, on account of so unadvised a pardon."

Of these Kennedys, I received the following account from the late excellent Mr. Frederic Eden: "When they were transported to America, they got thither to Maryland (of which my father was governor) with strong letters of recommendation to my father from persons of rank in this country, I suppose to remove them from the coast, where they would have been more particularly known as felons. One of them was drowned in crossing the Delaware, and the other (I have heard from my father's secretary) was some time afterwards hanged in Ireland." See more concerning appeal of murder in Kelyng's report of the Case of Armstrong v. Little. See also Freeman's he admitted guardian to the infant, only to protect her estate from the infant, and that without the privacy of the infant's mother, or any of his relations: but (besides the very admittance itself, which is purely for prosecuting the appeal, and for nothing else) Mrs. Stout was always ready to discover the title of her estate; and never but declared, that the infant had no right thereto; and as to the infant's mother not knowing of Mrs. Stout's designs, it is very easily answered; for it is not only sworn, and the affidavits filed in the King's bench, that Mrs. Stout wrote to the infant's mother what her designs were; but also a particular account is in those affidavits set forth, how willing the infant's mother was to send her son to Mrs. Stout, ordering one of his uncles to carry him to her, for Mrs. Stout to do with him as her occasions required; and withal, directing such uncle to deliver her son to Mrs. Stout, and to none but her, and to do according to her directions.

It hath commonly been reported, as if the prosecution in this appeal hath been purely vexatious, begun by a body of Quakers, and espoused by a faction at Hertford, against Mr. Cowper's interest. But whoever the fomentors or spreaders abroad of such reports are, they would do well to consider, if it were their own case, to have an only child murdered, and her reputation rendered infamous to posterity, whether nature and duty would not oblige them to use all means to make a discovery of the cause thereof? And whether they would not think it hard to have their own endeavours reflected on, and their utmost diligence accounted to be the cause of a party?

It hath also been reported, and perhaps by some of the appellants may be objected, that the very method in the process of this appeal hath been malicious, in delaying the suing out of the writ, until the time was almost elapsed, thereby to keep the appellants in an uneasy suspense. But in answer to that, it is confessed, that it was much longer before the writ of appeal was sued out than was desired or expected; because it was near half a year before Mrs. Stout could find out (though all that while she made a diligent search) the proper person to make an appellant; and after she had, she was forced to examine most of the registers in London and Southwark, to make out his pedigree; and which as soon as she had done, the very next day she caused the writ of appeal to be sued out: so that it was her misfortune, and not her malice; it being under the necessity of so long a delay.

It is commonly urged, as a strong argument against a second trial of the appellants, that there is no new evidence that Mrs. Stout hath against them: but such persons, whoever they are, not only assert what they are totally ignorant of, but also conclude, that Mrs. Stout takes a great deal of pleasure (especially now in her old age), in being in a constant fatigue, and considerable expence, purely to be rendered ridiculous to the world, and uneasy to herself, in the fresh and daily renewals of her great loss. In answer to which, she is sufficiently assured, that she goes and acts by other principles and designs; and that she hath more material evidence than ever yet was made public; and that she believes the appellants (though they pretend their innocency is testified providentially with such circumstances as that they need not fear) do not care to come to the test; or else why should there be so vigorous an opposition against so plain an act of justice, if there was no matter of fact that could be proved against them, nor no concurring circumstances that would any way affect them? (as they seem to insinuate.) It would have redounded much more to their honour and reputation, and have wiped off all occasion of reproach, if (instead of so mean an undermining of justice, in the destruction of the writ of appeal) they had undergone a second trial; it being impossible (according to their own assertions) for them to miscarry, or be found guilty. All persons must certainly know, that it would be no prudence in Mrs. Stout to divulge her evidence before a trial; and if she doth but act prudently, for any therefore to alledge she hath no proof, is purely to speak at random and at a venture, and ought to be regarded accordingly. [But this affair came to nothing.]

THE HERTFORD LETTER:

CONTAINING SEVERAL BRIEF OBSERVATIONS ON A LATE PRINTED TRIAL, CONCERNING THE MURDER OF MRS. SARAH STOUT.

Sir;

I am favoured with yours of the 20th ult. whereby I perceive your pleasure is, that I should give you my sentiments concerning Mrs. Sarah Stout's death, the trial, &c. In answer, I am very sensible of my own weakness, and how unfit I am to enter into a controversy, wherein so many doctors have been worried already: nevertheless, in obedience to your reiterated commands, (though in doing it I may expose my own ignorance) I shall give you my thoughts concerning the natural cause of drowning, floating of dead bodies afterwards, the various sentiments of the doctors, the manner of her death, the letters produced in court, her melancholiness, why no mention was made of the money; and lastly, concerning two public experiments, whereof one was made here, and the other in the river of Thames.

It is a common observation of most people not used to dive, that upon their plunging themselves in the water, whether it be voluntarily or involuntarily, they find a great confusion of their spirits; so that it is morally impossible for them to regulate their actions in this surprize, by the dictates of reason; in this consternation, they lay hold on any thing that comes in their way, not considering whether it may contribute to their sinking or swimming.

In this hurry of the spirits (occasioned partly from the noise their fall makes in the water, and partly from its running into their ears, nostrils, &c.) the whole animal economy is brought into disorder. In this confusion it is no ways surprising, that water, wherein they are immersed, should insinuate itself into some vacuities, no ways adapted for its reception: and it being obvious to all, that no man doth, or can live, without respiration, whatever element forever he is in; if in the air, he sucks that in, which naturally flows into the lungs; if in water, what comes into the mouth, as long as his senses continue, he swallows that down the gullet; as long as he doth not breathe, there is little danger of drowning, but on the first inspiration, if he is at the surface of the water, it is much if he doth not swallow down the wind-pipe (with the air) some small quantity of water; but if he is totally immersed in it, it is not improbable, that upon inspiration, a far greater quantity of water than air will enter into the cavity of the lungs.

In every expulsion of air out of the lungs, the epiglottis is lifted up; if the mouth, at the same time, should be full of water, it is impossible but some of it will pass down the wind-pipe; as is observable in those that accidentally laugh while they are drinking, if a drop falls into the trachea arteria, it will cause a coughing, which is a convulsive motion of the lungs, &c. whereby nature doth commonly throw up any thing that doth casually fall upon them; by this struggling of nature, to expel the water already slipped down, the epiglottis is lifted up, and instead of ejecting the water just swallowed, the mouth being full of it, a great deal more forceth itself down, by its natural gravity, which gravitates the more by reason of the cylinder or cone of the air, that continually presseth on its superficies. As soon as the senses are gone, the epiglottis is kept open by the force of the stream that runs into the wind-pipe, until the bronchia, and all their ramifications, are filled: as long as the senses continue, they swallow most of the water that comes into their mouths, into their stomachs; but when they are near suffocated, the water runs into those ducts, where it meets with the least resistance.

So long as life continues, there is a convulsive struggling of nature, to expel out of the lungs all those things that are noxious to them, especially water; being never used to be receptacles for any thing but air, they use their utmost efforts to eject it, by a violent contracting their lobes nearer together; by these exorbitant contractions, the water contained in the ramifications of the bronchia, &c. are sometimes forced into the cavity of the thorax, either by dilating the pores of the thin membrane that invests the lungs, (as quick-silver is forced by the pressure of a hand through a piece of leather) or by the rupture of their tunicle, or by some minute vessels, not yet described by anatomists. If any practitioner in physic, &c. shall assert, that anatomy is brought to a new light, and that all ducts, through which the juices of animals are strained, are detected; I would desire them to tell me through what vessels the gas in an empyema, where the matter lies on the midriff, when there is no ulcer of the lungs, is expectorated; or through what passages when it is carried off by urine, it is conveyed into the kidneys; or how bitter injections cast into the thorax, can affect the mouth with its taste (as the observations of physicians do demonstrate); or let them read a treatise of Robert Boyle, esq. called New Experiments Physical-Mechanical, touching the spring of the air; where, amongst many curious observations about the lungs, he asserts, that the diligent Wallenius relates, That he, divers times, observed in the dissection of live hogies, that the membrane that invests the lungs, had pores in it as big as the longer sort of peas, p. 343.

Water is as frequently found in the cavity of the abdomen, as of the thorax; but by what ducts or passages (when there is no visible rupture of the coats of the stomach or guts) it is carried there, I leave it to the microscopical anatomist to determine: I conceive it enough for me, at present, to tell you, that it is fact. I am conscious you are not ignorant that there are many things that happen in the animal economy, that cannot be proved a priori; yet when they are a posteriori, they are admitted by the schools as undeniable arguments. If any are so sceptical as to deny what is not capable to be proved a priori, they would be put to it to prove the circulation of the blood, motion of the animal spirits, or where, or how the chyle is transcolated through the coats of the guts.

As soon as the lungs, stomach, &c. are full of water, the body naturally sinks, and rises no more, until there is a putrefaction in the inward parts, which in cold countries is longer than in hotter regions; but the sooner putrefaction is begun, the sooner the corpse floats, whereof no certain calculation can be made, the time of their rising differing, with respect to the region, and in the same climates with respect to the seasons of the year; in these parts, according to the common reckoning, they float in nine or ten days.

The common cause assigned for floating of bodies drowned, is, the breaking of the gall, which you know is a vulgar error; so that I need say nothing in opposition to it, the cause assigned by the moderns, is putrefaction; but how this putrefaction renders the body more buoyant than it was before, is not obvious to every eye; therefore I shall give you my thoughts concerning its modus agendi. Putrefaction is a species of fermentation; by fermentation the air contained in the cavity of the breast, body, stomach, &c. though seemingly full of water, yet they contain great quantities of air, which is rarified with the other juices proportionable to the degrees of putrefaction; and this insensible dilatation of the body, increases gradually, until the corruption hath made a passage through the skin, so that a person that is not above 20 inches in circuit when first drowned, after he hath lain some weeks in the water, will be at least 30 or 40 inches in circumference: this gradual dilatation of the body, I conceive, is the sole cause of its rising to the surface of the water, after some certain time, and also of its more or less buoyantness afterwards.

Having given you my thoughts concerning the cause of drowning, of the floating of the corpse afterwards; I shall now acquaint you with my notions, why bodies thrown dead into the water do not sink, and why some are more buoyant than others.

It is observable, that human bodies, after death, admit no water, especially suffocated, as the experiment made some weeks since doth evidently demonstrate; because, as soon as death seizes a man, the sphincter muscles, in all parts, do naturally contract themselves, for which reason, it is not so easy to inject any liquids into the parts that have them, as before: by this seclusion of water, the vacuities (which in drowned creatures are full of water) are, in those that come by their death some other way, full of air, which, by natural experiments, is proved to be a thousand times lighter than water; and by the same sort of experiments, solid flesh is observed to be but a little heavier than water: if you grant this, which is easily demonstrated, it will be no hard matter for any considerate man to believe, that flesh (which hath many large cavities in it filled with air) may float. If you doubt the immediate floating of human bodies, thrown dead into the water, you may, for your satisfaction, consult the opinion of seamen, who have been the last war in several engagements with the French, or those that have been a Guinea voyage; where, when they throw the dead negroes over-board, they never lay any weight to their feet, to sink them, as they do to white men: it is certain that all those negroes do immediately float; I have spoken with several, lately come from thence, that, if occasion were, would attest it with an oath.

Bodies are more or less buoyant, either in respect to themselves, or in respect to the medium wherein they float.

If the person died in the very act of inspiration, the lungs will be full of air, by which the breast will be sensibly dilated. That the filling of the thorax with air may be a cause of floating, is evident from those that can lie on their backs without stirring hand or foot; it being observable, that those do fill themselves as full of air as they can, and that as long as they can hold their breath they float, but on the very instant of breathing they sink. If they have a large chest, or are very lean, they will float the longer.

If they are cast into salt water, they will be more buoyant than in fresh; it being experimented, that ships will sink some inches lower under water in the Thames, than when they were afloat; if into deep water, all men observe they can swim more easy in deep than in shallow water.

On the contrary, if the person died in expiration, had a small chest, was fat and fleshy, or was thrown into fresh or shallow waters, he will swim the more under water.

I do not perceive so great a discordancy between the doctors that were evidences for the king, and their opposites, as some seem to insinuate. The witnesses for the king deposed, that it was their opinion, that no person ever was, or possibly could be drowned, that had no water in their lungs, stomach, &c. and that as far as they had made any observations on drowned persons, they always found great quantities of water in the inward parts of drowned persons; part thereof usually, in lifting them out of the water, runs out of their nose or mouth; that upon their dissection, they had found considerable quantities of it in the cavities of their bodies; and that it was their judgment, that the inward parts of drowned persons would putrify in less than six weeks time. Whether these are not undeniable truths, I leave it to the determination of yourself, and all unbiassed people that have made any real (not notional) observations on drowned bodies.

Their learned antagonists, whose sole endeavour and business, as far as I could perceive, was to render it a mute case, by their strenuously urging, 'That two or three ounces of water was sufficient to drown a person; not from any observations on human bodies, but from a private experiment on a dog or two that was half hanged, as I am told; and I am apt to think there was some artifice used, seeing the experiment did not succeed, when made publicly in the river of Thames by the same person.'

Dr. Sloane saith, 'That cases of this kind are very uncommon,' (viz. for Mrs. Stout to be drowned without any water in her) and none of them have fallen directly under my knowledge; nor, as I verily believe, under any other person's since the creation of man: Then he tells you, that 'Water swallowed by the gullet, into the stomach, will not drown the person;' (who said the contrary?) But it is that which goes into the windpipe and lungs that suffocates; and confirms it with an observation, saying, 'I have observed some spoonfuls, if it went the wrong way, to have choked or suffocated the person.' Note, he doth not say 'drowned,' neither do I think any person can properly be said to be drowned, that hath not swallowed above two or three ounces of water, but rather such as are (as the doctor saith) choked or suffocated. In the same paragraph he tells you, that 'Whether a person comes dead or alive into the water, he believes some quantity will go into the windpipe.' Then water in the windpipe is no certain sign of a drowned person; I am of another opinion, which our experiment doth seem undeniably to prove.

Being asked by the judge, whether the parts would not putrify in less than six weeks, if there had been water? His answer was, 'My lord, I am apt to think it would have penetrated the stomach less than the lungs. How direct and satisfactory this answer was to the question, you may determine. I observe a general question, (for what intention I cannot divine) which was, 'Whether any water would go into the thorax? If it did or did not, I cannot conceive what benefit or prejudice it would be to this case, though I am apt to think the membrane that invests the lungs, may easily be torn by violent coughing, which is observed in all persons when any thing falls into the windpipe.'

Near the foot of his discourse, he saith, 'I am apt to think, if there was any quantity' (of water) 'in the lungs, the sponginess of the part would suck up some part of it: who said the contrary? But, doctor, if they had sucked up any part, would not her lungs have been moist, than if they had sucked up none? But Mrs. Stout's were rather drier than usually they are in dead persons; therefore—' As to the stomach, I have not known it tried; have you known it tried, as to the lungs? If not, we are as much in the dark as before, unless we take your 'I am apt to think' for demonstration.

This doctor closes his sentiments with 'If there was a great fermentation, a great deal of it' (water) 'would rise up in vapours or steam, and go off that way.' here he terminates all with an 'if.' Suppose I should grant him there was a great fermentation, to be as true, as I am confident it is false, his inference I doubt would not follow, viz. 'That a great deal of it would rise up in vapours or steam, and go off that way;' if it should rise into vapours in the stomach, I am subject to believe, that the coldness of the parts through which they must pass, would condense them again, before they could get out of the body. What way he meant by 'that way,' I cannot imagine; if it is through the gullet, the contraction of the mouth of the stomach, gullet, (which as Dr. Garth says) contracted or pursed up by a muscle in the nature of a sphincter, and the closure of the lips, &c. would either keep them in the stomach, or else the coldness of the part, through which they must of necessity pass, would condense them in their passage out of the body: if through the guts, the pylorus, the coldness of the guts, or the sphincter ani, would obstruct their passage; if it could be imagined that the subtileness of these vapours could get through the coats of the stomach, I conceive the coldness of the omentum, peritonæum, and the thickness of the muscles, fat, &c. of the abdomen, would impede their exit out of the body. In fine, it seems very probable to me, that if there had been any fumes raised in the stomach by fermentation, that they could never get an exit through so many impediments.

Dr. Garth is to you, that 'it is impossible that the body' (of Mrs. Stout) 'should have floated, unless it had rested, or been intangled amongst the stakes.' This is a certain truth, if she had been drowned; but if she was thrown in dead, there is nothing more common than for it to float; and this my assertion is consequent upon the universal experience of those seamen that use the negro trade; for when any of their slaves die, they throw them overboard, without any weight to their feet, and these float immediately.

That she was found sideling in the water, is a mighty argument with this doctor, that she did not float; but grant she was intangled (which is denied by several) between the stakes, as it is asserted, I think it no greater wonder, than for a deal-board twelve inches broad (which should accidentally get edgewise between two stakes, not above nine inches distant one from the other) to float edgewise, as long as it is intangled between them. Nay, on the contrary, I think it morally impossible for any body, that is much broader than it is thick, if it casually gets edgewise between two stakes, whose distance will not let it lie flat, but it must continue more or less edgewise, till it is disintangled.

I observe the judge asked this gentleman, whether water in the body would putrify it? He answered, 'I say not; for in some places they keep flesh-meat from corrupting, by preserving it in water;' if he means water in a deep well will keep it a day or two in hot countries, I may admit it; but that it will keep it six weeks, or more, I utterly deny it: if it will not keep flesh from putrefaction forty-six days, it hath little analogy with the case under debate.

This doctor tells you, 'He must differ from him' (Mr. Coatsworth) 'where he infers she was murdered, because he found no great quantity of water in her.' This is a mistake; for neither he, nor any of the other doctors, or surgeons, that were present at her dissection, inferred she was murdered, because she had no great quantity of water in her; but because she had none at all in her.

Dr. Morley saith, 'That these which seem to be the questions of the greatest moment, are, Whether there was a necessity for this body' (if drowned) 'to have a great quantity of water in it? And whether bodies thrown dead into the water float?' To the first, I answer positively, 'That there is no absolute necessity that she should have a great quantity of water in her.' With submission, doctor, pray tell which of your opposites said there was an absolute necessity for Mrs. Stout to have a great quantity of water in her; they said they could not conceive that she was drowned, that had not one drop of water in her. If you would have contradicted them, you should have demonstrated to the jury, either by reason or experiments, how a person might be drowned without any water in them; if you could have done this, you had answered the question of greatest moment.

This doctor's difference between persons drowned by accident or design, I would rather myself, was rather a lappet lingua, than his real judgment; for it is certain, with whatever design a man may go into the water; before he is half dead he is deprived of his senses; and how he governs himself then, you may judge. To the second question, he saith, 'I think, if bodies new killed float, it is by accident; it is as accidental for bodies new killed, when thrown into water, to sink, as it is for persons just drowned to swim.'

Dr. Woolaston being asked his opinion, 'If a person be drowned, whether it can be discovered six weeks after?' His answer was, 'I think it impossible to be known.' I am apt to be of his opinion, that it is impossible precisely to determine what, and how many injuries her viscera had received, or what accidents had happened unto them forty-six days after any person is drowned; for naturally they would have been putrified in half that time; and when the bowels are reduced into a putrefraginous mucilage, who can give a rational judgment concerning their former figure, position, or how they had been affected? This is what naturally happens to a drowned person, but there was nothing of this in Mrs. Stout; which is no small argument with me, that she was not drowned. I shall take little notice how he contradicts his brothers, by his affirming, 'That in drowned persons the water lies only in the stomach and guts.' As to his experience, I doubt he is not candid; for I believe I have heard the same story, which was thus: two men quarrelling in a wherry, one of them took up the stretcher, and knocked the other down; in his falling, he accidentally caught hold of his adversary, and they both fell into the water together; he that was knocked down was not swelled, but the other was exceedingly.

Mr. Cowper affirms, 'That it is not reasonable' (in Mrs. Stout, though drowned) 'to expect any thing but froth.' What, will all the water turn to froth, that a dying person receives before he is drowned? It is a paradox to me; how contrary this surgeon's sentiments are to the universal experience of the learned and unlearned part of mankind, let the unbiassed judge. If he had consulted Ambrose Parey, and had thought him a reasonable man, doubtless he would have been of another opinion; who saith, 'The belly of him that was thrown alive, will be swollen or puffed up by reason of the water that is contained therein.'

The whole tenor of this gentleman's arguments seems to depend on a supposed difference that there is between persons that drown themselves, and those that are casually suffocated by water; whereas I am apt to think there is little more difference, than between him who puts the halter about his own neck, and one that the hangman forceth on; there is a parity of cases, why the effects in the same species should extremely differ, is more than my weak intellect can comprehend: in both I conceive, that in less than a minute, their rational faculty is so egregiously distorted, that nothing is done regularly, or by its dictates.

The verity of his private experiments, I doubt, because when he made a public one, it infinitely contradicted his clandestine ones. There is a vast difference in drowning a creature in a tub, and in a river; in sinking him with a weight tied to him, and permitting him to sink by his own gravity. I am not of opinion, that it is ridiculous to expect water in the cavity of the thorax, though the lungs had not suffered an imputation, or the like, for reasons formerly assigned.

Dr. Orell saith, He shall only insist upon what Ambrose Parey relates in his chapter of renunciations—He tells us, 'That the certain sign of a man's being drowned, is an appearance of froth about his nostrils and mouth; which could not be, as he declares, if the person had been strangled, or otherwise killed before.' For the confirmation, or confirmation, of these positive assertions of this learned doctor, I shall give you the verbal expressions of Ambrose Parey: 'Whosoever, saith he, is found dead in the waters, you shall know whether they were thrown into the water alive or dead; for all the belly of him that was thrown in alive will be swelled and puffed up, by reason of the water that is contained therein; certain clammy excrements come out of his mouth and nostrils.' In the foregoing paragraph he gives you the signs, whether one is hanged dead or alive; his formal expressions are, 'If he was hanged alive, there will be a foam about his mouth, and a foamy and filthy matter hanging out of his nostrils.'

Observe this author, whereon he only insists, saith, 'There is a foam and filthy matter about the mouth and nostrils of them that are hanged alive.' Now whether froth at the mouth and nostrils, is a certain sign of a man's being drowned, or whether it is not incident to persons that die of other diseases, any physician can easily determine? If you will be pleased to read Paulus Zachæus's Questiones Medico-Legales, on the same subject, you may find that he agrees with Ambrose Parey, 'That an appearance of foam about the nostrils and mouth, is no certain sign of drowning.' By such positive assertions of the learned, how easily may the ignorant be imposed on? By this you may evidently see the difference between a witness on his parole, as this gentleman was, and one upon his oath, as the king's were.

Mr. Herriot being asked by Mr. Cowper, what observations he had made concerning this matter? answered, 'When I was a surgeon in the fleet, I made it always my observation, when we threw men over-board, that were killed; some of them swam, and some sunk.' Then being interrogated by the judge, 'When a body is thrown over-board, doth it sink or swim?' his answer was, 'I always observed that it did sink.' What incoherence is here! First, 'I made it always my observation, when we threw men over-board that were killed, some of them swam, and some sunk;' and almost in the same breath saith, 'I always observed that it (a dead body thrown over-board) did 'sink.' I am apt to be of Mr. Herriot's mind, as to his first assertion, That men killed in a fight being thrown over-board, some of them sink, others swim; those whose breast and belly are no ways injured float, but those whose breast and belly are perforated, so that water gets into their cavities through the wound, I doubt not but they will sink.

Mr. Bartlett tells you 'He never saw any body float, though he had been in several engagements.' It is very probable, he kept himself all that time in the cock-pit, and it may be long after dressing the wounded persons. The chief persons in this case to give their observation, are officers and seamen, who are always upon deck, and often obliged to look out; and not surgeons, who are all the time of engagements secured in the hold of the ship.

Mr. Camlin saith, 'There never were more and greater signs of the stagnation of blood on the body of this child, than on the body of Mrs. Stout.' But on what parts these 'more and greater signs' were, whether on the breast, belly, &c. not one word. The mother of the child asserts, there was not the least sign of any stagnation of blood on any part of her child: She having lately had the small-pox, her face where the small-pox had fluxed, was somewhat discoloured; but it was no more discoloured, after her drowning, than it used to be (when she was cold) before her death; the soil of the water doth generally alter the faces of people: so Mrs. Stout was not known by her neighbours, till that was wiped off. The settlements of blood on Mrs. Stout were dispersedly on her ear, both sides of her neck, breast, arm; but on what part of the child's body these 'more and greater signs of stagnation' were, he doth not specify; because had he assigned any particular place, there were several present that would have contradicted him. General terms are the fittest covers for falsehood.

If this gentlewoman was not drowned, as the doctors and surgeons for the prisoners seem to insinuate, the query then will be, how she came to her end? With submission to better judgments, I shall here offer my private sentiments concerning it. I am induced to believe, she was knocked down with a blow on her left ear, from the large settlement of blood there, which, as Mrs. Kimpton swears, was as much as her hand could cover, and more: After she was felled to the ground by the blow, it is probable, with the gripe of a strong hand, she was throttled: From the stagnation of blood on both sides of her neck, under her ears, which Mr. John Dimsdale, jun. swears there was, and from the settlement of blood on her breast, I am inclined to believe, that the person that throttled her, to support his head that he might gripe the stronger, rested his arm on her breast, which occasioned the stagnation there.

The circumstances that induce me to think she was not necessary in her own death, are these following: Her being found without her gown (which probably was torn in the scuffle) and night-trail: her gown could not be found, though the river was diligently raked several times, until about a week before the trial; it was found hanging on a stake, which the miller had, cleansed from the trash that hung on it about half an hour before, and he will depose that it was not there then: It was torn to rags, without one of its sleeves, some parts of it were as rotten as dirt, other firm; you might tear it (which was made of a sort of Norwich stuff) and the lining (which was a silk damask) with your fingers, as I did: Query, Whether stuff or silk will naturally rot so soon under water? Here is no news of her night-trail yet. 2. From her floating; whereof I make no doubt, because it is sworn by several witnesses. 3. Because her belly was not swollen. 4. Because no water came out of her when lifted out of the river, nor purged out of her afterwards. 5. Because her inward parts were not putrefied, though her outward, that had been injured, were? Which I suppose was impossible they should have continued so 46 days after her death, had there been any water in them. 6. From the several distinct settlements of blood, which is unusual in drowned persons: If it had been occasioned (as some may think) from a blow, which she received when she threw herself in, I am subject to believe, that the coldness of the water, in the month of March, would have hindered its settlement in the cutaneous parts of the body, as it is generally observed to do; for what is more common than to dip a linen rag, or a piece of brown paper, in cold water, and apply to a bruised part, to hinder the blood from settling there? 7. From the continual disturbance that Mrs. Gurrey was under, both in mind and body: Nevertheless, she would not discover it till she was almost frightened out of her senses, by the voice, as she thought, of Mrs. Stout, which uttered these words, 'Divulge, conceal nothing.' 8. From what is sworn by the Gurreys against their lodgers at the trial, viz. 'Mr. Marston was hot, and put by his wig; I see his head was wet—they came in about 11 and 12 o'clock—she turned me off, but a friend of mine will be even with her by this time—Her business was done—He would pass his word, Mrs. Sarah Stout's counting-days were over—The use money is paid to-night—You have forty or fifty pounds for your share—' Asked him, Whether the business was done?—And he answered, he believed it was; but if it was not done, it would be done to-night.—Pulled a handful of money out of his pocket, and swore, he would spend it all for joy the business was done. 9. From the sentiments of the grand jury, who, after a nice examination, were of an opinion, that she was murdered; as were several of the petty jury, but by whom they did not know.

As to the letters produced in court, my thoughts are, they are not of a legitimate, but of a spurious production. 1. Because the stile doth no way suit her character. 2. Because her mother doth affirm, the letter shewn her in court was of a smaller character than ever she observed her daughter to write; neither doth her brother think them to be genuine. 3. Because there was no mention made of these letters, till the common report of her being with child (which had been industriously spread abroad by several, but by none more zealously than by a nominal Quaker, her quondam admirer) was proved to be utterly false, by the oath of several doctors and surgeons that had opened her body. 4. Because Mr. Marson and Mr. Archer, on the trial, swore (and several of the coroner's inquest were ready to swear) that Mr. Cowper, before the coroner's inquest, being on his oath, deposed, 'That Mrs. Stout was a modest person; that he did not know of any thing that was the cause of it' (viz. her death); 'That he did not know any person she was in love with, but of one whose name was Marshall; and Mr. Marshall told him, that he was always repulsed by her.' Whether this oath is not diametrically opposite to his pleadings on the trial, you may determine. 5. Because they did not insist on these letters, when Mr. Jones said, 'Indeed they have produced some letters without a name; but if they insist upon any thing against her reputation, we must call our witnesses.' If the witnesses then present in court (who were some of the most reputable in that town) had been called, to speak to her reputation, a great deal of that dirt, that is now cast upon her, would have been wiped off. I cannot but take notice here how seemingly unwilling he was to expose the weakness of this gentlewoman, or to meddle with her letters, had he not those innocent gentlemen to defend; when before her death he had shewn them to Mr. Marshall, a repulsed lover, and his brother, and after the trial, the printers, who at the trial did not take them in short hand, were favoured with them, to be exposed to the whole world.

What concerns her melancholy, I am induced to believe, that she was no more than is incident to all people that are sickly, or much troubled with the head ach; from what her maid swears, 'That she was ill sometimes, and I imputed it' (melancholy) 'to her illness; and I knew no other cause.' And Mrs. Walker doth assert, That Mr. Cowper told the coroner's inquest, That he did not observe her any ways melancholy; that he should not have taken notice of it, had not such an accident happened; only now he remembers, that she was not so free in discourse at dinner as sometimes she used to be; and that the discourse then was chiefly between him and her mother. Her mother and brother do affirm they never observed her melancholy, and all her intimate companions do assert the same: It is much that none but this gentleman's sister, and two or three others, devoted to a party, should observe any such thing. Mr. Kinnin, his wife, and several others that were in her company, with Mr. Taylor, do affirm, that she did not say her head clothes would serve her time, or any thing like it, and that they esteemed his discourse with her purer thanter; that she was in her night dress, and presently went home and put on clean linen: I am apt to think there are many relations and friends, bigotted to a party, that will not boggle to tell a lye, to save a friend, or near relation from—

The afternoon before her death, she was observed to stand to see the judges make their entrance, with her friends, as brisk and airy as any there: About four hours before her death, as I am told, she was in company with a knight of that county, and several others, who observed her to be as merry and pleasant as any amongst them: At nine at night, she earnestly importuned a young gentleman of that town, to tarry and lie with her that night, as she had formerly done several times; which she refused then, for some particular reasons. When Mrs. Stout perceived she would not tarry all night, she invited her to dinner next day, and told her what she had provided, and that she should be glad of her company; not intending to go out of doors the next day.

I am apt to think, that if she had been such a furious lover, as is pretended, or had any intention that night to destroy herself, that she would not have fallen out with any body about the payment of money; much less have refused to sign a receipt for six pounds, which her d——st had prepared when he paid her the interest money; what was the true cause why she refused to sign this receipt, is a riddle to most.

If she had so great a kindness for some years for this Joseph, as is insinuated, certainly his wife would have observed something of it; and then she would not be importuning her every month, by her letters, to come to London, that she might enjoy her sweet company; neither would she, in all probability, (if she had been so desperately in love with him) have lived here several months together, without his company, even when importuned by his wife; but would, as we may reasonably conjecture, have resided in your city, where she might the oftener, and more privately have enjoyed his company: and, as for her going out at the window, it is morally impossible, the bars being so close together, that a child of a year old cannot get put between them; neither was there any occasion for it, the keys being always left in the doors.

Because there is no mention made on the trial, of the missing of any of her money; several are apt to report that her relations want none of it, which is a grand mistake; for they want, as they compute it, at least a thousand pounds of her original fortune, besides the improvements she had made thereon, which were considerable; they made little mention of it there (that was taken notice of), because their evidences that could speak materially to that point, were Quakers, whose affirmation will not be taken in criminal cases.

The last evening, there was a man hanged; after he was dead, was cut down and buried without a coffin, the grave filled up, and the earth well trod down; in the evening he was dug up again, being pressed almost flat by the weight of the earth, was privately cast into the river, and when it was observed that the corpse would sink, it was exposed to public view, and an advertisement of it was printed in the Postman, the 25th of July last, with a great show of exultation; by their saying, 'Many hundreds having seen this experiment with their own eyes, the opinions of the surgeons produced on the part of the king is thereby destroyed and exploded, and all persons convinced of the contrary.' What influence this experiment may have on you, I know not; but when all the circumstances attending it are duly considered, I am of opinion it will make more against them, than their opposites: If they had been certain of success, what need of so much art? Why did they not insert in their advertisement, how the body had been managed before it was 'thrown' into the water, how they opened it afterwards, and how they made a strict scrutiny after water, yet could not find a drop in it? Not one word of this. Methinks this partial relation is calculated on purpose to magnify their own evidences, and put a star on the king's.

I doubt not but the ingenious contrivers of this experiment did not only expect it would sink, but that it would have some water in it also. I am apt to think it reasonable, to expect that the weight of the earth would have driven out the wind contained in the cavity of the breast through the wind-pipe, which is impossible to be done without lifting up of the epiglottis, which continually closes the mouth of the aspera arteria; but in expiration, this being once forcibly removed out of its natural situation, it was very likely that it would not cover it again so nicely, but that some small quantity of water might insinuate itself through the small passages, which the violent forcing out of the air had made: If this had succeeded, what a triumph there would have been, you may easily determine.

Some weeks since a surgeon, that had been an evidence at the trial at Hertford, going into a bookseller's shop, meeting some acquaintance there, he fell into discourse about Mrs. Stout, and asserted there, what he had affirmed at the trial, viz. 'That two or three ounces of water will drown a dog.' One of the company told him, 'He could not conceive that so small a quantity would do the business.' He replied, 'Sir, I will lay a guinea, that I will drown a dog in the river of Thames, and he shall not have above three ounces of water in him.' The proffer was no sooner made than accepted, time appointed, dog brought, and with a weight tied to his hinder feet, hung into the river: some time after, he was taken out, and dissected; where, instead of three ounces, there was about three pints, whereby he not only lost his wager, but, in a great measure his reputation, as to what he had so confidently asserted to the contrary at the trial.

Having, in some measure, answered your commands, though by it, I have, I am afraid, a little too much trespassed on your patience, I shall take little notice now, what emotions and alterations there are in the printed trial; how Mr. Stephens was taken with a strange sort of a fit, (just after the petty jury went out) which disturbed the whole court: or how a wine-cooper in Southwark (who came down as an evidence for the prisoners) fell into a sort of distraction; and all the time of the trial was mightily discomposed in his mind, so that he was fain to be tied to bed, yet would often ask how the trial went, and whether they were like to be cleared; and would often tell the people about him, that he had done a very bad thing, but would not confess what, though often urged to it: but shall conclude, desiring that the authors of this horrid murder may be detected and brought to condign punishment; but that the innocent may be cleared from all aspersions thrown undeservedly on them, which I doubt not, but that the Great Jehovah, in his own time, will bring to pass; and that it may be so, shall be the daily prayers of, Sir, your humble servant.

POSTSCRIPT.

I doubt not but you have heard, that the gentlemen that opened Mrs. Sarah Stout's body, did depose, that she was a virgin; for your information, I will give you a true copy of their certificate, which is as followeth:

Hertford, April 28th, 1699.

'We whose names are here under written, having examined the body of Mrs. Sarah Stout, deceased, do find the uterus perfectly free and empty, and of the natural figure and magnitude, as usually in virgins. We found no water in the stomach, intestines, abdomen, lungs, or cavity of the thorax.

JOHN DIMSDALE, JUN.

ROBERT DIMSDALE.

JOHN DIMSDALE, JUN.

WILLIAM COATESWORTH.

SAMUEL CAMLIN.

DANIEL PHILLIPS.

After this certificate was delivered to the relations, they desired the gentlemen that had signed it, to give their opinions, whether they thought she was drowned or no? All of them were unanimous that she was not drowned, except Mr. Camlin, who was unwilling to give his opinion, either pro or con; but when asked, would only say, 'There were very odd circumstances.' Yet at last, when he was asked, whether he did conceive any person could be drowned, that had no water in their stomach, intestines, abdomen, lungs, or cavity of the thorax? He replied, No; which the others thought virtually to include as much as they had said.

A REPLY TO THE HERTFORD LETTER.

WHEREIN THE CASE OF MRS. SPOTT'S DEATH IS MORE PARTICULARLY CONSIDERED; AND MR. COWPER VINDICATED FROM THE SLANDEROUS ACCUSATION OF BEING ACCESSORY TO THE SAME.

Sir,

I received your letter from my bookseller, on the 20th of September last: And though I am far from thinking your sentiments upon this matter were either desired or commanded; yet am I well enough pleased with your apology, wherein you tell us, you are very sensible of your own weakness, and how unfit you are to enter into a controversy, &c.

This, I must confess, may be of some use to the ignorant, by forestalling their expectation of any wonderful discovery; but for the learned, the compliment might have been spared, since the performance does so evidently discover what you acknowledge.

The Introduction does indeed promise us great matters, viz. 'I shall give you my thoughts concerning the natural cause of drowning; floating of dead bodies afterwards; the various sentiments of the doctors; the manner of her death; the letters produced in court; her melancholiness; why no mention was made of the money; and lastly, concerning two public experiments, &c.

But pray, Sir, if we find your thoughts arise from the ebullition of a heated fancy, and that your too eager zeal for your friend has carried you oftentimes to over hasty conclusions; if, instead of a well-grounded and rational solution of these phenomena, we are only entertained with incoherent expressions, false grammar, tautology, groundless surmises, and want of proof; in a word, if these pregnant thoughts of yours are found to be mere trifles, had it not been better yourself alone had been still master of them? Or, if there was a necessity for their breaking out, had you not better have communicated them only to your friend in London, than to have exposed yourself thus ridiculously to the learned world?

That I may make good what I have alledged, I shall now proceed to your letter. It is a common observation of most people, not used to dive, &c.

Come me here, Sir, here, only to question the truth of your proposition, whether or no, the greater number of those who are not divers, have made any observations upon drowning, or from their own experience can satisfy us of the manner in which a person plunges themselves into the water? But admit the confusion (as without doubt it is) to be very great; it may be hence follow, that the very first moment of submersion reason must be lost; or in your own words, that there is a moral impossibility to regulate their actions by the dictates of reason.

As to the trying, here of any thing in their way, it is what equally happens in the fall from a house, and seems not so much to argue a total eclipse of the rational faculty, as a want of time to deliberate: for the action of falling being instantaneous, it is impossible to form a settled act of judgment.

We all know the prospect of sudden death, by what way soever, impresses a certain horror, (which I must yet think is not so great to one who willfully destroys himself, as to him who either by accident or constraint is put upon it) but that it leaves us immediately destitute of choice, or a power to refuse, both which are acts of free will, and import reason, I cannot allow; as conceiving, if it were so, he that willfully throws himself from a house, and he that falls accidentally, would both equally lay hold of any thing that might save their fall.

In this confusion (you say) it is no ways surprising, that water, wherein they are immersed, should insinuate itself into some vacancies no ways adapted for its reception.

On the contrary, I must alledge, that whether in or out of this confusion, it is not only very surprising, but absolutely impossible, that water should insinuate (though never so chinking), or enter into any cavity, which is at the same time no ways fitted, or (if you had rather) adapted to its entrance.

I will not stand to comment on your notion of suction; I thought such kind of notion had been long since exploded: For my own part, instead of believing that the lungs do suck in the air, I think it more rational to conceive, that as by pulsion they are emptied, so by the weight of the air, from the pressure of the atmosphere, they are presently filled again. Be this, however, as it will, I cannot grant you that every man under water swallows down the same into the gullet whilst his senses continue: For I doubt not but that he who designedly drowns himself, may choose to let it into the windpipe, that he may thereby the sooner be choked.

The swallowing of air or water down the windpipe, is a term I do not readily apprehend; I take deglutition, or swallowing, which is the sole office of the gullet, and respiration, or breathing, which only appertains to the windpipe, to be two different actions, and diversely effected. Whoever swallows any thing either in or out of the water, must, by opening the sphincter of the gula, let it into the stomach: and whilst a person under water continues swallowing, there may be no great danger attending him of being drowned; it being very probable that during this action no water gets into the lungs; but being unable to hold out for want of breath, he must necessarily make an attempt to respire; when ceasing to swallow, the epiglot riseth, and the water spontaneously (if you will allow me the expression) riseth on the lungs: so that when a person is really submerged, provided he swallows not at all, or cannot swallow longer, it is not only not impossible, but I believe certain, that in his attempt to respire, a far greater quantity of water than air (perhaps nothing but water) will get into the lungs.

In every expulsion of air out of the lungs, the epiglottis (you say) 'is lifted up.' And is it not so, I would be informed, in every im- pulsion of the air into them?

It is my opinion, that this part does never ex- actly close upon the larynx, but upon degluti- tion; and although by your account it may be thought to be raised up like a trap-door, and presently shut down again; I do find it a sort of springy body, and is, I doubt not, at all times somewhat elevated from the glottis, unless, as I said before, at the time of swallowing; when by the weight of the aliments, whether liquid or solid, some peculiar muscles assisting, it is forced down: and after this action is over, by its own proper elasticity, it raiseth itself again, that the successive motions of inspiration and expiration may be orderly carried on.

When once there is any considerable quantity of water got into the windpipe, I imagine this mighty struggle of nature doth not long con- tinue; and therefore cannot choose but wonder to hear you to say, 'By this struggle of nature the epiglot is lifted up, &c.

It seems, in my opinion, very natural; the cover to the windpipe being a springy body, and for the most part inclining to an horizontal position: this, I say, considered, if the mouth be full, and the person almost spent, or though he can, yet if he will not swallow, the nature of all fluids is such, that they will run into any declivity; unless (as upon another account you have it) they are shut out, or that the vacuity is no ways adapted to let them in:

'As soon as the senses are gone' (you say) 'the epiglottis is kept open by the force of the stream.' To which I reply, that the natural posture of the epiglot being such as I have de- scribed it, we might rather think the force of the stream should clap it down, than keep it open; unless by the force of the stream, you mean somewhat like that of an injection through a large syphon, whereby the said trap-door may be beat within the rimulæ of the larynx; but in stagnant waters the force of the stream will be inconsiderable.

'As long as the senses continue, they' (I suppose you mean persons under water) 'swal- low most of the water which comes into their mouths, into their stomachs.' And the rest, you tell us elsewhere, they swallow into their windpipes. But this I deny; for as long as the senses continue, and they can hold their breath, they very often swallow none: and after this, in the case of voluntary drowning (which you may smile at as long as you please,) it is more likely by far that they admit it into their lungs; since by swallowing never so much, they do not destroy themselves; but by letting a small quantity into the lungs, they presently put a period to their miserable lives.

But when they are near suffocated' (you say) 'the water runs into those ducts where it meets with the least resistance.'

I would, methinks, be informed what you mean by those ducts. The nose and ear, I presume, are full before they are near suffo- cated; and if the sphincter gule does oppose its entrance into the ventricle, what other duct remains, unless that of the windpipe? Out of which too, after suffocation, it is not impossible but it may be kept, by the contiguity of the tongue's basis to the palate.

'So long as life continues' (you tell us.) 'there is a convulsive struggling of nature, to expel out of the lungs all those things that are noxious to them, especially water, &c.

Let me tell you, Sir, I am apt to think this especially will be found a great mistake; for I doubt not but any thing of a more uneven tex- ture, slipping into the lungs, will excite much stronger convulsions than those from water: But indeed, according to some experiments lately made, I could not perceive the marks of those violent convulsions you here speak of.

I took a dog, and by a weight directly snuk him under three foot of water, which was so clear that I could perceive what happened to him: and, to be plain with you, I observed that for almost a minute he threw his head disor- derly about before he gaped; upon which the water getting into his windpipe, in half a mi- nute more he fell down with his neck to the bot- tom, void of sense and motion. After this, I plunged another somewhat less; when, in like manner as the former, I found when he had turned his neck two or three times about, he was to appearance dead in a minute's time.

Now in all this there were none of those vio- lent efforts, to throw the water out of the lungs, discernible; or did I think it all rational to ex- pect the same forced into the cavities of the thorax, either by dilating the pores of the thin membrane that invests the lungs, as quicksilver is forced by the pressure of a hand through a piece of leather; or by a rupture of their tu- nicle, or by some minute vessels not yet de- scribed by anatomists: and the reason of my thinking so is this, because I could perceive little more to effect it, but the specific gravity of the water; which, according to the laws of the libration of liquors, I take to be inconsider- able.

I know of no physician that boasts of a he plus ultra in anatomy; nor should I expect any such pretension from a physician, so soon as from the anatomist: These two, you know, are not always inseparable companions. But as to your instance about the empyemæ, though I think it foolish to deny facts, when I am un- able to account for the manner how they are brought about; yet I see nothing to hinder me from believing, that very often, where the matter you speak of is cast forth by excretion, the lungs have suffered a solution in their con- tinuity. In two persons I have inspected, who died under these circumstances, it was appa- rent; in both of which, as I suppose from a preceding peripneumony, there had been ab- scesses formed in the lobes of the lungs, which had rotted their outward membrane; so that whether the putrid matter, which was cough- ed up, came from the said abscess, or whether some of that which fluctuated on the diaphragm, might not also be imbibed by the ulcerated lung was very uncertain.

The injection of bitter liquors affecting the thorax, if they are cast into a fistula which took its rise from an internal apostem; or otherwise, if the penetration has been of long continuance, and discharged great quantities of fetid, ichorous, or corrosive matter; I should less wonder the experiment should answer: for in these cases the tone of the viscera is very much weakened, the patient very frequently dies tabid, and we find upon dissection, that very commonly the lungs are corrupted. It may happen also in a recent puncture; but then we may be likewise sometimes uncertain, whether the membrane of the lungs received no damage.

I desire not that greater stress should be laid upon these cases than they will readily bear. But this I must aver, that in penetrations of the chest it does not always happen; for in a puncture I have seen injected, and a fistula of this part, into which I have cast at times several ounces of a bitter decoction, with a tincture of myrrh and aloes; during which, I can safely say, I never heard any such complaint, though I have purposely enquired.

Your citation of Mr. Boyle's citation from Wallæus, if matter of fact, might be preternatural: and as to his finding the same divers times, how diligent soever he might be, rather than shew myself unconvicted to him, by saying it is false, I shall turn sceptic, and suspend my assent till I am better satisfied: at present I cannot see, if there was an admission of air, through pores much smaller than those made by the longer sort of peas, into the cavity of the chest, how respiration could be carried on: and I must needs think, that Dr. Garth's remark upon the trial is very pertinent; where he tells us, 'There is a great providence in such a texture; for if' (saith he) 'there were any large pores in this membrane, the air would pass through into the cavity of the thorax, and prevent the dilatation of the lungs, and consequently there would be an end of breathing.'

But that I might put this matter yet farther out of controversy, being willing to be made sensible of the utmost efforts of a drowning creature, and the result of the most violent strugglings it could make to save itself; I sent for a dog, and lest you should find fault had I made use of a tub, I procured the use of a distiller's back, which, if I may call it so, is a sort of trough, containing in dimension thirty foot of length, and half as much of breadth: into this, when filled with water, I caused the animal to be cast, having before ordered his fore-legs to be tied together.

By the force of the fall he was plunged over head and ears, but rising up again, made to the side as well as he could; and though several times repulsed, continued struggling, and by the liberty of his hind feet often raised his head above the water: upon which, seeing no likelihood of his being drowned under a very long time, I ordered him to be taken out, and his hind feet also to be fastened together. Thus he was a second time thrown in, and continued struggling, sometimes under and sometimes above water, with his head and neck; in a quarter of an hour's time his navel started, and soon after there was a visible prolapse of the intestinum rectum: having thus between while had the liberty of an imperfect respiration, it was half an hour before he had done struggling; after which, under water he gaped several times. When dead, I left him, and returned five hours after; at which time I desired he might be taken out with his head erected, that we might lose no water.

I think, if it had been possible, I had reason in this case to expect water in the two cavities, i. e. the thorax and the abdomen, which seemed much tumefied; but was so far from it, that upon the opening the peritonæum, instead of an inundation, I found not a drop of water; and even the small intestines had received very little, if any at all from the pylorus. What was contained in the stomach was much short of half a pint, or little more than four or five ounces. Having raised the sternum, we perceived the thorax, in like manner as the abdomen, perfectly clear of water. Out of the windpipe there issued a spumous matter, and the whole of what we pressed from its ramifications was about three ounces.

Thus, Sir, have I given you a faithful history of the fact; but if you think the experiment was made clandestinely, or that the dog was half strangled before thrown into the water, as you pitifully insinuate about Mr. Cowper's experiments, for your farther satisfaction, you may be informed of Mr. Harrison, without Bishopsgate, of Thomas Serjeant, esq. gentleman porter to the Tower of London, Mr. John Litchfield, surgeon, with sundry other persons, as honest and judicious. But to proceed:

'Water is as frequently found in the cavity of the abdomen as the thorax.'

It may be so; but if the stomach, guts, &c. in the former, and the lungs in the latter, continue firm and sound, (as is reported they were in Mrs. Stout) I cannot see how it should happen to be found in either. I must confess, I have never seen it, nor was there any thing like it in my late experiment. If the viscera are putrid, I should not wonder at it; but if otherwise, I should be thankful to your microscopic anatomist to shew me how or which way it should enter.

'As soon as the lungs, stomach, &c. are full of water, the body naturally sinks.'

I suppose the &c. includes the thorax and abdomen, as well as the guts; but though the lungs, stomach, and the &c. are full of water, in the sense of fullness here meant, I deny that the body will always sink, as having seen the contrary, and can bring proof of the same.

'It is observable' (you say) 'that human bodies after death admit no water; because as soon as death seizes a man, the sphincter muscles in all parts do naturally contract themselves.'

How it is in human bodies I cannot say, having made no experiment of that kind; but that it is always so in other animals, I deny; and indeed can see no reason why it should not be admitted for a parallel case: for though you say the sphincter muscles do contract themselves, yet the epiglottis stands open; so that still the tongue and palate, by their contraction, or some spasmotic matter already in the windpipe, intercept its passage; what hinders, in a supine position of the body, but that some small quantity of water may slip within the trachea? But whether or no the sphincters do always naturally contract themselves before death, may be disputed; for they sometimes labour at that time with such a paralysis, as occasions a resolution of their nervous fibres, and forces them involuntarily to let go their contents: thus nothing is more common than for dying animals, whether rational or irrational (if soon before they did not exonerate) to let fall their urine and intestinal feces.

That I might inform myself whether the water would get into a dead body, I caused a dog to be suffocated over the fumes of a spirituous liquor, prepared for distillation, in the side of its fermentation; and though his nose was held some little distance from the surface, yet it stifled him to death in two or three minutes time; after this he was thrown into the water, and sunk presently to the bottom, where he lay several hours. Being carefully taken out, I opened his throat, and found the epiglottis (as is always usual) raised from the windpipe, which inclining downwards, there was discovered about three spoonfull of fair water.

The immediate floating of human bodies, thrown dead into the water, I believe to be very uncertain: and whoever goes about to establish it as an infallible hypothesis, I must needs think very rash, if not guilty of a downright folly; for, though your seamen should tell me a thousand idle stories, I know there are so many causes that may alter the case, that it would be very ridiculous to credit so bold an assertion. I cannot say, I have as yet tried the experiment on a human body, but of those other animals both alive and dead when thrown into the water) which I have made use of, there was but one which floated, and that I thought most likely to be found at the bottom, as being received most water into the lungs and stomach. If the dead body of an acetical person should not sink, it might seem strange; on the other hand, if that of a purely tympanical should not float, it would be equally a wonder.

Could the power die in the very act of inspiration the lungs, (you say) will be full of air.

Now, Sir, you must give me leave to think you very much out of the way; for unless in those cases of a very sudden and violent death, from fits or indigestion all persons through their lives in the natural constitution; and even in the most sudden, meeting with this of strangling by a ligature, where the air is forcibly included, and its passage from the windpipe intercepted, I make it a question, whether the last motion of the lungs is not that of an expiratory contraction: For although to outward appearance, a man or other creature may be thought to die inspiring, and seem perfectly devoid of sense and motion; yet by laying any polished or diaphanous body to the mouth and nostrils, there is oftentimes a damp contracted on the same; which is nothing but the air insensibly precessing out of the lungs, and condensed on the surface of the said body.

It is this general opinion that hath given rise to that very common expression, when he would signify the death of a friend, by saying, He is expired, or hath breathed out his last. But admit the assertion good, of dying in the act of inspiration, it will not follow that any dying person can take a tenth part of the air he did in perfect health; and consequently cannot fill his lungs with air: for, not to instance in asthmatic persons, who at all times take but little air, by reason of the obstructions of the bronchia; and are therefore forced upon quick breathing; it is very rational to believe, that immediately before death the constrictive fibres are much weakened, the blood begins to stagnate in all parts, and being carried by the arteria venosa into the lungs faster than thrown off by the vena arteriosa into the left ventricle of the heart, a great part of the pulmonary cells are so stuffed that they can admit but little air: so that the quantity of what we take in perfect health, and that which we receive dying, is vastly disproportionate.

By filling the thorax with the same air forced into the windpipe, unless you mean filling the lungs in the thorax, it seems of kin to the jargon of filling the thorax with water out of the lungs. For my part, I have several times, through a tube, blown with as great force as I could into the lobes of the lungs, and caused at the same time a lighted candle to be held nigh their extremities, and round about them; I never could perceive the least motion of the flame, whereby I might conjecture the air had any vent: so that I must think it impossible that either air or water, whilst their texture continues firm, can insinuate itself into the cavity of the thorax; till you can bring me some of the diligent Walkeus's gentlemen, that have pores in the investing membrane of their lungs as big as the longer sort of peas.

I think it very likely, that a dead body will be more buoyant in salt than in fresh water; but your experiment I take to be inconclusive; for unless you had said that a ship will sink some inches lower in a sea of fresh water than in one of salt, your adversary may object, that the reason of the lower sinking in the Thames may perhaps be as much owing to the want of depth, as salt.

The discordance of the physicians is best perceived by reading over the trial; some part of the disagreement, as I remember, did consist in this, that whereas on the king's part, it was affirmed the lungs of Man Stout were firm and dense, and not the least appearance of water in the thorax for the prisoner, Mr. Cowper; it was replied, that if the investing membrane of the lungs was sound, it was ridiculous to expect water in the chest, their enclosure.

Again; for the king, it was thought impossible that any person thrown alive into the water, should be drowned without swallowing or taking in a great quantity of the same into the stomach, and other cavities; whereas, for the prisoner, it was thought very possible two or three ounces might be sufficient to drown any submersed person. And this leads me to a passage in the last cited page; where I find you much concerned, that Mr. Cowper's physicians should strenuously urge, that so small a quantity of water was sufficient for this purpose: which you say they grounded on a private experiment on a dog half-hanged, you being apt to think that there was artifice in the case; and indeed so should I, if I were sure they had half-hanged him: but if you were told so in your sleep, it may happen to be false; or if not, I think you are but little obliged to any person, who was so officious as to tell you an untruth. However, that you may not be told of any artifice, made use of in my experiments, I shall refer you to the aforesaid Mr. Serjeant: he is a gentleman very curious in these enquiries, a man of unquestionable probity, and very well known in our city of London.

In his presence with divers others, I caused a dog, who had been kept fasting almost twenty-four hours, to be plunged under water, without suffering him to rise: When he had been dead some time, I took him with his head erected, that we might not lose a drop of water he had taken in. Having made a ligature on the gula; I turned down the larynx, and with a moderate pressure there was discharged of water, mixed with a spume or froth, about four large spoonfuls.

After this I came to the stomach, which I perceived to be very lank and flaccid; when cutting into it, there was not a drop of water to be found, nor indeed the least remains of the chylous juice, which had been before carried off through his long fasting; so that the wrinkles of the inward membrane were very conspicuous.

Soon after, I drowned another before the same company, and do assure you, have all imaginable reason to persuade myself, that all the water he had received was let into the lungs, which did not exceed two ounces and an half: But in this latter (having, unknown to us, been fed a little before) the stomach was half full of indigested aliments; yet no appearance of water, which in drowning we could suppose he had gulped down.

It comes now to your pleasantry with Dr. Storer, who it seems was so unhappy as to tell the judge, That cases of that kind were very uncommon; and lest some ignorant person should be to seek for the meaning of the words, here is a parenthesis slipped in, to tell us, that by cases of this kind is meant (for Mrs. Stout to be drowned without any water in her)

I thank you, Sir, for your information; till now I did not think the doctor's words were so mysterious, but harmlessly gave them quite a different construction, which before you were pleased to be so witty with them, I thought very natural; and having since asked others, they tell me the doctor means the cases of drowned bodies, remarked upon, especially when they have been laid six weeks under ground, and afterwards inspected to find water. Now, Sir, if, since the creation of man or woman either, you have heard of such a case before, or if, in the multiplicity of your practice, you have met with any thing like it, I think it is great injustice that you have so long concealed it.

I would gladly know precisely what you mean by drowning. You think that no person can properly be said to be drowned, who hath not swallowed (I should rather like received or let in; because swallowing, as I have already told you, is proper to the gullet) above two or three ounces of water: And, I think, that if under water those two or three ounces do effect his destruction, he is as truly said to be drowned as if he had taken in two or three gallons.

If respiration could by any contrivance be secured to a person under water, he would then be in no danger of drowning. Again; set him up to the chin, and, if it were possible, let him swallow a tun; though it may be otherwise mischievous, it will not drown him; For if, as may be inferred from your opinion, drowning must be measured by a great quantity of liquor swallowed into the stomach, we have abundance of those drowned persons, some of them top full, daily reeling about our streets in London, and I believe you have some few of them in your town of Hertford: Hitherto we have called them drunken persons; and you will find it a very difficult matter to persuade them that they are properly or truly drowned.

Since then it is not the greater quantity swallowed into the stomach, but the lesser taken into the lungs, that kills the creature; and since there is no such thing at all as drowning, but by that smaller quantity entering the said part; I reckon that if a man dies under water, without the distinction of more or less water taken in, he is as much and as really drowned as any thing can be. I know the word is somewhat ambiguous, and custom has applied it differently; for if a person upon land, by liquor accidentally rushing on the lungs, or, as it is called, going the wrong way, receives his death; this I say is named suffocation: But if the same thing befalls him under water, we usually call it drowning; though the latter is as much suffocated as the former. But I have already been too long on this matter, and shall therefore proceed.

I hope by this time you are no great stranger to the meaning of that general question you take notice of, about water in the thorax; if being sensible of the blunder, they had ingenuously quitted it, I believe it had been much better; but whether or no their persisting in it had been any advantage to them, the learned world must judge.

I cannot think the investing membrane of the lungs so easily torn in coughing; if it should, there may an ulcer of the lungs ensue; for the solution would not presently, if at all, be re-united. But what of this, or what would you infer? I cannot persuade myself there is any coughing under water that should break their continuity.

And the doctor is not yet got out of your clutches: He brings us, poor gentleman, so many If's and And's, that his sentences happen to prove unintelligible; for where he tells us, that if there was a great fermentation, a great deal of the water would rise up in vapours and steams, and go off that way; we are at a loss, it seemeth, what way he means.

'I cannot imagine' (say you) 'by that way what way he means.'

I know not what you may imagine; yet I cannot think you altogether so dull as you pretend: But others do imagine, that by the way of steams and vapours, he means the way of steams and vapours; or, if it will be more easy to your imagination, under the form, after the manner, or by the way of evaporation. Through what passages these vapours were to make their way, was another question; which, if you were to ask him, he would perhaps tell you, through the pores of the body. But it seems, to serve a turn, all outlets must be barred and bolted; the sphincters must be locked up, and all the coverings of the body grow so dense and compact, that not one poor corpuscle shall gain its liberty: So that although some steams cannot extricate themselves from putrid flesh, yet others will get through plastered and brick walls; nay, the very stones themselves are not a fence against their penetration. But if a certain person, present at the dissection, does not retract, I was told there was a moisture somewhat like these steams on the burial-clothes of Mrs. Stout; in others I have been informed it has been frequently observed: But rather than this putrefactive moisture, or sort of dew, which has been seen upon the shrowds of the dead, should be thought to arise from the body, I suppose you would choose to account for it, from the subterraneous damps, working through the coffin, and so settling on the corpse.

I make no doubt, but that dead flesh, whether in or out of water, will quickly grow putrid; but which of them will be so soonest, I cannot be positive; though I am rather inclined to Dr. Garth's opinion, and to think that water will rather retard than hasten putrefaction: In a little time I shall be better able to give satisfaction to them who require it.

You must excuse me, if I do not come up to your belief, that there was a lapsus lingue in the doctor's distinction of accident and design; as he seems to founded both on reason and experience. But if you will allow them as much difference, as may be found in your witty simile, between the person who putteth the halter about his own neck, and one (as you express it) that the hangman forceth it on; I know not whether they will desire any more.

The animals I drowned had all of them much froth come from their mouth and nostrils; and after having taken out of one of them the lungs and windpipe, and laid them on the table, I observed this spumous matter plentifully to rise up, and to run over the epiglottis; insomuch that it seemed likely the lobes might be quickly emptied of their water by this way of purgation. I cannot say this froth is peculiar to drowned persons; for though perhaps the lungs may not furnish the matter, yet to persons dying otherwise, there very often happens so quick a ferment in the stomach, that the contents thereof are frequently discharged by the gullet, under this appearance. I know it is positively asserted by one of the physicians, that if Mrs. Stout had not been drowned, there had been none of this purgation: I suppose he means from the windpipe; and then I am inclined to the same opinion.

Mr. Herriot must be answerable for his own contradiction; I am so far from defending him, that if he or any one else should tell me it was so general a rule as did admit of no exception, I should give little heed to them, since I find it very uncertain.

Having now, as you suppose, cleared the way, and knocked down all before you; the next thing is your account of her death: But if I am not much deceived, the entrance to it is, either through your unfitness for the task, or the weakness of your intellect, ushered in with a very great mistake.

'If this gentlewoman' (say you) 'was not drowned, as the doctors and surgeons for the prisoners seem to insinuate.'

How! Did the doctors for the prisoners insinuate that she was not drowned? I profess, I thought they had all taken it for granted that she was drowned. Dr. Crell, I think, in particular, was a physician for the prisoners; and he expressly tells the judge, that he is not to descant upon the matter of fact, whether she drowned herself; yet, saith he, my firm opinion is, that she was drowned.

Now if to be positive, or firmly to believe she was drowned, be the same thing as insinuating she was not drowned, I see not how any man can rightly apprehend another's meaning, but by the rule of contraries. I confess you have already told us of the weakness of your intellect; but how weak soever that may be, I must needs think your memory is very treacherous. Now as to the manner of Mrs. Stout's death.

First then we are to understand, 'she was knocked down with a blow upon her left ear.' Secondly, 'after she was down, she was throttled with the gripe of a strong hand.' And, Thirdly, 'that the person who throttled her might gripe the stronger, he rested his arms upon her breast.'

On my word, Sir, you have made it out extremely well; I find it is a rare thing to have a quick invention: And I must tell you, for your encouragement, it is a question whether the best mathematician in our city of London could have done it more exactly. It was well your fruitful genius was consulted to untie this knot, otherwise we might have met with much difficulty; and perhaps had never been able to have solved so many perplexing phenomena with so much perspicuity.

I must confess, it was very unlucky for Mr. Cowper, these settlements happened so pat for your learned comments: But had they been elsewhere, I fear they would not have escaped your penetrating judgment. Thus upon the belly they might have been made by kneeling to keep her down; upon her back, by falling on the said part against the ground: Her thighs might happen to be trampled on in the scuffle; and nothing more likely, than that somebody should lie upon her legs, for fear she should rise again before they had dispatched her. Thus, right or wrong, rather than it should be thought she was accessory to her own death, we must find out the best means we can, on which to ground a persuasion than it happened otherwise, that then of necessity there must be violence in the case.

We come now to the reasons, why you cannot believe she did destroy herself: Which I shall briefly speak to, as they lie in order; and, with you, submit myself to better judgments.

The first is, 'because she was found without her gown and night-trail; which' (that we may have a salve for every sore) 'were very probably torn in the scuffle.'

As to this, I must think it rational to suppose, that she herself might take them off, to promote (as she might imagine) the speedy sinking, or prevent the discovery of her body, by their spreading on the surface of the water; nor do I see any great difficulty in the thought, that a Norwich stuff may be rotted under water in as little time as the gown was of which we are speaking. If the night-trail be never found, I hope it does not follow that she was murdered: I should rather think, if the gown was brought and thrown in afterwards, so might the night-trail too; which would have been as easily rotted elsewhere as the gown, and with the same trouble both might have been cast into the water. I cannot suppose, admitting it had been in the river from the time of her drowning, that it would have been always in one place; but rather carried by the stream under water. Sometimes to one place, sometimes to another; sometimes lodged, and sometimes at liberty; as we find other trumpery will be under a current; So, that, supposing the miller had very diligently cleared that very wake but half an hour before, what hinders the possibility but that the next half hour the gown, either by itself, or together with other trash, might be carried thither by the stream and lodged?

Secondly, 'Because she was found floating; of which you make no doubt, because it was sworn by several witnesses.'

I have already taken notice, that from this there can be nothing certainly inferred: Dead bodies thrown into water, I am satisfied, will often sink; and drowned bodies sometimes will not: But as to the case before us, it is plain that some of those who viewed the body gave a different relation from some others. Thus some of them said she did float, though it was under water: whilst others, who should know best, being the parish-officers, and employed by the coroner to take her out, depose, that the body lay half a foot under water, and that, for any thing they could perceive, her feet might touch the bottom; and farther, that when she was heaved up, there were several sticks and flags on which she rested: But without all this, Sir, I think it very natural for a dead body, which is always buoyant in a current four or five foot deep, by the bare force of the stream, when it meets with a slanting opposition, to be raised from the bottom.

Thirdly, 'Because her belly was not at all swollen.'

Nor was it at all necessary, though drowned, that it should.

Fourthly, 'Because no water came out of her when lifted out of the water, nor purged from her afterwards.'

This, with submission, is a mistake: For though there is no quantity of water taken notice of to issue from her, yet it is agreed on both sides, that she did purge at the mouth and nostrils; some say more, others less. The two principal, who took her out, and stood by for some time afterwards, do affirm, that the froth came out after such a manner as to run down the sides of the face, and that as it was wiped off, fresh froth came presently on again; which Dr. Crell does assert could not have happened, had she been strangled, or otherwise killed, before. Whether this be so or not, I believe it very possible, where little water is received (and very little will suffice to drown a person), if there be so great a purgation at the mouth and nostrils, most, if not all the water may be turned into a spumous matter, at least so much, that there will be no absolute necessity for water to run out upon the motion of the body afterwards.

Fifthly, 'Because her inswards were not putrefied.'

After six weeks time I should indeed have expected putrefaction from any person under ground, that had not been embalmed, without regard to water taken into the body; which, whether or no it hasten putrefaction, is very disputable: What it may do under the earth, I know not; But, I much question, whether dead flesh, covered over with water, will grow putrid so soon as that which is exposed to the immediate contact of the air. Of this I shall be able to say more in a little time, and for the present leave it as a problem undecided.

Sixthly, 'From the several distinct settlements of blood, unusual in drowned persons.'

Upon the trial, it is affirmed by Mr. Camlin, that both Mr. Dimsdale and himself having viewed the body, did give it in as their opinion to the coroner, that there were no other settlements or stagnations of the blood, than what may usually happen to drowned bodies: Mr. Camlin instances in the child for one; but whether that were so or not, I have perceived it myself on the superficies of a drowned body; nor do I see why it may not be found on the neck and breast, as soon as on other parts.

Seventhly, 'From the continual disturbances Mrs. Gurrey was under, both in mind and body; nevertheless she would not discover it, till she was almost frightened out of her senses, by the voice, as she thought, of Mrs. Stout, which uttered these words, Divulge, conceal nothing.'

If Mrs. Gurrey was disturbed in mind, it would seem strange that she should not be disturbed in body; the latter being, as I suppose, seldom or never easy whilst the former is under trouble or disquiet. But whether Mrs. Gurrey's mighty disturbance had other rise than a whim of the brain, founded upon a strong prepossession of fancy, may very reasonably be questioned: For my part, I look on it so natural for a doating, ignorant old woman to be terrified with the disorder of her own imagination, before hand perverted by too deep reflection, though the same has nothing but a chimæra to support it, that I am never startled when I hear of their pretences to voices and revelations. These you know are not ingrossed, though more peculiar to a distinct sect. So that if once such persons happen to be strongly opinioned that any thing may be so they need but fall asleep, for a confirmation that it is so.

Had you not already acquainted us with the weakness of your intellect, and your incapacity, &c. I should have been startled that a man of learning and solid judgment should build on the idle fancies of a dreaming old woman. I think, how greatly soever she might be disturbed before in mind or body, she has now more reason to be concerned, that by a fond belief of a revelation, those men should be brought into danger of their lives, whom we have a great deal of reason to believe were as innocent as herself, and little or none to think they should be guilty of such a horrid fact as they were accused of.

Eighthly, 'From what is sworn by the Gurreys against their lodgers at the trial.'

Could I believe all to be true that the Gurreys swore, I should make no question, of the likelihood of these men's guilt: But that they did stretch in some things, is very easy to believe, by some particulars at the trial; and by their behaviour before, at, and after the same, we have great inducements to persuade us that they did so in others. Thus it is proved that Gurrey himself went out of the court in a boasting way, to tell some of his acquaintance, that he had done Cowper's business; or to that effect. And at another time he said, that if

Mr. Cowper had visited Mrs. Stout, none of this trouble had befallen him. Another thing discovers the malice of the prosecution; in that though themselves suspected Mrs. Stout's maid, yet this was not to be taken notice of, for fear of taking off her evidence: And if his wife could so readily turn the fifty shillings Mr. Maisson had that day received in Southwark, for business done in the Borough court, into fifty pounds, supposed to be paid him for murdering Mrs. Sarah Stout at Hertford; she might by the same kind of improvement, or by a mistake, understand all the rest.

It seems indeed to me the most notorious absurdity that can be imagined, that had these men really come down on such a design, they should go directly to tell their landlady, Mrs. Stout's business was done; they had spoiled her courting days; and that one of them had received fifty pounds for doing her business.

In matters of this nature, where we can have nothing but idle stories and an old wife's dream, to raise the suspicion, I think it highly behoves us, before we pass our censure, to pay a just regard to the character and reputation of the person. Thus, indeed, though it will be impossible for Mr. Cowper to clear himself in the opinion of every one who knows nothing of him, yet I am ready to think, there are few who know him (unless some particular persons, that upon any terms would willingly ruin the interest of his family in that county) will be brought to a persuasion, he could so barbarously imbrue his hands in blood, though instead of the pretended one thousand pounds he might have gained ten: and as to the other persons it is visible they live in credit and reputation, their characters well attested, and not one of them in the least likely to make an assassin for the lucre of five hundred pounds.

Ninthly, From the sentiments of the Grand Jury.

I must needs think, that on so formal an indictment drawn up against these gentlemen, such strenuous allegations of their being guilty, so foul a crime charged on them, such a circumstance attending as that of Mr. Cowper's being lost in her company, and the others of his acquaintance; especially when Mrs. Gurrey's tale had been set out with abundance of aggravation; I see not how for public satisfaction as well as private the grand jury could do less than find the bill. But as to the petty jury, as you call them, I wish you had named those several who did believe her murdered after the trial: I am assured that some of them have openly declared, they thought the gentlemen we speak of had been so much abused, that the prosecutor's estate, if it were ten times larger than it is, was little enough to make them reparation.

As to the letters produced in court, your thoughts it seems are, that they are not of a legitimate, but a spurious issue: and why?

1. Because the stile doth not vary with her character.

If the author of the Hertford Letter had no extraordinary, or perhaps no knowledge at all of her, but takes every thing on trust from her friends and relations; he ought not to be so positive, that the stile does no way suit her character. If by stile, as the word generally is understood, you mean the order of her thoughts, or the manner of her expression, you must own she might have sense enough to be the author of those compositions. But I find you make so bold with the use of words, and take them so differently from other learned men, that in some places it occasions a little difficulty to understand you. If by stile then, as I imagine, you would signify the subject of the discourse, or the matter of the composition; I have more reason to think, than I will at present make public, that these letters do well enough suit her character with some that knew her: and I must tell you, that I am ready to believe, had her mother been asked the question some months before she died, when she had some words with her one evening in the garden, or about the time when Theophilus was sent for to reprove her, about her falling from the light; I say, at these times I cannot think her mother would have denied but that these letters might have been suitable to her character. However, she is now out of a capacity to defend herself; and upon that account it might seem ill with contempt to tread upon her ashes: I shall therefore say no more, but that I would not have you too busy with the character, lest you should happen to make good an old proverb.

2. 'Because the mother doth affirm, the letters shewn in court, were of a smaller character than ever she observed her daughter to write; neither doth her brother think them to be genuine.'

Would it not have been very odd, if the mother and brother, who came to secure the reputation of so near a relation (though never so well satisfied that it was her hand), should have said otherwise than they did? For my part, I take both their answers to be so unsatisfactory, not to say foolish, that nothing but the relation they were speaking for can plead their excuse.

The mother being asked by the judge whether she thought it was her daughter's hand? replies only, 'How should I know? I know she was no such person; her hand may be counterfeited.' Being questioned again, what she would say to it if it had been written in a more sober stile? she answers, 'I shall not say it to be her hand, unless I had seen her write it.'

The brother being interrogated on the same question, says, 'It is like my sister's hand.' But being asked if he did believe it was her hand? He replies, 'No.' And why? 'Because it does not suit her character.' Now let the world judge, if this contains any more than if the mother had said, because she was my daughter, or the brother, because she was my sister, we will not believe it, lest the world should look on her to have been a lewd woman.

3. 'Because there was no mention made of these letters, till the common report of her being with child (which had been industriously spread abroad by several, but by none more zealously than by a nominal Quaker, her former admirer) was proved to be false, &c.'

If these letters were taken notice of so soon as the report of her being with child, it was very early; for that morning she was taken out of the water, it was whispered in the country, and at night I heard from some in London, that they believed it very likely for her to be with child; and that to prevent the ensuing infamy she had made herself away. This was no more than what is generally suspected, when a single gentlewoman is by any means accessary to her own death. So that without dispute, if the nominal Quaker had not been concerned in it, the report would have spread without him. But I judge this epithet is bestowed on him, not so much for that he thought and reported her to be with child, which hundreds did besides him at that time, but because he was so very officious, to prove her hand by his receipt.

This may indeed be thought a mean-spirited action from him, as he had been her former admirer; and I think if her hand-writing could have been proved without his appearance, he should have stirred last. However, I would not have you so very angry at him, since I do not find that he got any thing more by it, than to have the judge informed that he was one of their own sect. And if for this only he must be a nominal Quaker, I could tell you of some that have had great parts to act in this prosecution, that are as far from being real Quakers (if to be so is a perfection) as Mr. B——.

4. 'Because Mr. Marson and Mr. Archer on the trial swear, That Mr. Cowper deposed, that Mrs. Stout was a modest person, &c.'

When Mr. Cowper was before the coroner, he dreamed not of the approaching storm that was coming upon him; and I think it was not reasonable that he should concern himself at all with her character; there were not wanting those who were ready enough to think he had been too familiar with her, and that on some resentment taken at his carriage to her she had destroyed herself; so that if it were only to wipe off this suspicion, his account of her was no other than what any man under his circumstances might have given. I cannot tell what you might have thought of him, but had he told the coroner he knew she was melancholy; that it was upon his account, so that having formerly been very civil to her, he grew of late sick of her acquaintance; and that because in his last visit he had betrayed some little indifference, and notwithstanding her importunity, would not stay to lie at her house she had therefore in a passion thrown herself into the river; if Mr. Cowper, I say, had given the coroner such a relation as this, should have thought him a person of very little understanding.

As to her melancholy, I believe it was such as did make her head and her heart ache and and that it was more than a common hemiplegic, whatever you (who had perhaps no great intimacy with her) may imagine, or her mother and brother give out, I am satisfied there wants no proof of such a melancholy as was next to distraction. There is a certain gentlewoman now in being, who cannot deny that she had heard Mrs. Stout wish herself dead, saying, she was the miserablest creature living; and that she hoped, if it were possible, to die after such a manner that the world might know nothing of the matter, nor ever so much as mention there had been such a person living. But indeed her melancholy is too well attested, to be so much as doubted of by any disinterested person; and therefore as you are apt to think there are many friends and relations bigotted to a party that will not boggle to tell a lye to save a friend or near relation from — I suppose you mean the gallows; so, on the other hand, I believe there may be those in the world who would not scruple to tell an untruth, which is of near kin to a lye, and if it were in their power, would bring a man to the said place, rather than it should be thought a near friend and relation was in love with a married man.

The gentlewoman you take notice of, so much importuned by the deceased to stay with her that night, if she has not altered her story, will acknowledge that Mrs. Stout did tell her she was very much indisposed; and farther, saith she, you see I am very melancholy, so that it will be the greater unkindness if you leave me at this time alone.

You say there are a thousand pounds wanting of her original fortune: I wish you had told us whether you set aside the charge of the prosecution; if you include this in the want, one half might be expended that way; for I suppose there was nothing spared to carry it on.

I have heard of people's wanting that which they never had; and I am credibly informed this is the case in debate. Some of your countrymen, that have been many years acquainted in the family, do tell me there is as much found as ever she could be thought worth; but if you would be credited, you must give better proof than yours, or her relations say so. However, I think this to be very little material; she might, though in some things be very frugal, in others be as extravagant; but which way soever it is gone, it seems nothing less can repay it than the lives of persons who had never seen her.

Though the Quakers' affirmation will not be taken in criminal cases (it was well, I think, that it was not admitted in this particular one), yet they have now the privilege to publish their reasons, why they suspected Mr. Cowper to be privy to the receipt of any of her money, more than that which the writings found in her custody, and his own acknowledgment do evince. I am sure he has bid them a fair defiance, having openly challenged the worst of his adversaries to discover what they can of this nature.

If they think fit to draw up any thing of this kind, I should advise them to make use of some able clerk than the author of the Hertford Letter; for, if he has the management, it is a great chance if we are not entertained with one of Mrs. Gurrey's dreams, or some such ridiculous innuendo.

In this place we are once more acquainted with the use of the epiglottis, which you will have continually to close on the mouth of the aspera arteria, unless in expiration. On the contrary, I have told you (and will submit myself to any anatomist in Europe), that it is for the most part open, and never exactly closes but upon deglutition; so that whatever you build upon that notion must fall to the ground.

I think it is but reasonable, that Mr. bargon Hatsell return his thanks to you, for the compliment you put upon him in the close of your letter. I am ready to apprehend, that there is no trial suffered to be printed, till after the examination of the judge, and his permission first obtained; and therefore must needs, think omissions and alterations, especially of great moment, as these should be, which, you insinuate, is a very great injustice to the world, an injury to truth, and too sinister an action for a judge to be guilty of. But let who will stand in your way, I see you will have a sling at them; and rather than be thought to have nothing at all to say, will be telling us of that, which, if possible, comes to less.

Thus, to heighten the suspicion of guilt, we are entertained with a tale of a tub, about Mr. Stephens's being ill; or as you express it, taken with a strange sort of fit. I hope, Sir, it is not always an argument of a man's guilt, that he cannot carry himself unconcernedly, when he sees his life, hanging by a hair, or depending on the delivery of a word or two from the foreman of a jury; it is time enough to censure when we ourselves have undergone the trial.

Your story of the wine-cooper I have never heard of; and really, I am so desperate jealous of your relations, that I dare not credit them till they come with more authority: when I have better informed myself, I shall be better able to give you my opinion.

Your prayer, methinks, with which you conclude, had better have been left out; since, though it wants the length of the Pharisee's, whoever takes notice of the spirit that runs through the whole letter, will need no argument is to persuade him that it proceeds from an hypocrite. There is little appearance that it is your desire the innocent may be cleared from aspersions cast undeservedly on them, when for more than six pages, you are venting the utmost of your malice, and by the basest means imaginable, would insinuate those gentlemen are guilty, who, for any thing you know of the matter, may be as innocent as yourself.

Let me tell you, Sir, I think it a very bold attempt, and such as it is great pity does not come under the lash of the law. When a gentleman has taken his trial, and it does appear upon that trial, there is no proof of the fact he is charged with, nor indeed anything on which to ground so much as a suspicion, unless that of his being unfortunately the last person in her company: in a word, when faction and personal prejudice appear the only motives of the prosecution, whoever brings the business afresh on the stage, does only expose the restlessness of his own mind, and plainly evidence that he is neither a true gentleman, nor a good Christian.

I have looked over your postscript; and, as in many places of the letter, perceive through the weakness of your intellect, or your unfitness for the controversy, you have made good your prognostic of betraying a little ignorance.

First of all you tell your friend, you make no doubt but he has heard, that the surgeons that opened Mrs. Stout's body, deposed she was a virgin. Now if he had heard as much before, as you make no doubt he had, I don't see to what purpose, or what news it could be to inform him of that he had heard before; but being fearful it had not reached every body's ear, I make no doubt, this intelligence is to inform the world. But doubt you as you please, had I found the surgeons deposed as you report, I should be ready to doubt whether they were wise men or fools.

I find nothing like it in the affidavit, of which, you say, you have delivered us a true copy.

They tell us, indeed, 'They found the uterus perfectly free and empty, and of the natural figure and magnitude usually in virgins;' but surely this will not amount to a deposition, that she was a virgin: all that can be hence inferred, is only that she had not conceived; and if it be possible for a woman in coitu to miss of conception; if missing of a conception, the womb may, notwithstanding the carnal contact, retain the natural form and figure usually in virgins; why then, I say all this implies no more than a bare probability that she had not known a man.

I must confess, till now, I never heard that the figure or magnitude of the womb were numbered amongst the indubitable marks of virginity: and as to the state of the vagina, the myrtiform caruncles, and hymen, which mother Peppercorn herself could only guess at, there is no notice at all taken; if there had indeed, it would only have furnished matter of derision, the body having been so long interred. So that you see, for any thing pretended to in the affidavit, or elsewhere, she might not be a virgin; though charity should oblige us to hope at least that she was.

POSTSCRIPT.

Since this Reply went into the press, I have been informed by a gentleman of unquestionable credit, that the story of the wine-cooper, at the close of the Hertford Letter, took its rise only from what follows: There was, it seems, a person going down to the assizes, who had the misfortune to be thrown from his horse, and was taken up as dead: being carried to his lodging, he began to rave and talk idly; which was no more than the effect of a delirium, arising from the concussion of his brain, which might have made any man light-headed as well as he; and which nothing but one as mad could have improved after such a manner as the letter-writer has done. By this the public may be informed of the disingenuity, not to say down-right villainy, of some people in the world; who, missing their design of taking away a man's life, seek all possible ways of murdering his reputation.

SOME OBSERVATIONS

ON THE TRIAL OF SPENCER COWPER, J. MARSON, E. STEPHENS, W. ROGERS, THAT WERE TRIED AT HERTFORD, ABOUT THE MURDER OF SARAH STOUT; TOGETHER WITH OTHER THINGS RELATING THEREUNTO.

To lead, and to give some light into this matter, it may be necessary to give some account here, how, and upon what occasion the acquaintance of Spencer Cowper and Sarah Stout began.—The ground and rise thereof took its original from her father, who at all elections promoted the interest of the Cowpers, to the utmost of his power; through which a great intimacy was created between the families of the Cowpers and the Stouts; which did not expire with the death of her father; for her brother, by the father's side, continued his respects to that family, and spared no pains to espouse and carry on their interest, in order to their being chose parliament men for that town. These obligations engaged the two families to a frequent conversation; insomuch, that when they were in the country, some or other of them were often together, as well the young women as the men; as appeared by what his brother's wife said at his trial, 'That she was but six days at Hertford the summer before, and that she saw her' (to wit, S. Stout) 'every day.' And great pretensions of love, and proffers of kindness, were expressed by the Cowpers in general to the Stouts; and by this man, Spencer Cowper, and his wife, in particular, to the deceased young woman: and thus it continued, in appearance, till the day that she was forced off the stage of this world.

When her father died, he left her sole executrix, and gave her most part of his personal estate: and a considerable part of it being in the brewer's hands, and in malt, which she sold afterwards, she was often advising with one or other, how to dispose of this money, so as to have good securities for it. About a year before her death, she went to London about those occasions, and lodged at a goldsmith's house; as soon as the Cowpers' wives heard where she was, they made her a visit, both Spencer's and his brother's, and invited her to their houses. Whilst she lodged at this goldsmith's house, he laid out several hundred pounds for her in malt tickets, and other securities of the government; but she being not willing to lay out much that way, but rather on some mortgage of land, she went to a lawyer, with whom she was acquainted, to see if he could dispose of some for her; he told her he could help her to a mortgage for 500*l.* but they would give but five in the hundred; so she takes it into consideration; but afterwards, she being at Mr. Spencer Cowper's, and he falling into some discourse with her about her affairs, and understanding she had a considerable sum of money to put out, he professed to do her all the kindness that lay in his power; and would help her to a mortgage of land three times the value of the money lent on it, at six in the hundred; And would see that the title should be good, and be as careful in it; as if it were his own concern; and if she wanted counsel at any time, either to put out, or to recover money that was owing her, or any thing else, for which she had occasion, he would give it her gratis, which from another must cost her some guineas: so she accepted of his proffer, and told him, she would depend on his advice, not questioning to have good security for her money. When she came home to her lodging, she told the goldsmith where she lodged, that now Mr. Spencer Cowper had promised to help her to securities, and he was to dispose of her money.

Soon after this, she went home to Hertford, and told her mother the same, and asked her if she had any money to put out; if she had, it might go amongst her's, and her mother should have no trouble with it; for she would pay her the interest as it became due: her mother then asked her, if she could so far confide in him, as to receive her money, to pay it, and to make the writings, and to look after the title, and all without the inspection of any body else? she said, Yes, she believed that he was a very honest man, and she thought she might trust him with more than she had to put out; and he being a man of repute, it was below him to wrong her. Then her mother, thinking the same, gave her 150*l.* to put amongst her's, which she hath never heard of since; but it is gone with the rest.

About a month after, Spencer Cowper came to Hertford, and took lodgings for his wife and family, and then brought his wife to give this young woman a visit, and to be further acquainted with her. After this, she seemed to love and like her company so well, that she said, 'She did not desire the company but of few, or none else in the town; and therefore would make no returns of their visits, till the week before she went home to London;' and would come frequently two or three times in a week to visit her: and when her husband was in the country, he sometimes would come with her, and thereby had the opportunity of discoursing her about her affairs.

When she had gathered in near what she intended he should put out, from the brewers and others that were indebted to her, she writ a letter to London to him; and one of her acquaintance coming to visit her, before she had sealed it up, she bid her read it, which she did; in which letter she writ, viz. 'That she had a thousand pounds to put out, and that several hundreds of it were then ready; and the rest, to make up that sum, would be soon a little time, or so soon as he could dispose of it advantageously for her.'

After this, she several times, in discourse with this woman, hath told her, 'That he was buying an estate for her, in ground-rents, which he had recommended to her for an extraordinary pennyworth; and that it would be sold for a thousand pounds, but he believed it was worth more; and if he could not oblige her with it, he looked upon it to be so great a bargain, that he would buy it for his own use;' and she also told her mother the same.

The next quarter sessions after this, which was the last before that assize, at which time her days were ended, Spencer Cowper came to Hertford, and in the evening he came and enquired for Mrs. Sarah Stout, at her mother's house, where he was not at all expected to lodge, he not having lodged there for several years, viz. not since her father died: and after about an hour's discourse with her, he said, 'He was destitute of a lodging, for his landlord Bates' (where he used to lodge) 'was disposed, and made a great noise, and he did not like to lodge there.' So she thought she could do no less, in civility, than ask him to lodge at her mother's house, he having then brought her that mortgage deed for 200*l.* about which he made such a long discourse at his trial; which money had been carried publicly to him some time before: at the receiving of which security, she seemed to be very much pleased. But she having told him, that she intended to reserve some part of her portion for her own particular use, in case she lived to marry, which she would put out for that end, she having enough besides; he advised her then to keep it private from all persons, else her end would be frustrated; which, in all likelihood, he thought she had, and that none had known her mind to that particular but himself, he having advised her to privacy.

Indeed S. Cowper doth suggest, in a Case lately presented to some of the members of parliament, (see p. 1189) that his prosecutors had not the impudence to suggest at his trial (though put in mind of it), that what they accused him of was done for the sake of gain. It is true, he did demand a proof, that he had any of the deceased young woman's money in his hands: and it cannot be supposed that he would conceal it, if he knew there was any one alive that could make positive proof of it; for then it would have been in vain to have denied it: but her mother did then attempt to speak what she knew in that particular, and other things too, but was stopped several times, and not suffered to speak, unless she would swear; which he knew well enough, her persuasion would not admit her to do.

The next thing observable is, the same woman, before-mentioned, which read and saw:

her letter sent to him, which gave an account what money she intended he should dispose of for her, and that she had several hundred pounds of it then ready: she being with her one day in her chamber, about two weeks before her death, she bid her look in a drawer there, and bring her the money therein; upon perceiving it, 'Am not I very rich?' said she. 'Because,' said she, 'it is all the money that I am now mistress of;' which was only two guineas and a little silver, notwithstanding she had so many hundred pounds in her possession not long before. And about the same time, she being in discourse with another person about her concerns, she said, 'That Spencer Cowper had a great deal of her monies in his hands, and that he was to have more;' and her relations do miss about a thousand pounds; and they know of none she disposed of any other ways, after she writ that letter to him. And when her mother asked him before the lord chief justice Holt, what money he had in his hands of her daughter's? He said 'None;' and also said, 'He thought his reputation would have secured, or carried him above suspicions or examinations of that kind.'

But it may easily be gathered who carried her money away, for a great deal of it was in gold; and that very morning he went away, when he had lodged at her mother's house, he very much importuned her to come to his house at London, and told her how glad his wife would be of her company, and used many arguments to persuade her to it; and at length said, 'He would not go out of the house till she had promised him to come;' but she refused to promise, and said, 'She did not know when she should come to London.' This discourse was in the hearing of one that will evidence it upon oath.

The week before that assize, she received a letter from his wife, which was writ after the usual manner, as she had several not long before, very earnestly inviting her to her house at London, with high expressions of love; and so much the more she desired her company then, because she believed they should not come to lodge at Hertford that summer: and in that letter tells her, 'that they must expect her husband at their house at the assize;' the which she told her mother and others who read the letter. This letter Spencer Cowper confessed to the coroner's inquest, that he ordered his wife to write it for his lodging at her mother's house; but when he was examined by the lord chief justice Holt, he then denied it, and said, 'his wife writ no letter;' but her maid, Sarah Walker, being present, told him, 'His wife did send a letter, and that she herself took it in of the post-man, and gave it to her mistress;' so then he could not deny that there was a letter sent.

And accordingly he came, and sent his horse thither; and being asked, before he rid from the door, whether he would come to dinner? He said, 'He was not certain, but he would send word;' but her mother and she staying long, and he not sending, they sent her maid, to see whether he would come or no; who then quickly came, and dined there: and when he went from thence, the young woman, Sarah Stout, going to the door with him, asked, 'If he thought to lodge at their house?' He said, 'Yes, he would come and lodge at their house.' This she said as soon as he was gone, and then bid the maid go get his bed ready: at night, when he came, her mother being in the room with her, he fell into some discourse remote from any thing of her daughter's business; and, after some time, called for pen and ink, to write a letter to his wife, although it was not post-night, nor did any carrier go next day. When he went to write, her mother and she went out of the room, and staid a considerable time; but it growing late, the young woman went in, to see if he had done, and if he would have any supper; and what he desired, he had. Her mother went not in again, because she knew her daughter expected he would give her some account of her money, and have brought her security for it, as he did the sessions before for 200*l.*; and she finding that he would not speak of it before her, would not interrupt them, but gave her daughter time and opportunity to speak to him. What discourse they had, is not known; but sure enough it was very different from, and inconsistent with, what he rendered it to be at his trial; for he had writ a receipt in full for use-money he paid her then, which lay on the table, but was never signed by her, although he pressed her to it several times, and bid her put on her considering-cap, (as he confessed to the coroner's inquest) and asked her, 'If she was lazy?' yet still she refused to sign it; which plainly shewed her dissatisfaction, and that there was more due to her, else she would never have refused it.

Between ten and eleven o'clock, she called her maid to make a fire in his chamber, and to warm his bed, in his hearing; and while the maid was doing it, he went out: her mother hearing the door clap, went into the parlour, to ask her what the reason was of his going out when his bed was a-warming, and, to her surprise, found she was gone too, and never saw her alive afterwards. She admired what the meaning of this should be, knowing that she never used to go out so late; neither could she imagine whither they should be gone; but after some consideration, did think he might tell her, that the securities she expected were to be signed and sealed somewhere in the town; and that he had persuaded her to go out upon that account, and so was in expectation of them quickly. The maid that was warming his bed stayed, expecting him to come up; thinking, when she heard the noise of the door, he was gone to carry his letter somewhere; which, it is thought by some, was his pretence in going out, thereby to draw her to the door, to let him out; for there is no ground to believe she went any farther with him willingly: so they sat up all night, both her mother and the maid, expecting them every minute, not knowing where to look for her at that time of night; but if they had, would never have gone to the river, where she was found floating the next morning; for there was no manner of circumstance, either in her words or actions, that did give them any cause to think she would drown herself, or that she ever had any thing of that nature in her thoughts.

No sooner was she taken out of the river, but it was spread, by his party, both in city and country, that she was with child, and had drowned herself to avoid the shame. That she was not drowned, is clear unto all who are impartial, and have had a true account of the case, either at the trial, or otherwise; as it plainly appeared by those settlements of blood and bruises about her head and neck, and on one of her arms; and her having no water in her, but was empty and lank, when she was first taken out of the water.

The evidence was very full and plain against them, and the judgments of the doctors stand firm and good, and are not, nor ever can be disproved, by all the evasions and distinctions of voluntary drowning, and drowning by accident; nor by all those little tricks made use of by those on the other side, by drowning, and half drowning of dogs, and other such like experiments, whereby they have only exposed themselves. But when she was taken up again, after she had been buried six weeks, in order to be cleared of that infamous report, which then was given out, for the only reason why she drowned herself (to wit), her being with child; then nothing could be more plain, than that she was not drowned, but came by her death some other way, as the doctors and surgeons did give their opinion upon oath, before the lord chief justice Holt, and at the trial also.

And it is very probable, that these three gentlemen, John Marson, Ellis Stephens, and Wm. Rogers, knew very well how she came by her death, (whose lives Spencer Cowper seemed to be more tender of than of his own) by their discourse that night her death was, about an hour after she was missing; for as soon as they came into their lodgings at John Gurrey's, they could not forbear, but began to ask him several questions about her. Although we do not understand that either of them had any former knowledge of her, yet Marson pretended, that he had made love to her, and that she had cast him off; 'But,' said he, 'a friend of mine is even with her by this time;' then one of the others asked him, 'If the business was done?' 'If it is not,' said he, 'it will be done this night.' 'Yes,' says the other, 'her business is done; Sarah Stout's courting days are over.' What could have been spoke plainer, except they had said, 'She is dead?' This was positively proved against them. Also, the said Marson, when he came into his lodging, was in a great sweat, and called for a fire to dry his feet and shoes, they being wet both without and within; and pretended, that he was just then come from London, it being then between eleven and twelve o'clock at night; whereas it was proved, that he came into town two or three hours before. And when Marson asked the other two, 'what they had spent that day?' one of them asked, 'what was that to him?' 'He was to have forty or fifty pounds for his share.' The said Marson also pulling out money out of his pocket, swore that he would spend it all next day, for joy the business was done. And whereas they say, in their Case to the parliament, 'They are men in good business at London:' if they are so, it had been well if they had staid in it; for sure enough, they had no good business at Hertford; neither did they pretend to any at all, but said, 'they came only to see fashions,' to the woman where they lodged.

And it is very observable, how highly displeased Spencer Cowper was at her being taken up, and how he earnestly besought the judge, that what the doctors did and said then, might not be allowed, or taken for evidence; alleging, that she ought not to have been taken out of her grave without legal authority, for private inspection of parties, altogether amongst themselves; whereas there ought to have been some on both sides, he says, lest they should have broke her skull, and the gentlemen should have been trepanned; and yet doctor Camlin, sir William Cowper's doctor, was with them all the while, as doctor Coatsworth told the judge, and was sent for, on purpose to take off any such objection; and did set his hand to the certificate, of her clearness of that scandal, with the rest of the doctors: which is as followeth:

'We whose names are here under written, having examined the body of Mrs. Sarah Stout, deceased, do find the uterus perfectly free and empty, and of the natural figure and magnitude, as usually in virgins. We found no water in the stomach, intestines, abdomen, lungs, or cavity of the thorax.

JOHN DIMSDALE, SEN.

WILLIAM COATSWORTH.

SAMUEL CAMLIN.

ROBERT DIMSDALE, M.D.

JOHN DIMSDALE, JUN.

DANIEL PHILLIPS, M.D.

Hertford, April 28th, 1699. (Copia vera.)

When all mouths were stopped, and put to silence in that matter, and no reason could be given why she should drown herself; then Spencer Cowper was at a loss, and knew not what to pretend, why she should do so; 'until (to use his own words) some heads were laid together, to contrive that she was in love with him.

In order to this design, those letters were invented, which were produced in court, (for not a word was ever heard of them before she was taken up again) and a witness was provided to prove the receiving of them both; but this friend Marshall, who was his witness, had forgot the year when the first was writ, and said, it was March was twelvemonth; till this memory was refreshed by the second, which was dated but four days after; and it seems they had forgotten to date that second letter, so as to give it any credit at all. This was that which he calls that importunate letter by which he was invited down to lodge at that gentleman's house, which was dated the ninth of March.

Now, if her maid Sarah Walker's evidence is observed, which she begins with, 'My lord, on Friday before the last assize, my mistress Stout received a letter from Mr. Cowper's wife, to let her know we must expect Mr. Cowper at the assize; and accordingly we expected him, and provided for his coming.'

This was the same day on which he says he received her letter of invitation that she received his wife's, by which he invited himself down. So that if she had really writ that letter, his wife's must needs be writ and sent the day before her's could come to his hands.

And how those letters should be known to come from Sarah Stout is very unaccountable: for if there had been such a person as Mrs. Jane Ellen at that coffee-house he mentions, (which, upon enquiry, we cannot hear there was), what he had to do to open her letters? and how could he tell that they were for him, and came from Sarah Stout, seeing they were not directed to him, nor either S. Cowper nor S. Stout within them, but only Sir?

To prove these letters to be her hand, he brings his friend Marshall to shew letters which he pretended she writ to him, as false as the other; in one of which there were thanks for his songs. It is very unlikely that she should desire or accept of songs, one who was never heard to sing a song in her life; and from Marshall too, whose courtship she never received: for he himself said at the trial, that upon very little trial she gave him a very fair denial. And Spencer Cowper also said to the coroner's inquest, that Marshall told him, she always gave him the repulse.

This confirms the falseness of that story which he brings to introduce his letters. And although she is gone, and not in a capacity to defend herself; yet the woman who he says walked with them is alive, and doth affirm it is not true; which is as followeth:

He says, It happened one evening that Mrs. Stout, and another, and Mr. Marshall, and he, were walking together; and Mr. Marshall and the other being a little before, she took that opportunity to speak to him, in such terms as he confessed, it surprized him, and said, she did not think he had been so dull: he desiring to know wherein his dullness did consist; she asked, if he thought she would marry Marshall? He said, Yes; else she had done ill in what she had done: she said, No; she thought it might serve to divert the censure of the world, and favour her acquaintance with him.

This discourse, if it had been true, would have argued, that she kept Marshall company, and made him believe she would have him: whereas it seems she had never seen him in all her life but once, and that was but two or three days before; and they were not so much acquainted then, as to speak one to the other: and therefore there could be no ground for such discourses if she had walked alone with Spencer Cowper, which she did not; for the two young women having been taking a walk in the field, as they were coming home they met Spencer Cowper and Marshall; and they both turned, and walked back before, and the two young women together behind him: and she had no private discourse at all with Spencer Cowper; neither had they four any walk together afterwards, in the field or elsewhere.

These letters, which were ushered in by this discourse, he would have it thought that the shewing of them was so tender a point with him, and that he did it with so much reluctance and compulsion, that nothing else should have forced him to have brought them upon the stage, if he had not those three innocent gentlemen to defend (surely they had greatly obliged him); and he solemnly protested, that if he had stood there singly upon his own life, on that evidence, he would not have done it: when at the same time, and with the same breath, he himself proved it false; for he says, upon the receiving of them, he shewed one to his brother, and both to Marshall, and they both saw it, and read it: that was the last, the Friday before that assize, when neither his own life nor his three gentlemen's were in any danger; for she was then alive. And if there had been such letters of her's, he could not have shewed them to one that in all probability would have exposed or defamed her more than Marshall, a repulsed lover, a kinsman of his wife's, unto whom he endeavoured to betray her; who, upon some slight or disgust she gave him, told Spencer Cowper, that if he was his friend, he would shoot her. This she told both her own and her mother's maid: and also, as it is observed in the Hertford Letter, the printers, who writ the trial in short-hand, not having taken those letters, were favoured with the copies of them, to be exposed to the world.

They there was an account given to the judge, in the court, of his going to Deptford, and was said to be told his father at dinner in her hearing, about a year and a half before; which put her into a swoon, if any body will believe it: and the use that was made of this was, to render her as bad as possible, and make the world believe how deeply she was in love with him. But it is matter of admiration to most that hear it, that he did not tell his wife, as well as his father and brother, how fond she was of him: if it had been true, surely that would have diverted her from frequenting her company so often as she did all that summer following, as is before mentioned, which all the neighbourhood can witness. And if she was such a person as they now render her, why did they seek and desire her company, as they did? For she has several times said, she never sought theirs.

And also, it is as much to be wondered at, that so chaste a man as he would appear to be, and one in so flourishing a condition, as he says he is, should order his wife to write, or have any thoughts of lodging at a house, for saving the charge of a guinea (for so he said at his trial, that his good husbandry to save a guinea had brought all that mischief upon him), where so lewd a woman as he would have her thought to be did dwell, if he had been really invited; which sure enough he was not, but invited himself; and so she told her mother before he came.

But it is plainly to be understood, that the respect she had for him, was not as for one that she believed to be viciously inclined, but as for an honest man; as appeared by the trust she reposed in him; and also his being related to that family, whom she, as well as her relations, did so highly value and esteem, that she could have put not only her money, but her life into any one of their hands.

She little thought what sort of a man she had to deal with; she was so deceived by his seeming sobriety when in her company, and the great pretended kindness to her by him and his wife, both for her own sake and her father's, she could not imagine that a branch of that family could have touched a hair of her head, to have hurt her, or have wronged her of one farthing: she was so honest and plain-hearted, and so innocent herself, and so far from deserving any ill usage from him, or any of that family, or indeed from any else; that she, as well as her relations, could have served them to the utmost of their power: but what returns of kindness have been made, and how she hath been treated and defamed, now she is gone, and not in a capacity to defend or answer for herself, let the world judge.

But it is evident and plain, that most, or chiefly what he made use of at his trial, to defend himself and his three gentlemen, when he was not upon his oath, is proved false, even by what himself did swear when he was examined by the coroner's inquest: for when they asked him, if he knew any thing that troubled or put her into a discontent, or discerned she was melancholy, or knew any one she was in love with, or any cause why she should drown herself? Unto all which he answered, 'No, upon his oath; he discerned nothing of melancholy, neither knew he any that she was in love with: he knew one Marshall that was in love with her, but she had none for him, but always gave him the repulse; and she was a very modest woman, and he knew no cause why she should drown herself.'

And yet at his trial both he and his witnesses pretended to know her to be so melancholy as was near to a distraction; and this depth of melancholy he would insinuate as for love of him; and therefore she drowned herself.

Now what can be more contradictory, or more fully prove that which he spake at his trial to be false, than this which he himself did swear? And this was evidenced by two of the coroner's inquest, and several more would have done the same, if they had been suffered to speak; but, as the trial relates, they were stopped.

Many observations might be made, and instances given, to clear her reputation; and to prove the falshood of what was cast upon her; as, in particular, her so earnestly inviting a young woman, an acquaintance of hers, who had kept her company that afternoon, and used to lie with her sometimes, to stay and lie with her that night her death was; and she telling her, she could not well stay then, she engaged her to come and dine with her the next day, and told her what was for dinner; desiring her company all day after, she not intending to go from home; which she promised to do.

And it is very observable, from the beginning of the trial to the end, what shifts and devices he is forced to make use of to drill out the time, that there might not be enough for the witnesses on the other side to be heard; and also his endeavouring to baffle the evidence against him; as first, above twenty frivolous questions he asked her maid about poison, which she bought to poison a mischievous dog which haunted the house; and if he could by any means confuse and put her out, if she had not had truth on her side, and gladly would have picked something out of it, if he could have told what.

Also, the many impertinent witnesses he calls to prove his intention to lodge at Bardford's that night her death was, and sending for his bag thither, and lodging his things there; which it seems was not at all expected by them, for John Bardford's wife said, upon her oath, she believed Spencer Cowper did not intend to lodge at her house? But was surprised when he sent to her, between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, to get his bed ready, and came before it was quite done.

And the next night after, when he was sent for by the coroner's inquest to give an account where he left her, he said, in the parlour where we sat. And being asked, if he did not hear her bid her maid warm his bed? He said, I thought she had meant her own bed. But it is very unlikely that she would go to bed and leave him sitting there; or that when he went out she should sit still, and not light him to the door. But if it were as he says, that he left her in the parlour; for a man of his education and figure in the world to go away at that time of night, when he knew there was a fire in his chamber, and his bed was a warming, and let himself out in the dark, and say nothing to any body, it certainly looks very darkly.

And then his sending for his horse three times to her mother's house the night after her death, before he was examined by the coroner's inquest, and would have gone out of town then, if he could have had him, as he confessed to the lord chief justice Holt; but at the trial he said, I sent for him, for fear the lord of the manor should seize him.

Also, when it was taken notice of at his trial, by the counsel, that he never came after that night her death was to give her mother any account where he left her, or in any wife to give her satisfaction; to this he answered, It might be strange for me to come and visit a woman that I never had the least knowledge of: And yet he had several times lodged at her house when her husband was living: And that night also, that he was examined by the coroner's inquest, when they asked him, if he discerned her daughter to be melancholy? He said, No; only he thought she was not so free in discourse at dinner as sometimes he had seen her; for most of the discourse then was between her mother and him. Surely he will be hard put to it to reconcile himself in this discourse.

And it is very remarkable, what great dissimulation he manifested at that time; for in his discourse, he taking occasion to speak of the people called Quakers, he expressed so great love for them, and for their principles, that if ever he changed his religion, he said, it should be for theirs: Notwithstanding he derided them so much at his trial, about their being by education intitled to the light within.

Thus, in short, upon the whole matter, it may be concluded, that the defence he had made for himself and his three gentlemen, and the most material things he made use of, whereby they got off, and were acquitted, were proved false out of his own mouth before he went out of the court; as it may be seen in the trial, where the counsellor for the king says thus: 'My lord, we insist upon it, that this is a different evidence from what Mr. Cowper gave to the coroner's inquest; for then he said, he knew none she was in love with, nor any cause why she should do such an extravagant action as to drown herself. But now he would make the whole scheme of things turn upon a love fit.' And than he moved the court to give leave to call several persons of quality and good repute, who were there present, to speak to her reputation, in contradiction to the letters produced; declaring, that he believed the whole town would do the same. Then the judge said, they would grant that; and did not question it. So there was none permitted to say any thing to that purpose.

406. The Trial of MARY BUTLER alias STRICKLAND, at the Old Bailey, for Forging a Bond of 40,000*l*. in the Name of Robert Clayton.* 11 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1699.

October 12, 1699.

Cl. of Arr. BRING Mary Butler to the bar. [Accordingly she was brought.]

'Mary Butler alias Strickland, you stand indicted by the name of Mary Butler alias Strickland, late of London, widow; for that you endeavouring, and maliciously intending, to deceive and oppress sir Robert Clayton, knight and alderman of London, the 1st day of December, in the 7th year of his now majesty's reign, at London aforesaid, in the parish of St. Mary Woolnoth, in the ward of Langborne, a certain false writing, sealed in form of a bond, bearing date the 14th day of April, 1687, in the name of the said sir Robert Clayton, for the payment of the penal sum of 40,000*l*., to be made by the said sir Robert Clayton to you Mary Butler alias Strickland, with condition there under written; concerning, among other things, the payment of 20,000*l*., to be made to you Mary Butler alias Strickland, after the death of the said sir Robert Clayton, by his heirs, executors, and administrators; falsely, knowingly, unlawfully, and subtilly did make, counterfeit and write, and cause to be made, counterfeited and written: And farther, that you, Mary Butler alias Strickland, afterwards, viz. the 1st day of December, in the 7th year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, a certain false and forged writing, sealed in form of a bond, in the name of the said sir Robert Clayton, for the payment of the penal sum of 40,000*l*. by the said sir Robert Clayton, to you Mary Butler alias Strickland, with condition under written, concerning, among other things, the payment of 20,000*l*., to be made to you Mary Butler alias Strickland, after the death of the said sir Robert Clayton, by his heirs, executors or administrators, as a true bond of the said sir Robert Clayton, as if really made by him; falsely, subtilly, and deceitfully, did publish, you Mary Butler alias Strickland well knowing the said writing to be false, forged and counterfeited, and not the deed of the said sir Robert Clayton, to the great damage of the said sir Robert Clayton, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.'

Cl. of Arr. How sayest thou, Mary Butler alias Strickland, art thou guilty of this forgery whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Prisoner. Not guilty.

Cl. of Arr. Prisoner, look to your challenges. Cryer, swear the jury, which follow: William Clark, William Christopher, Thomas Wharton, George Kimble, James Church, John Whistler, George Ludlam, Richard

* For the law of Forgery, see East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 19.

Kemble, John Clarke, Stephen Broughton, Joseph Sheppard, Thomas Wickham.

Clerk of Arr. You of the jury that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to her cause. She stands indicted, &c.

Mr. Montagu. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this indictment does charge the prisoner at the bar, Mary Butler, alias Strickland, with a fraud and intended cheat. It sets forth, that the prisoner at the bar, intending to cheat sir Robert Clayton, did counterfeit a certain writing, purporting to be the bond of sir Robert Clayton, for payment of 20,000*l.*, and that it was to be paid to the said Mary Butler, alias Strickland, after the death of the said sir Robert Clayton. Likewise, that she did publish this writing as sir Robert Clayton's deed. To this indictment she has pleaded not guilty. If we prove the fact, I do not question but you will find her guilty, that she may have her due punishment.

Serj. Wright. My lord, I am counsel for the king in this cause. You hear what sort of crime it is that is charged on the prisoner. It is for forging a bond of no less penalty than 40,000*l.*, for the payment of 20,000*l.* This is made in the name of sir Robert Clayton, and the 20,000*l.* were to be paid a little after his own death, by his executors or administrators: and that in the mean time 1,200*l.* a year were to be paid for the interest of this sum. But, my lord, the prisoner did not rest here, (a second contrivance will be opened to you.) That which she is now charged with, is the forging of a bond of the penalty of 40,000*l.*

My lord, the prisoner for some years had a great intimacy with a great peer, the late duke of Buckingham. And she either had, or pretended to have, a bond from him for 5,000*l.*, payable to herself after his death, and an annual interest in the mean time, till the principal was paid. Sir Robert Clayton being a trustee of the duke's estate for the payment of his debts, the prisoner came frequently to sir Robert Clayton, to solicit his favour and interest for the payment of this debt. On this account she insinuated herself into his company and into his family. Sometimes she pretended to be a great penitent, and that she was sorry for the conversation she had with the duke; that her own relations were papists, and if she should go to them, they would send her into a nunnery. All which was but counterfeit, and in order to win upon sir Robert Clayton; and he finding she was an ill woman, notwithstanding all her pretences, he at last, about twelve years ago, forbid her his house; and since that she never was there.

About the year 1695, sir Robert Clayton had some private intimation given him, that the prisoner had a great demand on him, no less than 20,000*l.* Upon this sir Robert Clayton took the best course he could to find it out, and exhibited a bill in Chancery against her, and some of her accomplices, to discover whether they had any pretences upon him or his estate. To this bill the prisoner put in an answer, that she had no claim or demand against him upon any account whatsoever. While this was in agitation, the prisoner came to Mr. Woodward, an attorney of this city, and brought him a writing, purporting a bond, with the name, Robert Clayton, subscribed to it, sealed and attested by four witnesses, as the bond of sir Robert Clayton; and told Mr. Woodward, "That bond was given to her by sir Robert Clayton, upon some good considerations; but it having taken air, some uneasiness had risen about it in sir Robert Clayton's family; and (as she pretended) upon this account he had exhibited a bill in equity against her, therefore this bond must be delivered up; and sir Robert had promised to give her a new bond for 20,000*l.*, and that all the money in arrears for interest, was to be turned to principal, and put into the new bond: But this was to be done very privately, so as not to be known by any of sir Robert Clayton's family; and therefore none of his servants were to be privy to it." Thereupon she gives to Mr. Woodward the bond, desiring him to make a new bond by it, and to turn all the interest that was due into principal. Upon this, Mr. Woodward made her a bond of the penalty of 54,000*l.*, conditioned for payment of 27,000*l.* after sir Robert Clayton's death, and interest in the mean time. This bond she took away with her, and likewise the first bond; but what she did with them since, we are not privy to. And a great charge she laid upon Mr. Woodward, to carry it with all possible privacy, that no notice might be taken by sir Robert's family.

Some few months ago there was another intimation sent to sir R. Clayton, that this gentlewoman pretended to have a great claim upon him of a great sum of money that was to be paid her, either at present, or after his death; and that Mr. Woodward made the bond, and he could give an account of it. Upon this sir Robert Clayton sent to Mr. Woodward, who like a very honest man, told the whole business, in what manner it was the prisoner came to him, and how he came to make the bond; and that he was desired to be silent in it, sir Robert Clayton having desired this bond should be made out of his own house, that none of his family might take notice of it. Sir R. Clayton having this notice, and finding from Mr. Woodward, the prisoner had taken this course to carry on this design to charge his estate, he got a warrant from the lord chief justice to have her before him, to be examined before his lordship. Where being brought, she, upon her examination, has confessed the whole matter, her having the first bond, and where it was made. What is become of the latter bond, we cannot get out of her, nor whether she ever affixed the name of sir R. Clayton to that. But we will produce credible witnesses to prove her guilty of forging the first bond for the payment of twenty thousand pounds; and that it had the name and seal of sir R. Clayton affixed to it; and that she affirmed it to be a good bond, well executed by sir R. Clayton.

and that there was interest due upon it from sir R. Clayton and that the interest was in the second bond to be turned into principal. We will call witnesses to prove this, and then I hope she shall have such punishment as she deserves.

Mr. Northey. My lord, what the nature of this evidence will be, I shall inform you. It cannot be expected from us to produce the bond; for that she carried away from Mr. Woodward; so that we cannot give the writing itself in evidence; but, if she insist on it, we hope she will produce the bond. We have the copy (taken by Mr. Woodward) of the first bond which he had from her, that he might draw the second bond by it. But we can prove from that, which agrees with our record, that she affirmed, that the first bond that she produced was sir R. Clayton's: That that bond which she produced, of which this is the copy, she affirmed to be sir R. Clayton's deed. We shall do that, and afterwards prove her publishing it; for our indictment is against her for forging a bond; and publishing that forged bond, knowing it to be such, and close all with her own confession. And, my lord, there is this to shew there could be nothing in the bond; that from the time she pretended to have this bond, when she was to have twelve hundred pounds a year, she remained a prisoner all that time, and got herself out by swearing she was not worth five pounds in all the world. Call Mr. Woodward.

(Who appeared and was sworn.)

Serj. Wright. Mr. Woodward, you hear what the charge is; pray give an account of what you know in reference to it.

Woodward. My lord, Mrs. Butler has been my client many years. About two or three years ago, more or less, Mrs. Butler came to me, and brought me a bond; she gave it me to peruse, and told me another must be drawn by it. When I had perused the bond, I found it was signed Robert Clayton, and four witnesses names set to the bond. It was a bond of the penalty, as I remember, of forty thousand pounds, and I think it was in the year 1687, for to pay, I think, twelve hundred pounds a year, by four quarterly payments yearly, during sir Robert Clayton's life, and 20,000*l.* within six months after his death. There were some other things in that bond, which will appear by the copy, which indeed I did take; for Mrs. Butler desired it might be a secret, being of a very great concern. And I asked her why such a bond should be given; I thought it must be great generosity, and not for money lent. But she told me the 40,000*l.* bond was to be delivered up to sir Robert. I asked her, why, since she had it, she did not keep it? She said, that he would give her another bond. She told me it had taken air, and my lady Clayton had some disquiet about it; and for my lady's satisfaction, a bill in Chancery was exhibited against her, to which she was to put in her answer, and thereby disclaim any sort of bond, or interest, or any pretence that she had upon sir Robert Clayton.

Serj. Wright. She told you this herself?

Woodward. Yes; and when she gave me the bond, she told me it was sir Robert Clayton's bond, or to that purpose. But there being about nine or ten years arrears of interest, she desired me to cast up the interest that was in arrear, and that it might be put to the principal in the new bond, saying, that sir Robert would give her a bond for the whole together.

Serj. Wright. Was the whole interest pretended to be in arrear?

Woodward. I cannot say, all the interest.

Serj. Wright. How did you compute it, from the date of the bond, or from what she told you?

Woodward. She said she had received some money, and I computed the rest rather under than over, and so made the interest to come to 7,000*l.* (the interest payable by the bond being 1,200*l.* a year). Whereupon she desired I would draw a bond for it myself; and accordingly she left the first bond with me. I took some time, and drew it; and made the penalty thereof 54,000*l.* conditioned for the payment of 27,000*l.* And it was to be made in the same nature as the former was, in respect of the principal, and in the mean time to continue the payment of the interest yearly; by proportionable quarterly payments.

Mr. Montagu. What discourse had you with her about it?

Woodward. I did draw a bond, and did take notice, that whereas sir R. Clayton had given her this bond of 40,000*l.* and at his request she had delivered it up to him; and upon an account stated, there did remain 7,000*l.* in arrears for interest, which in all amounted to 27,000*l.* or thereabouts; when I gave it her, I said, it was a very great sum, it concerns you to have witnesses of credit, for nobody will believe sir Robert Clayton did give you this bond, especially after his death, unless it be very well attested. I told her, if she pleased, I would go and be a witness for her to see it executed. So she went away. And when she came to me again, she told me, that sir Robert knew me very well, but did not think fit to have me for a witness. I answered, I do not care; but it being a very great sum, take care it be well executed. I gave her both the bonds, and from that time heard no more of it till about two months since.

Mr. Northey. Was there any body came to discourse with you of making a new bond, besides herself?

Woodward. Not that I know of, I do not remember any. It was an extraordinary sum, I did take a copy of the bond.

Mr. Northey. Have you it here?

Woodward. Yes, I have it here.

Mr. Northey. He swears he took a copy of it, and delivered it to the prisoner again. We desire it may be read.

Mr. Mallet. Is it a true copy?

Woodward. I cannot say, I examined it.

Mr. Northey. Did you write it from the bond?

Woodward. I did.

Mr. Northey. Do you believe it is a true copy?

Woodward. I believe it is. The reason why I did not examine it, was because it was to be a secret.

Mr. Mallet. Do you look upon yourself to be infallible?

Serj. Wright. Had you any direction from the prisoner to take a copy?

Woodward. I cannot say that.

L. C. J. Holt. Why did you write it out; for your direction to draw the new bond?

Woodward. I did write it out, because it is a special condition, more than is usual in bonds: for it is expressed, that there should be no prosecution against her by sir Robert Clayton, or his executors, either at law or in equity, for the 20,000*l.* or the interest, or to do any act to obstruct her in receiving the same.

L. C. J. Holt. When did you take a copy of it?

Woodward. At the same time, and before I returned it.

L. C. J. Holt. Did you make the new bond by this copy, or by the former bond?

Woodward. Very likely I might use both.

L. C. J. Holt. Did you keep them both?

Woodward. I did keep them both by me till I delivered the new bond.

Serj. Wright. Is the copy your own handwriting?—Woodward. Yes.

Mr. Montagu. What did you take it from?

Woodward. From the original.

Mr. Wright. And do you take that to be a true copy?

Woodward. I believe it is a true copy.

Mr. Hall. Did you read it over at that time?

Woodward. I did read it over.

Is. C. J. Holt. Did you write it?

Woodward. I did write it.

Mr. Mallet. And did you examine it afterward?

Woodward. No, I did not examine it; it was not to be taken notice of.

Mr. Hall. Can you say you read it carefully over at that time?

Mr. Cutts. It may not be the very same bond, if he did not examine it by the original, signed by sir Robert Clayton.

Mr. Northey. They may shew the bond.

Mr. Mallet. Did the prisoner bring the bond to you, of which this is the copy, and tell you, this was her bond?

Mr. Northey. We will prove it by her own confession.

Mr. Mallet. If it be not the same bond, she cannot be convicted.

Mr. Northey. No doubt of it.

Serj. Wright. Produce the copy; and, if your lordship please, it may be read.

L. C. J. Holt. Let it be read.

“Noverint Universi per presentes me Robertum Clayton, Militem et Decurionem, Anglice Kt. et Alderman de London, Ieneri et firmiter obligari Mary Butler alias Strickland, de South-street in Parochia de Edmonton, in Comitatu Middlesex, vidue, Quadraginta mille

“The condition of this obligation is such, that if the above bounden sir Robert Clayton, or his assigns do, and shall well and truly pay, or cause to be paid unto the above-named Mary Butler alias Strickland, her executors, administrators, or assigns, or any of them, yearly and every year, during the term of his natural life, the full and just sum of 1,200*l.* of lawful moneys of England, by four equal quarterly payments, being the just and legal interest, to grow due of and for the principal sum of 20,000*l.* hereinafter-mentioned, in manner and form following; that is to say, 300*l.* on the 14th of July next ensuing the date of these presents; 300*l.* on the 14th of October next coming; 300*l.* on the 14th of January, which shall be in the year of our Lord 1688, and 300*l.* on the 14th of April following; and so on every the said 14th day of the said months in every year, one next, and consequently coming after another, the like sum of 300*l.* during the time and term of the natural life of the said sir Robert Clayton: and also, if the heirs, executors, and administrators of the said sir Robert Clayton do, and shall, on or before the end and expiration of six months next after the death or decease of him the said sir Robert Clayton, not only well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said Mary Butler alias Strickland, her executors, administrators, or assigns, the full and just sum of 20,000*l.* of lawful money of England, above expressed; but also all such interest thereof, after the rate aforesaid, as shall be in arrear and unpaid at the death of the aforesaid sir Robert Clayton, and also all such as shall grow due to be paid for the same, for so long time of the said six months as the said sum of 20,000*l.* shall be unsatisfied and unpaid after the death or decease of the said sir Robert Clayton, without coven, fraud, or deceit; nor shall not commence any suit, either in law or equity, against the said Mary Butler alias Strickland, her heirs, executors, or administrators, for, concerning, or in respect of the said 20,000*l.* and interest, or any part thereof; and shall not do any act or thing to obstruct, molest, or hinder her, them, or any of them, from receiving, having, or enjoying the same; then this obligation to be void, and of none effect, or else to remain in full force. ROBERT CLAYTON.”

Sealed and delivered in the presence of us,

J. PENNINGTON, JOHN HEBDEN,
EDW. SPENCER, ELIZ. RIVERS.

Serj. Wright. Did the prisoner bring you the bond, of which this is a copy, as a true bond?—Woodward. Yes, my lord.

Serj. Wright. I ask you this, Had you a charge from her to keep this matter secret?

Woodward. Yes; and that I would write the bond with my own hand.

Serj. Wright. She giving you this charge, how came this matter to be known then?

Woodward. Mr. Nicholas Baker came to me from sir Robert Clayton, and asked me, if I did not know the prisoner, and particularly about a bond; and whether I did not make one for her. It was not in my memory at first, till further discourse occasioned me to remember it; and I told him, that I did do some business for her. He told me sir Robert Clayton had some information given him, that there was such a bond drawn by me; then I told him, I did remember there was such a bond brought to me, and that I had made a bond for Mrs. Butler, and had taken a copy of the first bond, which I had by me; and also of the second bond, in which I had left out a material word in the obligation, and was fain to write it over again, and had the first draught by me till about a month before that time, when meeting with it among my papers, I threw it into the fire in my closet; but this copy did remain by me.

Mr. Hall. You say this copy is all your own hand-writing?—Woodward. Yes, it is.

Mr. Hall. Was it sealed or cancelled?

Woodward. No; it was sealed, I am very positive.

Mr. Hall. Are you positive the seal was on it at that time?—Woodward. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Mallet. Did she tell you that bond was to be cancelled?

Woodward. She told me, she was to deliver up that bond to sir Robert Clayton; and that he would give her another instead of it.

Mr. Mallet. Was the bond then delivered up, or no?

Woodward. I cannot say she did.

Mr. Cutts. Did you never hear any bill in Chancery? to what end was this bond delivered to you? For what reason?

Woodward. I asked her why the bond was to be delivered up, and she told me, there was some uneasiness in the family, and my lady Clayton had got the air of it; and therefore, to satisfy her, there was a bill preferred against her in Chancery, and she was to put in her answer; and that he would give her another bond, and that was to be delivered up.

Mr. Northey. We have other witnesses to prove the forging of it. Call Mr. Baker. (Who appeared and was sworn.)

Serj. Wright. Mr. Baker, were you present when the prisoner Mrs. Butler was before my lord chief-justice concerning this bond? Look on that copy.

Baker. I was present at my lord chief-justice's chamber when the prisoner was brought before his lordship; and she did there acknowledge, that the bond, of which she was accused, she had ordered to be made.

Serj. Wright. Was that the bond in question?

Baker. Yes, she did confess she caused sir Robert Clayton's name to be set to it, and the witnesses names; and that it was done by one Mr. Lewkar, a scrivener in Bishopsgate-street.

Serj. Wright. She said so?

Baker. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hall. Did she confess it? Where was it?

Baker. At my lord chief-justice's chamber; she confessed it was her own act; she caused it to be made, and directed the scrivener to set sir Robert Clayton's name, and the witnesses names to it.

Mr. Mallet. Was there not at that time a discourse of a bond that she had on the late duke of Buckingham?

Baker. I cannot be positive in that; but this was the fact she was charged with; and she did confess that she caused it to be done, and that the persons as witnesses were innocent of it, and that she did direct Mr. Lewkar to set sir Robert Clayton's name to it.

Mr. Hall. How do you know this is the very same bond?

Baker. Mr. Woodward shewed me this very bond when I went to him from sir Robert Clayton, to know whether he was acquainted with the prisoner; who, after some discourse with him relating to this bond, very frankly and ingenuously told me the whole matter of fact, as he has done here.

Mr. Mallet. But we ask you about her confession; did you shew her that copy? Did she confess that?

L. C. J. Holt. What was the discourse of at that time?

Baker. It was about the bond of 40,000*l.* with which she was charged before your lordship to have counterfeited.

Mr. Northey. Did he give an account then of this bond?

Baker. Yes; Mr. Woodward produced this copy before my lord chief-justice, and she owned she had ordered Mr. Lewkar to make it, and to put sir Robert Clayton's name to it.

Serj. Wright. Now, my lord, we will shew you, that she is going on still, and that very lately she has owned it, and that she is going about to make the bond of 50,000*l.* a very good bond.

Mr. Mallet. When it is in question, you may then invalidate it.

Serj. Wright. Mr. Woodward has told you he did make the bond of 50,000*l.* but, I think, we have no need of it.

Mr. Hall. They have failed in the indictment, so that it cannot be supported by this bond; it should be laid especially, according to the condition of the bond to be paid; for it is a bond of 40,000*l.*, to be paid by his heirs after his death 20,000*l.* Now the bond, whereof they produce a copy, is of other things.

Mr. Northey. It is for the same.

Mr. Hall. It is a different thing.

L. C. J. Holt. Not at all.

Mr. Mallet. It is laid in the indictment, to be paid by sir R. Clayton: in the bond it is said, it is not to be paid till after his death.

Serj. Wright. It is laid in the indictment, that the bond was of the penalty of 40,000*l.* to be paid by sir R. Clayton, with condition thereto under-written, concerning, among other things, the payment of 20,000*l.* to the prisoner, after the death of sir Robert Clayton, by his executors.

L. C. J. Holt. Let your exceptions proceed from the indictment; it is to be paid after the death of sir Robert by his executors.

Serj. Wright. Have you any more to say for yourselves?

Mr. Hall. We have a great many witnesses here to prove her reputation. It is a strange thing any one should go to forge a bond on such an eminent person.

L. C. J. Holt. It is strange indeed; but the question is, Whether it be true?

Mr. Hall. Her confession is proved by Mr. Baker; but we have many witnesses as to her reputation.

Mr. Mallet. This bond is not in the indictment. The bond of 40,000*l.* is several years since: Now there are two bonds. Now that of 54,000*l.* is not in this indictment, and this of 40,000*l.* is several years since that it was shewn to him. It is strange he should be so very exact, and yet did not examine it. And probably he might mistake in the copy, and it may not be the very bond in the indictment. Now, as to Mr. Baker; it is true, we have a bond of 5,000*l.* from the duke of Buckingham, and we are suing sir R. Clayton for this money, and hope to have it, now after so many years. And sir R. Clayton did prefer a bill in Chancery against us, and we in answer did disclaim having any such bond. And now, when we are like to have a decree for this sum against the trustee of the duke of Buckingham's estate, he comes and would take off our credit in this matter. We did, in the year 1695, disclaim any such bond.

Mr. Northey. Then you do admit that she owned the bond.

[Then her witnesses were called.]

Mr. Mallet. Mr. Glover, do you know Mrs. Butler?—Glover. Yes.

Mr. Mallet. Give an account of what you know as to her reputation.

Glover. I have known her 15 or 16 years. All that I know of her is fair and clear.

L. C. J. Holt. Where do you live?

Glover. In Red-hon-street.

L. C. J. Holt. What profession are you of?

Glover. I belonged to Lincoln's-inn.

L. C. J. Holt. A gentleman of Lincoln's-inn.

Glover. I was brought up at the university, but have not resided there lately.

L. C. J. Holt. How do you live? Are you a house-keeper?

Glover. I live privately at present.

L. C. J. Holt. Who knows you?

Glover. I cannot tell who knows me here. I believe Mr. Northey does.

Mr. Northey. I do not intend to give any character of you. I do not use to give characters of my clients.

L. C. J. Holt. How long have you lived in Red-hon-street?

Glover. Ten or eleven years.

Mr. Mallet. How did she live?

Glover. I knew her live in Devonshire-square very reputably; I always thought so.

Serj. Wright. Had she any estate of her own?

Glover. I cannot say so certainly; it was thought so. She paid every body very punctually.

Mr. Hall. Acquaint my lord how long you have known her, and whether you think she would be guilty of such a forgery?

Glover. I have known her 14 or 15 years. I cannot believe she would.

Mr. Montagu. Have you heard the evidence?—Glover. Yes.

Mr. Montagu. What do you think of it then?—Glover. I know not what to think.

Mr. Montagu. Do you think she would confess herself guilty of a forgery, if she were not?

Glover. I cannot tell what to say to that. I suppose nobody would confess, if they were not guilty.

Serj. Wright. Do you know one Hebbon?

Glover. I know Hebbon.

Serj. Wright. He is a witness to the bond. Was he sir John Hebbon's son?

Glover. I can give no account of that; but he has had a very honourable character.

[Mrs. Rodum called, and appeared.]

Mr. Hall. Mrs. Rodum, do you know Mrs. Butler?—Rodum. Yes.

Mr. Hall. How long have you known her?

Rodum. Five or six years.

Mr. Hall. What do you know of her character?

Rodum. I am the widow of one of them that killed one another by the Temple. I never knew of any bond, nor never heard her claim to any such bond. She lived in good reputation. She was in my house when my husband was killed. She lived in my house about a year; I never heard she made any such pretension. She lived honestly and decently. She owed me upwards of 300*l.*

L. C. J. Holt. For what? How came she to owe you 300*l.*?

Rodum. I kept a shop in the Exchange, and my husband was a broker. She owed it me partly for goods out of my shop, and partly for goods out of Scotland. He was killed about half a year ago, and I have kept the shop still. About three or four months ago she left me, and I never heard of any bond.

Serj. Wright. Did you never hear of a bill in Chancery against her?—Rodum. No, Sir.

Mr. Mallet. Did you hear of any money that was due to her from the duke of Buckingham?

Rodum. I was told she was suing sir Robert Clayton for money that was to be paid her of the duke of Buckingham's account, and upon the credit of that I trusted her. [Shaw called.]

Mr. Hall. How long have you known Mrs. Butler?—Shaw. About sixteen years.

Mr. Hall. Do you think she would forge a bond?

Shaw. Indeed I cannot give an account of that.

Mr. Hall. How has she behaved herself?

Shaw. I never knew her guilty of any rudeness.

Serj. Wright. Put up more witnesses if you have any.

Mr. Hall. We have done.

L. C. J. Holt. Mrs. Butler, will you say any thing for yourself?

Mrs. Butler. I am altogether innocent in the matter, I never wronged sir Robert Clayton, nor any body else, in my life.

L. C. J. Holt. Gentlemen of the jury, this Mrs. Butler, alias Strickland, stands indicted for forging a bond in the name of sir Robert Clayton, in the penalty of 40,000*l.* the condition for the payment of 20,000*l.* among other things, within six months after the death of sir R. Clayton. And also, that she did publish this bond as the true bond of sir R. Clayton. You have heard what evidence has been given, to prove her guilty of this forgery, and the publication of it.

It seems, some time since, as is proved to you by Mr. Woodward, this gentlewoman came to him with this bond of 40,000*l.* And it was upon this account, as she said: To wit, sir R. Clayton having given her this bond, it had taken air, and was come to the lady Clayton's ear; which occasioned some difference between sir R. Clayton and his lady. She said; that this bond, by direction from sir Robert, was to be delivered up to him to be cancelled; and that sir R. Clayton had engaged to enter into a new bond in the penalty of 54,000*l.* for the payment of 26,000*l.* (there being at that time supposed an arrear of interest for 20,000*l.*) payable after sir Robert's death, and interest in the mean time. She delivered this bond to Mr. Woodward. He takes a copy of it, which is produced and read: And so, according to her direction, Mr. Woodward does draw another bond, with the penalty of 54,000*l.* and she then told Mr. Woodward sir Robert would seal this bond upon the delivery up of the bond of 40,000*l.* Mr. Woodward having considered, that it was an extraordinary sum for sir Robert to engage himself in, and he being a very considerable man, he advised her to have this new bond well attested; and to be sure to get witnesses of unquestionable credit to see it executed. And thereupon he offered himself to go with her to sir Robert, to be a witness to this new bond. No, says she, sir Robert is not willing that this should be known; you are not a proper person to be a witness to it; therefore, says she, I will get some other witnesses to attest it. Whereupon he gives her this first bond of 40,000*l.* which she brought to him for the payment of 20,000*l.* and gave her also the draught of the new bond. He says, this bond that she brought to him was attested by four witnesses. Sir Robert, it seems, upon her answer in Chancery, not imagining any thing of this, she having disclaimed in Chancery the having of any; some time after he had heard a report, as if she was setting up of a new bond, and that Mr. Woodward could give an account of it. Wherefore he sends Mr. Baker to Mr. Woodward, who gave him the same account that he has done here. Then sir Robert makes a complaint, and has her brought before me; and there was Mr. Woodward with this copy. And this was objected to her, as if she had forged this bond. And it seems, when she was there under examination, and is proved to you by Mr. Baker, she did plainly confess, that she had forged this bond of 40,000*l.* and that she had procured one Lewkar to do it for her, who set sir Robert's name to it; and said, that the witnesses, whose names were set to it, were innocent, and knew nothing of the matter.

Now what is, said for her on the other side? They bring some persons for her, that say they have known her. One, that says he belonged to Lincoln's-inn, and had been acquainted with her fourteen or fifteen years, and did look upon her as a civil woman; and, for his part, he does not believe she would be guilty of such a forgery. Another, who is a woman, says she has known her some time, and she says, she has trusted her much, and did never hear her say any thing of this bond, but she behaved herself civilly, and she took her to be a very sober person. Another witness says, she looked on her to be a very honest person. This is the sum of the evidence.

There is a very strong evidence to induce you to believe that she did forge the bond. Such a bond she had, that is plain. She does give no account what is become of it; and she does not shew any manner of pretence of having so much money from sir R. Clayton due to her; she does not make it appear, why sir Robert should give her a bond upon any account. Now, for any to say that they knew her, and they do not believe she would forge a bond; that is no evidence; nobody ought to believe all of Mrs. Butler, or any one else, unless it be made to appear. But the question is not, what they do believe; but whether the matter be proved to you to your satisfaction that she has forged this bond? And if you are satisfied that she did forge it, you ought to find her guilty; and if you do not believe the evidence to be satisfactory, you ought to acquit her.

[Then the Jury withdrew, and being returned, gave their verdict as follows:]

Cl. of Arr. Are you agreed of your verdict?
Jury, Yea.

Cl. of Arr. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Foreman.

Cl. of Arr. Bring Mary Butler to the bar. How say ye? Is the prisoner at the bar guilty of the forgery whereof she stands indicted, or not guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.

The Judgment which the court pronounced against her was, That she should pay a fine of 500*l.* to the king, and continue in prison till she paid it.

407. Proceedings in Parliament against THOMAS Duke of LEEDS, on an Impeachment of High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 7 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1695—1701.*

April 27, 1695.

THE House of Commons having read a Report from a Joint Committee of both Houses relating to the distribution of Money by the East India Company, the following Debate arose:†

[B] stood up and said, Mr. Speaker, I conceive there is a necessity to search this matter to the bottom. The House has a thread in their hands, they ought to provide laws for the future to prevent the members of this House taking money. All imaginable endeavours have been used to stifle all discoveries. 10,000*l.* has been pretended to be given to the king. 50,000*l.* offered to buy an act of parliament, or gain their charter. The facts prove themselves, and Mr. Bates appears an unfortunate person, whom the care of his friend, the duke of Leeds, and the sense of his oath, have caused to make such contradictions. I move that the House would put the matter in such a method as becomes their justice, and as the shortness of their time will allow.

[D] Mr. Speaker, I do fully agree with the worthy person near me, that there never were greater and more general instances of corruption, and necessity of speedy remedy. That it is very fit this House should let the world see that they are in earnest. I ask leave to put you in mind, what practice and arts have been used to stifle and stop your discovery, so that what you have is, as it were, by the utmost force and constraint. You cannot wonder at it, when you now find so great a man at the bottom; but there is no person in a post so high that this House cannot reach, no man's practice or art so deep that this House cannot discover. Here have been all imaginary endeavours used to obstruct this enquiry. First, his majesty's name was made use of at the committee, with hopes perhaps that that might

This is the third time that Articles of Impeachment had been exhibited in the House of Lords, against him. The first was in 1675, upon which the House resolved, "That there was not sufficient matter contained in them to impeach the Lord Treasurer;" the second was in 1678, see vol. 11, p. 599.

stop any farther enquiry; and if it were made use of there, you may reasonably expect it was made use of elsewhere: but that appeared to be so far from being a matter of reflection on the king, that sir Josiah Child often complained of it as a rudeness to his majesty, that what other kings had yearly as a present, they had not offered to his majesty in three years: it was indeed, if not a matter of right, a matter of custom.—Then a noble lord, who may be named for his honour upon this occasion, the earl of Portland, he, when the great sum of 50,000*l.* was pressed upon him, did absolutely refuse it, and told them he would for ever be their enemy and opposer if they offered any such thing to him. I having thus mentioned the innocent, must say somewhat of the guilty. A stop having been put, the duke of Leeds must be applied to; certainly there never was a more notorious bribery, and that in a person whom we might have expected to have been free from such a crime, whether if you respect the greatness of his place, or of his former obligation. It is fit to speak plainly on such occasions, the House ought to endeavour to remove such a person from the king's council and presence. What security can the nation have, when we are bought and sold to one another? We have seen our desigus deflected, our attempts betrayed, and what wonder is it? Can any man think it more strange that our counsels should be sold abroad, than that charters should be sold at home? Certainly a man may reasonably believe, that he who will sell the subjects will sell the kingdom if he can have a sufficient bribe. What prince can be safe in such counsels which are given for private advantage; several proposals for remedy may be here offered. One, that this house should address his Majesty to remove the duke of Leeds; but, with submission, an address is too mean, too low a thing for the House to do at this time, and upon such an occasion: I therefore move we may lodge an impeachment. "That Thomas duke of Leeds, Lord President of his majesty's council, be impeached by this House." Or thus, "That Thomas duke of Leeds be impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemeanors; and particularly of Corruption in taking a bribe of 5,000 guineas to obtain a charter and regulation for the East India Company."

[E] says, I wonder the gentleman who spoke last should say that which I hope he did not believe, That that lord should have sold our counsels to France.

[D] rose again and said, It is with some uneasiness I stand up, but that gentleman forces me to it, for I do not take pleasure to raise in a dunghill. I was far from saying any such thing, but argued only from possibility; that it was as reasonable to believe one as the other. That when honour and justice were not the rule of mens actions, there was nothing incredible that might be for their advantage.

[F] seconds and agrees in the motion for an impeachment.

[G] says, That God alone who can produce light out of darkness, can fully discover the dark practices in this affair. That such actions as these are a blemish, if not a scandal to the Revolution itself; I agree in the motion for an impeachment.

[I] Demanded, by what law it is a crime to take money at court?

[K] answered, if there be not a law, it is time there should be a law to prevent it.

[L] says, The law of God is against him, and broke by him. He took an oath as a privy-counsellor. Justice is not to be sold by the common law. But there are parliaments to punish such crimes, and it is hoped there will be still.

[M] says, it seems doubtful whether there be matter in this Report for an impeachment; therefore before the House goes to an impeachment, they ought to put the question upon the Report, and see whether it be a crime.

[N] objects, there is no law, so no transgression.

Resolved, "That there does appear to this House, upon the Report from the Committee of both Houses appointed to examine the persons mentioned in the Report of sir Thomas Cook's account, That there is sufficient matter to impeach Thomas duke of Leeds, president of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, of high crimes and misdemeanors."

Resolved, "That Thomas duke of Leeds, &c. be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors."

Ordered, "That Mr. Comptroller do go up to the Lords, and, at their bar, in the name of the House of Commons, and all the Commons of England, impeach Thomas duke of Leeds of high Crimes and Misdemeanors; and acquaint them, That this House will in due time exhibit particular Articles against him, and make good the same."

THE DUKE'S SPEECH IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

On the reading of the Report from the Lords' Committee, his grace expressed himself in this manner, viz.

"That as he had formerly protested himself to be free in this matter; so he still denied, upon his faith and honour, that he was guilty of any such corruptions as were suggested against him, and that if the whole truth were laid open, it would tend to his honour and advantage. That he would be very free in telling their lordships now before hand, all that passed, in which he was any ways concerned. And thereupon declared, that Mr. Bates introduced sir Basil Firebrace to him, and that he had had conferences with sir Basil upon the subject of the East-India Company, which Firebrace was concerned for. That some time after, Mr. Bates came and informed him that he was to have a sum of money of sir Basil; and desired his lordship to lend him one of his servants, Mr. Bates keeping but a footman, to receive the money, and so he lent him Mr. Robart. That his lordship knew nothing of the sum; but afterwards Mr. Bates came to him, and told him, he had received 5,000 guineas, which he offered to him, telling his lordship that he had been very obliging and kind to him; and that, in acknowledgment of the many favours he had received from his lordship's hands, he humbly desired him to accept of them: which he refusing, Mr. Bates pressed him earnestly to take one half or a quarter; which he still refused, declaring he would not touch a penny of them; and told him, since he had taken them, he thought there was no need of returning them, they were his own, and wished him good luck with them, as I remember, said his lordship, I did once to Mr. Harry Saville, for whom I had a great respect; which reminds me of a story I must needs tell your lordships upon this occasion. He then related the story: That when he was treasurer, the Excise being to be farmed, for which many put in, the bidders for it, who were to give in their proposals sealed up, having applied to Mr. Saville for his interest at court, he came to his lordship and desired that he would tell the gentlemen that put in, who were several, that Mr. Saville had spoke for them: what, said I, (proceeded the duke) would you have me tell all of them so, when but one is to have it? No matter for that, said Mr. Saville, for whoever has it will think I have done him this service; and I am stre of a good present, without more ado: so, my lords, when the men came, I told them one after another, Sir, you are very much obliged to Mr. Saville; Sir, Mr. Saville has been very much your friend. A little after, when the thing was settled, Mr. Saville came and thanked me for what I had done: and told me he had got his present that he had expected; which I told him I was glad of, and wished him good luck with it, as I now did to Mr. Bates. And thus I was then a shadow to Mr. Saville, as I was now to Mr. Bates."

THE DUKE'S SPEECH IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Duke had proceeded thus far in his Speech when he received private intimation, that the Commons were proceeding to impeach him: upon which he broke off somewhat abruptly; and immediately quitting the House of Peers, presented himself at the door of the other House; and by the means of one of the members, caused the House to be informed, that he desired to be heard; which being complied with, he was admitted, with the usual compliments of a chair, and leave to be covered; after accepting of which, he rose, and putting off his hat, expressed himself to the following effect:

"Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House. In the first place, I thank you heartily for this favour of hearing me. I had attended sooner, if I had had the least intimation what the House was upon. I wish the dispatch thereof had not been so quick. The occasion of my coming is from the two Votes, upon the Report from the Committee of both Houses; I did all I could to be informed of the particulars, but could not, nor have I any notes. I was earnest therein, finding myself concerned, and hearing of a report, a monstrous long report, to the end that I might not be under the displeasure of either or both Houses; it is a bold truth, but it is a truth: this House had not been sitting but for me. I was formerly pursued by this House in two points, for being for the French interest and for popery; I had then, if I might have been heard, justified myself, as I hope I have since done, and shall by all the actions of my life. One Firebrace was introduced to me by the means of Mr. Bates, whom I have long known, and if I am not much deceived in him, I cannot believe that gentleman would have transacted such a matter if put upon it. The evidence is but hearsay, and I hope you will not condemn on hearsay. I would not take up your time by entering into particulars; but there is a money-part, as well as a treaty-part; and as to the money-part, much of it is false; what is true, I have made no secret. I can, and do say, that neither directly nor indirectly, upon my faith and honour, have I ever touched one penny of the money. I observe a great deal of pains has been taken to hook and draw men in this matter by a side-wind, and Firebrace thinks his merit will deserve 10,000 and 30,000*l*. This 5,000 guineas was no part of the 40,000*l*. The committee called in and examined several witnesses; but Firebrace, after his first hearing, desired to be called in again himself, contrary to all rules, which shews at least that he is a very willing witness. I have a thread which I hope to spin finer, and make it appear that this was a design laid against me, long before the naming of this committee; that warning was given me some time since, that this matter would be proved against me, and that Firebrace had been told, he should be excused if he would charge the duke: I ask no favour but your favourable justice. It will be a most unfortunate thing in point of time, to be under the displeasure of this House, or of the nation. I pray that no severe sense be put on what will bear a candid one, and that if it may be, the House would re-consider what is done, or at least preserve me from cruelty; and not let me lie on the rack and be blasted, until the parliament shall sit again. If you will proceed, I hope it will be speedily, for I had rather want council, want time, want any thing, than be under yours or the nation's displeasure. I thank you again for this favour, and pray if you will not re-consider, that this matter may be brought to a determination, and that I may have at least your speedy justice."

This Speech being ended, and the duke withdrawn, Mr. Comptroller, attended by many members, went up to the House of Lords with the Impeachment; and the committee who were joined with the Lords, were ordered to prepare the Articles against the Lord President.

Debate thereon.

The Commons taking the duke's Speech into consideration, a worthy member said, [D] said, By this noble lord's Speech, the point is now, whether the House will arraign the committee of both Houses, or go on with their Impeachment. This noble lord, when he came to the matter, would not enter into particulars, but passed it over with excuse of wanting time. He makes no excuse as to the facts: his argument of a contrivance was, that the 5,000 guineas charged on him, was no part of the 40,000*l*. Firebrace was to account for. But this is an aggravation of the crime; for sir Thomas Cooke had a double account, one with, and one without the 5,000 guineas; and this is an indication, that if there was a contrivance, it was not by the committee, but with sir Tho. Cooke, to trifle the enquiry, and conceal the corruption. The speedy justice of the House is to be wished and desired. If there is such a contrivance, such a thread as is mentioned by this noble lord, it is not to be doubted but the House where he is impeached will clear him.

[T] moved, That a committee might be appointed to withdraw, to consider what was to be done, in order to gratify that lord by 'speedy justice.' His friend Mr. Bates's tricking and contradicting himself, is more than the evidence of Firebrace. Who was his friend? Who was his servant? Those were questions not to be asked. M. Robart was a servant of my lord president's and is fled. Mr. Bates said, he kept the money in his house? What was become of it? Sometimes he had spent it, sometimes it was in his closet. He did own the money was not in his house on Sunday, but on Tuesday morning, M. Robart brought it to him; but he would never declare from whence he brought it.

In the middle of these debates, a message was sent from the Lords, to acquaint the Commons, that it was the opinion of their lordships, that the discovery made by sir Thomas Cooke was not satisfactory, nor so full as to entitle him to the benefit of the act to indemnify him, and that their lordships desired the concurrence of the Commons. They thereupon passed a vote, as the Lords had done, and sent it up by the lord Coningsby.

April 29. The Lords acquainted the Commons that they had passed a bill entitled, 'An Act for imprisoning sir Thomas Cooke, sir Basil Firebrace, Charles Bates, esq. and James Craggs, and for restraining them from alienating their estates,' to which they desired the concurrence of the Commons.

April 29. Mr. Comptroller Wharton and others, brought up the Articles of Impeachment against Thomas duke of Leeds, lord president; which are as follow:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, exhibited by the knights, citizens, and burgesses in parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, against THOMAS duke of LEEDS, President of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, for high crimes and misdemeanours.

"1. That certain merchants trading to the East-Indies, having either forfeited their charter, or being under an apprehension that they had forfeited the same, and having made their humble applications to their majesties in council for obtaining a charter of confirmation; the said duke of Leeds, being then president of their majesties most honourable privy council, and sworn to give their majesties true and faithful advice, did, contrary to his oath, office and duty to their majesties, and in breach of the great trust reposed in him, by himself, his agents or servants, corruptly and illegally treat, contract and agree, with the said merchants or their agents, for 5,500 guineas to procure the said charter of confirmation, and also a charter of regulations, or to use his endeavours to obtain the same.

"2. That in pursuance of such corrupt contract and agreement, the said duke of Leeds did, by himself, his agents or servants, receive or accept, from the said merchants or their agents, certain notes or securities, whereby he or they were empowered to receive the said 5,500 guineas upon the passing of the said charters.

"3. That, soon after the passing of the said charter of confirmation, the sum of 2,500, part of the said 5,500; and soon after the passing of the said charter of regulations, the further sum of 3,000 guineas, other part of the said 5,500 guineas: were, pursuant to the said corrupt contract and agreement, actually received by the said duke of Leeds, or by his agents or servants with his privity and consent.

"And the said knights, citizens and burgesses, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said Thomas duke of Leeds, and also of replying to the answer that the said Thomas duke of Leeds shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises, or any other impeachments or accusations that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall (according to the course of parliaments) require; do pray, that the said Thomas duke of Leeds be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanours, and receive such punishments as the same shall deserve; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice."

THE DUKE'S SPEECH THEREUPON.

The Articles being read, the duke of Leeds, repeating several things to the same effect as formerly, said, "That Mr. Bates desired that he would allow him to bring sir Basil Firebrace to him; and that he bid Mr. Bates take care of sir Basil, for he took him to be a very ill man; but Mr. Bates said, he knew him very well: so after much intreaty his lordship permitted Mr. Bates to bring him. That Mr. Bates and his lordship had had a long acquaintance and friendship, and he did in this manner was only to befriend him. His lordship added, "That this story which was now fallen upon him, was some time a gathering: and it was promoted by a faction, and a party who had only a pique against him; and the king's business had been delayed on purpose. That he had an original letter which gave him an account of this some time before it broke out; and it appeared only levelled against him, because none else were prosecuted; and there appeared a joy they could catch at this; for then they stopped; and sir Basil was treated with to discover only this part, and so he should be excused from any further discovery." His lordship concluded, praying a copy of the Articles of his Impeachment, and of the Report made by the Committee to the House, which was readily granted.

THE DUKE'S ANSWER TO THE ARTICLES.

April 30. The Lords sent a Message to acquaint the Commons, That the duke of Leeds having this day put in his Answer to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him, their lordships have sent a copy thereof to them.

The Answer was received and read, and is as follows: "This Defendant, saying to himself all advantages of exceptions to the said Articles, humbly saith, That he is not guilty of all or any the matters by the said Articles charged in manner and form as the same are by the said Articles charged against him. LEEDS."

Upon the duke's putting in the Answer, he again declared, before God, and upon his honour and conscience, that he was not guilty, and had great wrong done him in this accusation.

May 1. The Lords sent a Message to the Commons to acquaint them, That they think themselves obliged in justice to put the House in mind of the Impeachment against the duke of Leeds, to which the Duke's Answer having been transmitted to them, the Lords desire to be acquainted when they can be ready to make good the Articles of Impeachment, to the end a certain day may be appointed by the Lords for that purpose.

Upon this, the Commons ordered, "That the Answer of the duke of Leeds, to the Articles of Impeachment against him, be referred to the consideration of the Committee, to whom it was referred to draw the said Articles of Impeachment: and that they do consider what is to be done thereupon, according to the course of parliaments; and report the same to the House."

May 2. The duke complained in the House of Lords of the delay of the House of Commons, in not replying to his Answer, alledging, that the Impeachment was only to load him with disgrace, and that they never intended to try him. And added, "That the party used great partiality towards him, and did not intend to enquire after others; that they shewed a mark of their partiality and spleen, in their Amendment to the Bill for imprisoning sir Thomas Cooke, sir Basil Firebrace and the others; sir Basil was to be bailed because he was the witness against his lordship."

This day the Commons resolved, "That the offer of any money, or other advantage, to any member of parliament, for the promoting of any matter whatsoever, depending, or to be transacted, in parliament, is a high crime and misdemeanor, and tends to the subversion of the English constitution."

May 3. A motion being made in the House of Lords, to read the bill for granting to the king a duty upon Glass, &c. the duke of Leeds rose up and told the Lords, "That it grieved him, that he, who was as much as any man for the dispatch of the Money-bills, and never opposed any, should now do it; but he hoped the Lords would consider his case, not only as his, but the case of any of their lordships; for it was in the power of a finker to accuse at the end of a session, and one might lie under it without remedy: and since that they, by mismanagement, had delayed this Money-bill for six weeks, it would not be of mighty ill consequence if it should lie a day or two longer. His lordship pressed very earnestly, that if the House of Commons did not reply, the Impeachment might be discharged; for, if it were not, he might lie under the reproach thereof all his life. He believed the Commons would do nothing in it; for though they had appointed a Committee to meet, they met but once, and that for form, and never met more, nor would do any thing in it."

The same day the Commons, at a conference, delivered a written Paper to the Lords, signifying, "That the Commons will make good the charge against the duke of Leeds, in manner and form as in the Articles mentioned, and that the Committee who were appointed to draw the said Articles, have been daily employed in looking into evidence against the duke; and that in the preparation of the evidence they meet with an obstruction, that Monsieur Robart, who appeared by the depositions before the Committee of both Houses to be a material witness, is withdrawn since the Impeachment was carried up; which has been the reason the Commons have not yet acquainted your lordships when they can be ready to make good the said Impeachment, the Commons being desirous that justice be done without any manner of delay."

The Paper being brought into the Lords House, and read, it was moved and agreed, without any debate, or any opposition made by the duke of Leeds, that an Address should be made to the king, to issue a Proclamation for stopping the ports and seizing M. Robart. The duke, in assistance to the House, told them, that it was requisite to insert the person's Christian name, and said his name was John, his surname being Robart.

The Duke of Leeds then rose up, and blamed the House of Commons, for doing an unheard-of, an unprecedented thing, to charge a man with crimes, and to say they were ready to make it good, before they had all the evidences; and now they should say they wanted a material witness, and lay it upon him to produce this witness; as if a person were obliged more to produce evidence to accuse him, than to answer such questions by which he accuses himself. His lordship then proceeded to acquaint the House, that in truth, he had sent M. Robart to see his daughter Lempster, who went into the country big with child; and ordered him to call at Mins to see his daughter Plimouth, it being in his way to his daughter Lempster's, where the messenger of the House of Commons might have known he was gone if he had asked. That his lordship, that there might be no mistake, sent a messenger on purpose for Robart. That his footman waked him about two of the clock on Sunday morning, (for which he was very angry) to let him know Robart was come, and was in the house, which was as soon as he could possibly return: That his lordship told the footman he would go to sleep, and would speak with Robart in the morning, when he usually called him; but when his lordship asked for him in the morning, the footman said he was gone; and, upon enquiry, he found Robart did not lie nor pull off his boots in his chamber: That the footman said, he asked whether the news was true, that this lord was impeached, and Mr. Bates was in prison; which the footman owned to be true; and his lordship believes that frightened Robart. That his chaplain shewed him a letter from Robart, with a desire to acquaint his lord, that he designed for his own country, Switzerland, through Holland; from whence he would write his lord a true account of all the matter of the 5,500 guineas to Mr. Bates. That his lordship knew, by the manner of his writing, by the man, and by a particular knowledge he had of him and of the thing, that he would not be seen here again in haste. "So that, my lords, (said his grace) if this man be insisted upon as a material evidence, and that my trial is to be delayed till this person is forthcoming, when am I to be tried? I humbly move your lordships, that you will come to some resolution, that if this matter be not immediately proceeded upon, so that I may be tried before the ending of this session, that the impeachment shall fall."

Upon which some few Lords cried, 'Well moved*.'

However, the lords read and passed the bill that same day, for the duty upon glass, &c. and his majesty came to the house and gave the royal assent to several bills, and among the rest to the Bill for imprisoning sir Thomas Cooke, sir Basil Firebrace, Bates and Craggs; and also to a bill entitled, 'An act for the king's most gracious and free pardon,' but with this

* "Surely that out-cry of theirs was rather a mark of scorn than approbation: for though the duke, by sending away his servant, had deprived his adversaries of that legal proof which was necessary to conviction, enough had appeared to prove him guilty in the opinion of the whole world: and if any thing could be added to the reproach which he had brought on his character, on the high office he possessed, and the government he served, it was the solemn protestation of innocence he had set out with, and the contumacious demand of a speedy trial, which he knew neither could or would take place." Ralph.

exception; amongst others; 'Except also all persons who have been or shall be impeached in parliament during this session.*'

And then his majesty commanded the lord keeper to prorogue the parliament to the 18th of June, and it was prorogued accordingly.

On the 24th of June 1701 (two complete parliaments having intervened) the House of Lords, taking notice "That the Commons having impeached Thomas duke of Leeds, of high crimes and misdemeanors on the 27th of April, 1695; and on the 29th of April exhibited articles against him, to which he had answered; but the Commons not prosecuting, order, 'That the said Impeachment, and the Articles exhibited against him, be dismissed.'"

† "Burnet, who, speaking of the act of grace, which passed at the close of the session, takes care to remember, it contained an 'Exception as to Corruption,' acknowledged the whole discovery was let fall: and, continues he, 'it was believed too many of all sides were concerned in it; for, by a common consent, it was never revived.'" Ralph.

Patrick Kinnymount of that ilk.

OF this date, there appears on record a long interlocutor on the relevancy of various charges contained in a previous indictment against Kinnymount, also the following minute:

The Lords at my lord advocate's desyre, and in respect of the absence of severall materiall witnesses, who his lordship affirmes, are under

The said Patrick Kinnymount, of that ilk, was also indyted and accused, at the instance of his ma'ties advocat mentioned for the crymes of blasphemy and adultery in manner mentioned in the indytement, whereof the tenor follows:

You are indyted and accused at the instance of sir James Stewart his ma'ties advocat for his highnes interest in the matter under written, viz. That where by the law of God, and the layes of this and all other weell governed Realmes, the crymes of blasphemie and of wicked irreligion against God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, and the cryme of adultery are most horrible and detestable crymes to be punished with all severity; lykeas by the act of parliament Charles second, parliament first, act twenty first,* entituled Act against the Cryme

* The Act referred to is as follows:

Act against the crime of Blasphemy.

"Our sovereign lord, and the estates of parliament considering that hitherto there hath

* After confirming the former Act, this Act proceeds:

"And further, his majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, statutes and ordains, That whoever hereafter shall, in their writing or discourse, deny, impugn, or quarrel, argue or reason against the Being of God, or any of the persons of the blessed Trinity, or the authority of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, or the providence of God, in the government of the world; shall, for the first fault, be punished with imprisonment, ay and while they give publick satisfaction in sackcloth, to the congregation, within which the scandal was committed. And for the second fault, the delinquent shall be fined in ay year's valued rent of his real estate, and the twentieth part of his personal estate (the equal half of which fines are to be applied to the use of the poor of the parish, within which the crime shall happen to be committed, and the other half to the party informer) besides his being imprisoned, ay and while he make again satisfaction ut supra. And for the third fault, he shall be punished by death, as an obstinate blasphemor."

goods; and farther by the parliament nyth, chap. seventy fourth, queen Mary, open and manifest adulterers are punishable by death, reserving the former lawes against other adulterers; and by the act parliament James sixth, cap. an hundred and fyth, It is declared to be nottour and manifest adultery, where bairnes are procreat or the adulterers keep company and bed together, and bed together nottoriously, or when suspect and duely admonished, they refuse to satisfie the kirk and are therfor excommunicate: Nevertheless, that yow the said Patrick Kinnymount, shakeing off all fear of God, and due reverence to the great and dreadfull name of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, and all regard to his majestie's laws and authority, have presumed to blaspheme, and otherwayes to vent your wicked irreligione against the holy and blessed name of God and our Lord Jesus Christ. In soe far as frequently, or at least on ane or other of the dayes of the moneths of the years 1696 and 1697, you have presumed to vent your wicked passion and irreligion, by calling a man bongar of God, and scyme of Christ; lykeas you also blasphemously affirmed that Christ was a bastard, and farther did threaten James Dewar, in Lochgellie, in Fyfe, with cutting out of his ears unles he would deny Christ his Saviour: And you have alsoe wickedly said, and which is horrible to be againe repeated, if any man had God on the one hand and Christ on the other, yow could stow the luggs out of his head, in despyte of them both, and yow would see who would say it was ill done. And farther on one or other and on severall of the dayes and nights of the moneths and years forsaid, yow being a married maif to — Wallace, your spouse, did commit nottour and manifest adultery, at least adultery with Jannet Nisbet, then your servant maid, in soe much that you did keep company and bed with her openly and nottoriously, for dayes, weeks and moneths, before your servants and others in your house, goeing to bed with her as avouedly as if she had been your wyffe, and have been frequently seen throwe off your cloathes with her and goe to bed together in the same chamber, and that so affrontedly, that you have had a servant lying in another bed, besyde yow and your adulteresse in the same roume, at least yow have committed adultery by bedding and lying with the said Jannet as with your wyffe, by all which, it is manifest, that yow are guilty airt and part of the forsaid crymes of blasphemy, irreligione, and adultery, which being found by the knowledge of ane inquest, yee ought to be punished with the paines of death and confiscation of moveables, or otherwayes as the law ordaines, to the terror and example of others to committ the lyke in tyme comeing.

Sic Subscribitur,

JA. STEWART.

The lords also continue the dyet against the said Patrick Kinnymount for the said crymes of blasphemy and adultery till the first Mun-day of December next, and the indytment being debated viva voce, The lords ordained both parties to interchange their debates, in wrytting, betwixt and the said day.

INFORMATIONE for his Majesties Advocat, against Patrick Kinnymount, of that ilk.

Patrick Kinnymount of that ilk having from his youth been louse, debauched and profligate, as is nottoure, and being accused in another lybell against him of severall extravagant and wicked deeds of violence, hath added to all his wickedness the crymes of horrid blasphemy, and of nottoure, at least of manifest simple adultery, as is particularly represented in the lybell raised theranent.

As to the relevancy of which lybell, in soe far as concerns the blasphemie, nothing is or can be objected, the words lybelled being manifest railleing against God and the Lord Jesus our Saviour, which by the act of parliament is justly made capital, without the necessity of adding the quality of the pannalls obstinately continewing therein, which is only a qualificatione requyred by the act of parliament, as to the denying of God or of the persones of the blessed Trinity, which may proceed from wretched error. Whereas, railleing being a cryme of pure and devilish malice, if once committed, renders the committer absolutely guilty; but the only thing alleadged against this lybell, was that the condescendence upon the tyme, viz. on one or other of the dayes of the moneths of the yeares 1696, and 1697 years, was too laxt; and that the place was not at all marked; as to which it was answered, that the blasphemie hath been indegd habituall to the pannall, soe that it is lybelled as such, or at least, or one or other of the said dayes.

2. That in crymes of this nature, neither tyme or place are soe materiall and commisable at any tyme or any where, and are not lyke other crymes, as of manslaughter, mutilatione, or the lyke, which leave visible effects, and therefore may have both tyme and place more easily marked.

3. But 3rdly, The witnesses will condescend, and upon the condescendence if the pannall be admitted to give in his exception of alibi or the lyke, it may then be considered; and this in effect is sufficient in lybelling any cryme, wherein the day or place make not a speciall aggravatione.

4. But 4thly, His majestie's advocat is content if need be, that the lybell be restricted to the four or five last moneths of the year 1696, and the two or three first moneths of the year 1697. Secundo, it was objected that the adultery lybelled, had not all the qualifications requisite by act of parliament to inferr nottoure adultery, and therefore noe pain of death. To which it was answered, that the qualificationes in the act of parliament are alternative, viz. either bairnes procreat or nottoure converse at bed and board, or willfull converse after prohibitione be the church, which qualificationes are requyred disjunctively and not joynly, and are also soe lybelled: lykeas the lybell subsumes upon the second member, viz. nottoure converse at bed and board, secundo, the lybell doeth charge not only nottoure adultery, but in case nottoure adultery should not be found, then simple adultery, which is at least relevant for the pains of law.

Defences for Patrick Kinnymount of that Ilk.

Against the lybell raised and insisted on against him by his majestie's advocat, in answer to the informatione given in by his lo'p relative thereto.

Severall malicious persones having conceived a deadlie prejudice against Kinnymount, and finding no imaginable way to vent their malice, they did at last fall into this damnable contrivance, viz. to informe his majestie's advocat, that the said Patrick Kinnymount was guiltie of, and had committed severall atrocious crymes, whercof some were capital, and did soe clamour upon and importune his majestie's advocat, that at last they did impetrate from his lordship ane warrant summarly to apprehend and imprison him, and Kinnymount being imprisoned, he did, after severall bills presented to the lords of privy councill, at last obtaine a delyverance, ordaineing my lord advocat to give him ane indytment, and insist against him before your lo'p's of justiciary; and Kinnymount being accordingly indyted, and having compeared and proponed his legall defences against the said indytment, the same as to the relevancy is fully determined by your lo'p's interloquitor, and Kinnymount doeth with all due submissione acquiesce, in your lo'p's justice therein.

During this dependance, Kinnymount's malicious enemies being fully convinced, and finding that the crymes lybelled in that first indytment were soe false and groundless, that it was impossible that any probatione could be had theranent, soe boundless and insatiable was their malice, that during this dependance, they, by their importunity, did prevail with my lord advocat to give Kinnymount another, additionall indytment for alledged blasphemy and adultery; and the same being debated before your lo'p's viva voce in open court, my lord advocat has given in ane information against Kinnymount, wherein by way of preface his lo'p accuses Kinnymount as guiltie of gross debauchie and profligatness, and of extravagant wickedness, and deeds of violence from his youth; but Kinnymount knoweing that this proceeds only from my lord advocate's malicious informers more than from himselfe, and that your lo'ps are soe just, that neither clamour nor calumny can have the least influence upon your impartiall justice, doeth therefore forbear to make any furdre answer than to deny the same as absolutely false in every poynt.

My lord advocat having therafter insisted upon the horrid expressions lybelled and alledged, that the same was simply capital, without the necessity of adding, that the pannall did obstinately continue therein.

It was answered for the pannall, that he did not only deny the said expressions lybelled, but utterly from his very soul and heart did deteste and abhorre the same, nor can the pannall be persuaded that ever any such expressions did escape him; and ingeniously declares, that from his very heart he abhorrs to hear such expressions laid to the charge of any Christian; and if he were conscious to himselfe of any such guilt (as truly he is not) he would rather throw himselfe upon his majestie's mercy, than offer to propound any defence ther against, but being conscious to himselfe of no such guilt, and only apprehensive of detest and abhorrence, his defence against the said indytmēt is shortly this, viz.

That the said indytmēt as to the blasphemy lybelled, is at all relevant, in respect it does not condescend upon the place where the expressions lybelled are alledged to have been uttered and spoken by the pannall, and all criminal lawyers that ever wrote doe unanimously agree in this, that in all criminal lybells Locus delicti ought necessarily to be lybelled; because by and attour the common law saith, Non debet facti in generalibus, no criminal lybell ought to be sustained in capital crimes, which is contrived of purpose to exclude the pannall from the benefite of any defence competent and allowed to him by law, such as is proper to the pannall himselfe, or alibi to one or more of the witnesses adduced against the pannall.

2. As this lybell doth not bear the locum delicti, so neither doth it condescend upon any definite tyme, but alienarly beares the expressions lybelled to have been spoken by the pannall upon one or other of the dayes of one or other of the moneths of one or other of the years sixteen hundred and nyntie six and seven, which is in such generall termes, that it is easily conceived how my lord advocat can conclude or pretend that such a generall lybell as to the tyme either can or ought to be sustained before any court of the kingdome, far less before any court where none but persons well known in criminal lawes doe sit.

And whereas my lord advocat in his information declares that he opposes the lybell, bearing that the pannall used the said expressions scilicet, at least upon one or other of the dayes of the said two years: Secundo, that he is content to restrict his lybell to one or other of the dayes of the four last moneths of the year sixteen hundred and nyntie six, and that the dayes of the year sixteen hundred and nyntie seven, and Tertio, his lo^ps prayer is, that there is no necessity of condescending upon the place in the tryall of blasphemy as in other crimes of mutilation or manslaughter, which leave visible effects, and therefore may have tyme and place more easily marked: Quarto, tyme and place make no difference as to the crime of blasphemy, and the witnesses will condescend upon both when they depone.

To all which it was replied for the pannall, That the former defences stood unquestionably relevant notwithstanding of the said answers, and as to which the common law and opinions of all lawyers is repeated and opposed, and as all pursuers in criminal lybells are obliged to make their lybells relevant and to come parati et instructi, ac incidia non sunt fruenda pro vita hominis: and what greater snare can be layd for the lyfe of a man than to sustaine such an indytmēt as this, by which the pannall is absolutely precluded from his competent defences of Alibi, both as to himselfe and witnesses, and is also precluded from adducing other witnesses who might have been present at the tyme, and might have clearly exculpated the pannall as to what the witnesses adduced against the pannall, (and who are all known to be persones most suspect) might happen to depone against him. Secundo, the pannall having subjected himselfe to a legall tryall, and ventured his lyfe upon the issue of this indytmēt, ther is in effect a judiciall transaction betwixt the pursuer (both as to the relevancy and probation) and the pannall, for he being informed by his lawyers that the said indytmēt was unquestionably irrelevant as not condescending upon the tyme and place, hath thereupon subjected himself to tryall by your lo^ps justice, and repeats and opposes his former defences as to tyme and place against the relevancy of the indytmēt; neither can my lord advocat be allowed to alter, qualify or restrict the indytmēt in prejudice of the pannall, but the relevancy thereof as it stands must be determined by your lo^ps interloquator, injure quia in criminalibus non licet vagari. Tertio, If in the crimes of murder and mutilation, the tyme and place be necessary to be condescended upon (as my lord advocat himselfe acknowledgeth) then multo magis ought the same to be condescended upon in the crime of blasphemy, ubi non extat corpus delicti, nor any mark or vestige of the crime remaining; and no difference of reasons can be assigned why tyme and place ought not to be lybelled in the crime of blasphemy as well as in others. Quarto, the pannall has ventured his lyfe upon the issue of this lybell as it is lybelled, and repeats his former defences against the relevancy of the same.

And as my lord advocat cannot be allowed to alter or qualify the same from what is lybelled, so neither can his lo^p be allowed to qualify the same by depositions of witnesses, because thereby the pannall would be precluded not only from the benefite of your lo^ps predetermining the relevancy of the qualifications to be depone upon, and also from the hazard of suffering probation to be layd upon matters that possibly in themselves are not relevant, but also to be precluded all possibility of opposing himself against any such matters. It being impossible for him to adduce probations before the judges, proposed to advise and give their verdict, they being by the law obliged ex incontinenti to proceed to the advising, but the pannall opposes his said defences against the relevancy, and noe man will pretend that witnesse are receivable upon an indytmnt soe irrelevant in itselfe.

(The pannall adhering always to the forsaid defences against the relevancy of the lybell, and humbly intreating ante omnia your lordship's interloquitor in jure thereupon, doth in the next place, ingeniously declare befor Almighty God that he abhorres and trembles, to hear any such expressions as these lybelled charged upon any Christian, farr more to have them laid to his own charge, neither will the pannall allow any of his lawyers either to palliat or extenuat the haynousness of the words lybelled in any sort, but doth simply and absolutely deny the same in every poynt and article thereof; and as he utterly abhorres the same, soe he will propone noe defence which may in the least seem to justifie or vindicat any such expressions as these lybelled, and denies that ever such escaped him, and in cause that ever any of the expressions lybelled did escape the pannall (which he absolutely denies and abhorres) the same has certainly been when the pannall has been excessively drunk; and it is well known that men in drink and after cups are mad and furious, and the pannall humbly conceives that if any such villainous expressions when he was soe madly drunk have escaped him (which he absolutely denies, detests and abhorres) yet the same can never be sustained to infer against the pannall the paines lybelled. Because, Primo, by the twenty first act parliament first king Charles the second, the punishment therein contained is only appointed to be inflicted upon persons not distracted in their wits, and if any such expressions as are lybelled did ever escape the pannall, it is offered to be proven positively that the pannall was absolutely furious and distracted at that tyme. Soe that the forsaid act of parliament can never be extended against the pannall as to any expressions uttered by him when he was madd and furious; as said is, and the other act of parliament lybelled upon, viz. the act sixteen hundred and nyntie five, appoints alienarly the third cryme to be capital, and this is the first tyme that any such villainous cryme as this was charged upon the pannall, and consequently he can never be said to have incurred the certification therein contained. But the pannall doth utterly deny and perfectly detest and abhorre all the villainous expressions contained in the lybell.

In this indytmnt, Kinnynmount is lykeways accused for alleadged adultery with Jannet Nisbet, and the pannall having alleadged that denying that part of the lybell, the act of parliament did militat only against notorious adultery, and not our adultery, could not be inferred from any of the qualifications lybelled;

And my lord advocat having restricted his lybell to simple adultery, by offering to prove the pannalls frequent going to bed with the said Jannet Nisbet, the pannall did absolutely deny the same; and it was further alleadged for him, that albeit their going to bed together, were proven (and which the pannall denyed) yet the same could never be sustained to infer against the pannall the crymes and paines lybelled; unless carnall dealing were lykeways proven, but the most that the same could amount to was a scandall, which is only proper to be remitted to the Kirk session, to be cognosed by them. In respect whereof,

December 13, 1697.

Intran' Patrick Kinnynmount, of that ilk.

Indyted and accused for being guilty, actor, airt and part of severall murders, abuses, hamesuckens and insolencies, committed upon severall of his majesties leidges, conforme to his indytmnt recorded 11th of August last.

Pursuers.—Sir James Stewart, his maj'ts advocat; Sir Patrick Hume, his maj'ts solicitor.

Pro'rs in Defence.—Sir David Thoires; Mr. Thomas Skeime.

The lords commissioners of justiciary, with consent of his majesties advocat, desert the dyet simpliciter against Kinnynmount, as to the hail crymes lybelled in the said indytmnt.

The said Patrick Kinnynmount of that ilk, being also indyted for the cryme of adultery with Jannet Nisbet his servant, and for horrid blasphemy. The lords commissioners of justiciary, deserted the dyet off consent of his maj'ts solicitor, as to the said article of adultery, simpliciter; and did proceed to give their Interloquitor upon the article of blasphemy, whereof the tenor followes:

The lords commissioners of justiciary having considered the indytmnt pursued at the instance of his majesties advocat, against Patrick Kinnynmount of that ilk, for the cryme of blasphemy (which is the only article now insyated in) with the debate thereupon. They find the said indytmnt as it is restricted by his majesties advocat, to have been committed in the four or fyve last moneths of sixteen hundred and nyntie six, or two or thres first moneths of sixteen hundred and nyntie seven; relevant to infer the paines lybelled, and from the defence that the pannall was furious or distracted in his wits relevant in the termes of the act of parliament, but repells the alleadgence of fury or distractions, arising from drunkenness, and also repells the hail other defences proposed for the pannall, and remits the poynts found relevant to the knowledge of the assize. Sic Subscribitur.

J. FALCONAR, I. P. D. C.

After pronouncing of the which interloquitor, my lord advocat consented to the deserting of the dyet, and accordingly the lords commissioners of justiciary deserted, and he that presents deserts the dyet as to the cryme of blasphemy simpliciter. Sic Subscribitur.

409. The Proceedings in Parliament upon the Bill of Divorce between his Grace the Duke of NORFOLK and the Lady MARY MORDANT : * 12 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1700.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

February 15, 1700.

UPON reading the Petition of Henry duke of Norfolk, praying leave to bring in a bill to dissolve his marriage with the lady Mary Mordant, and to enable him to marry again, he having certain proof of his wife's living in adultery with sir John Germaine: it is ordered, that the said Petition be taken into consideration to-morrow.

February 16.

Read the first time, 'An Act to dissolve the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the lady Mary Mordant, and to enable him to marry again.' In the words following;

'Humbly sheweth, and complaineth to your most excellent majesty, your true and faithful subject Henry duke of Norfolk, and earl-marshal of England, That he did, some years since, marry the lady Mary Mordant, his now wife; and, that she hath, for divers years, lived in separation from the said subject, and hath had unlawful familiarity and adulterous conversation with sir John Germaine, bart. and is guilty of adultery on her part, and hath broken the bond of matrimony. Forasmuch therefore, as your said subject hath no issue, nor can hope for any other than spurious issue to succeed him in his honours, dignities, and estate, unless the said marriage be declared void, and annulled by parliament, and your said subject be enabled to marry any other woman. May it please your most excellent majesty, out of your princely goodness and compassion to your said subject's misfortune and calamity, and for the future support and comfort of himself and family, that it may be enacted: And be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and of the commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said bond of matrimony being violated and broken by the manifest open adultery of the said lady Mary Mordant, be, and is hereby enacted, declared, and adjudged to be from henceforth wholly dissolved, annulled, vacated, and made void to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever: and, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Henry duke of Norfolk, at any time or times hereafter, to contract matrimony, and to marry (as well in the life-time of the said lady Mary, as if she were naturally dead) with any other woman or women with whom he might lawfully marry in case the said lady Mary was not living: and, that such matrimony, when had and celebrated, shall be a good, just, and lawful marriage, and so shall be adjudged, deemed, and taken to all intents, constructions, and purposes; and, that all and every child and children, born in such matrimony, shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be born in lawful wedlock, and to be legitimate and inheritable, and shall inherit the said dukedom of Norfolk, office of earl-marshal of England, and all other earldoms, dignities, baronies, honours, and titles of honour, lauds, tenements, and other hereditaments from and by their fathers, mothers, and other ancestors, in like manner and form as any other child or children born in lawful matrimony shall or may inherit or be inheritable, according to the course of inheritances used in this realm; and to have and enjoy all privileges, pre-eminencies, benefits, advantages, claims, and demands, as any other child or children born in lawful wedlock may have or claim by the laws and customs of this kingdom. And be it further enacted, That the said Henry duke of Norfolk shall be entitled to be tenant by courtesie of the lands and inheritance of such wife whom he shall hereafter marry; and such wife as he shall so marry shall be entitled to dower of the lands and tenements whereof the said Henry duke of Norfolk shall be seized of such estate whereof she shall be dowable, as any other husband or wife may or might claim, have, or enjoy. And the child or children born in such marriage shall and may derive and make title by descent or otherwise to and from any of their uncestors, as any other child or children may do, any law, statute, restraint, prohibition, ordinance, canon, constitution, prescription, or custom had, made, exercised, or used to the contrary of the premises, or any of them, in any wise notwithstanding. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the said lady Mary shall, and is hereby barred and excluded of and from all dower and thirds, and of and from all right and title of dower and thirds unto or out of any of the honours, manors, lands, or hereditaments of the said duke; and, that all conveyances, jointures, settlements, limitations, and creations of uses and trusts of, into, or out of any honours, manors, lands or hereditaments, at any time heretofore made by the said duke, or any of his ancestors or trustees, unto or upon, or for the use or benefit of the said lady Mary, or any

* See vol. 12, p. 883 and 927, for two former Trials relating to this affair.

the issue of her body, or for easing, discharging, or counter-securing any the manors, lands, or hereditaments of the said lady Mary, or any of her ancestors, shall be from henceforth, so far as concerns the said lady Mary, or any issue of her body, or any interest for her or them, utterly void and of none effect; and all and every the said honours, manors, lands, or hereditaments of the said duke, or any of his ancestors or trustees, shall from henceforth remain, and be to and for the use and benefit of the said duke, and such other person or persons, and for such estates and interests, and in such manner and form as if the said lady Mary was now naturally dead without any issue of her body. And also, that all limitations and creations of any use, estate, power, or trust, made by any of the ancestors of the said lady Mary, unto or for the use or benefit of the said duke, his heirs or assigns, out of any the manors, lands, or hereditaments of any the ancestors of the said lady Mary, shall be from henceforth void, and of none effect. *And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the said duke of Norfolk, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, shall, on or before the 25th day of March, 1701, pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said lady Mary, or her assigns, the sum of 10,000*l.* of lawful money of England, which was the portion in money paid on her marriage with the said duke; and on default of payment of the said sum of 10,000*l.* on or before the said 25th day of March, then, and in such case, she the said lady Mary, and her assigns, during her natural life from the decease of the said duke, if she shall survive him, shall be entitled to, and shall and may have and enjoy such jointure and other advantages as she might or may have or claim by virtue of a certain indenture, Quinquedartite, made upon and in consideration of the said marriage, bearing date the 13th day of June, 1677, and made, or mentioned to have been made, between Henry late duke of Norfolk, then earl of Norwich, father of the said duke, and the present duke, by the name of Henry lord Howard of the first part; Henry earl of Peterborow and the said duchess, by the name of the lady Mary Mordant, sole daughter and heir apparent of the said earl of Peterborow, of the second part; Henry marquis of Worcester, William earl of Powis, and Henry lord O'Brian, of the third part; Arthur Onslow, esq. and Thomas Dalmatroy, esq. of the fourth part; Simon Fox, esq. and Thomas West, gent. of the fifth part: And by virtue of the agreements contained in certain articles bearing date the 28th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1694, made, or mentioned to have been made, between the said duke of the one part, and the said Henry earl of Peterborow on behalf of the said duchess; and the said duchess of the other part, according to the true intent and meaning of the said Quinquedartite indenture and articles; and also, during the joint lives of the said duke and duchess, shall and may enjoy 500*l.* per annum, by virtue of an indenture Quadrupartite, dated the 15th day of June, 1694, made, or mentioned to have been made, between the said duke of Norfolk of the first part, the said earl of Peterborow and the said duchess of the second part, William lord Lonsdale of the third part, and sir John Mordant, knight and baronet, and William Longueville, esq. of the fourth part. And then, and in such case, the said duke of Norfolk, his heirs, executors, and administrators, is and are discharged of and from the payment of the said sum of 10,000*l.* any thing herein contained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding. But on payment of the said 10,000*l.* in manner aforesaid, she the said lady Mary shall be wholly barred and excluded from her said jointure, and of and from all other advantages out of the real and personal estate of the said duke, as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the duchess of Norfolk may have a copy of the said bill; and that his grace the duke of Norfolk shall be heard by his counsel, to make good the allegations of his bill, on Tuesday next; and that the duchess may have counsel to attend at the same time, if she please.

February 17.

Upon reading the Petition of Mary duchess of Norfolk, praying to be heard by her counsel before any further proceedings be made on the said bill, it is ordered that the duchess shall be heard by her counsel as desired, on Tuesday next.

February 20.

After hearing counsel, upon the Petition of the duchess of Norfolk, as also counsel for the duke of Norfolk, the following order was made: It is ordered, That this House will hear witnesses for the duke of Norfolk, only to matter of fact, since the rejecting of the first bill, except only Mr. Daniel Germaine, Mr. Simon Briane alias de Brienne, Mrs. Anna-Maria Briane or de Brienne, Mrs. Judith Possette or Persode, Mrs. Elianor Vaness, who are at liberty to give evidence to matters of fact before that time, which were not then before the House; and are hereby required to attend this House, as witnesses on the behalf of his grace the duke of Norfolk, to-morrow morning. Also, That to-morrow this House will proceed to hear counsel and witnesses for the duke of Norfolk, to make good the allegations in his bill; at which-time the duchess of Norfolk's counsel shall be present.

February 21.

The counsel being called in, they for the duke having opened the nature of their evidence, Mrs. Elianor Vaness was sworn; and being asked some questions by the duke's counsel, she appeared to be a Dutch woman, and could not well understand English; and an interpreter being offered by the duke's counsel, counsel withdrew, and the House agreed, that the duchess's counsel should have an interpreter also; and the counsel being called in again, were told so by order of the House, and that they might proceed to any other witness. The duke's counsel desired that they might begin with Mrs. Vanessa, and withdrew.

Then the following orders were made; viz. That the agents for the duke of Norfolk do forthwith deliver a list of the witnesses they intend to examine on the behalf of the duke to the duchess of Norfolk or her agents: That to-morrow this House will proceed to hear counsel and witnesses for the duke of Norfolk, to make out the allegations in his bill; at which time the duchess of Norfolk's counsel shall be present. That Daniel Germaine, Simon Briane alias de Brienne, Anna-Maria Briane alias de Brienne, Judith. Possette alias Persode, — Goutaken, — Pontack, Susannah Barrington, — Hugonée, Mrs. Kewner, Joseph Berger, William Lane, John le Rountaine, Jonathan Browne, — Hatter, and — Welburne do, and are hereby required, to attend this House to-morrow as witnesses to be examined on the behalf of the duke of Norfolk. That William Allen and John Maitland do, and they are hereby required to attend this House, on service of this order, as witnesses to be examined on behalf of the duke of Norfolk.

DEPOSITIONS OF ELIANOR VANESS.

February 22.

Elianor Vaness sworn, deposeth as followeth, viz.

Q. Do you know sir John Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk?—A. Yes.

How long have you known them?—Two years.

When did you first come acquainted with them?—Sir John Germaine's sister hired me for a cook-maid the summer after the king came for England.

In what month of that year?—In May.

Did you live with either of them as a servant maid?—I lived two months with my lady duchess, in sir John Germaine's house.

How long did you live in the house with them?—Till they went to Vauxhall.

How long was the duchess in the house before they went to Vauxhall?—Two months.

Where was that house?—Just over Spring-garden.

At the time when the lady duchess lived with sir John Germaine, what company and conversation did they keep with one another, and in what manner?—Like man and wife.

Where was it the lady duchess lived when you came first into England?—In sir John Germaine's house.

Where did she live then?—The duchess lived there then.

How long continued she there?—About two months.

How did they live together during that time?

—Like man and wife.

Saw you them in bed together at any time, at that place in the Cockpit?—Yes.

How often?—Many times; as often as man and wife she saw them in bed, but did not put them in bed in those two months.

Did you think any otherwise, but that they had been man and wife?—She did not at first, but afterwards she did; and then they kept her within doors, for fear she should tell it.

Whither did the duchess go after that two months?—To Vauxhall.

How long did she live there?—About two years.

Did sir John Germaine use to come and keep company with the duchess there?—Yes; he used to come, and dine with her sometimes; and he lay there sometimes.

What conversation had sir John Germaine with the duchess at Vauxhall?—They conversed together as man and wife.

How long?—Sometimes one night, sometimes two.

How often did he use to come thither?—Sometimes twice, sometimes three times a week, and sometimes but once.

Had they one bed, or two?—But one.

What name did the duchess go by at Vauxhall?—By the name of the lady Beckman.

What kin was sir John Germaine pretended to be to the lady duchess?—Her brother: my lady duchess said so.

Did you go with them to Vauxhall, or not?—She went with the lady duchess.

Whose servant was you there?—Lady duchess's.

How long did you serve the lady duchess?—She staid with her till she went to Millbank.

How came you to leave their service?—They sent her away upon the account of the late trial.

Who went with you?—Mrs. Susannah, chambermaid to the lady duchess; and Mr. Nicholas, that was gentleman to sir John Germaine.

What is his name?—Nicholas Hosier.

Who took care of your passage?—Nicholas Hosier.

Whither was you ordered to go?—To Holland, to the Hague: they paid her in full; and promised fifty livres besides.

Was any part of it paid?—and by whom?—She received it in four quarters, from his brother Philip, at the Hague.

Whose brother?—Sir John Germaine's brother.

Who hired you when you came to England?—Mr. Briane's wife.

What kin is she to sir John Germaine?—His sister; and they promised, if matters did not go for the duchess, she would come to Holland herself, and take her into her service again.

Have you seen sir John Germaine, and the duchess in bed together at Millbank, once or twice.

How long had the lady duchess lived at Mill-bank ere you left her service?—Nine or ten weeks.

How came you to see them in bed together?

—By reason none was suffered to come into the room, the bed-chamber, but she and another maid, to bring necessaries, as water to wash their hands, and to clean the room.

Did you see them at their undressing, when they went to bed?—She undressed them herself, and saw them in bed.

Give an account how you two came to be admitted into the chamber, and what you saw there?—She helped them to bed, and saw them go to bed together.

Saw you them next morning?—Yes.

On what occasion came you into the chamber in the morning?—She came with chocolate, and water to wash their hands.

Did you ever see Mr. Nicholas Hostier there?

—Yes; he did the business that she did when she could not be present; he was valet de chambre.

Was he valet de chambre to sir John Germaine, or to the duchess?—He belonged to the duchess at Vauxhall, and afterwards to sir John Germaine.

Came he to sir John Germaine before the lady duchess went to Vauxhall, or not?—The duchess was at Vauxhall when he came to sir John Germaine.

Who lived with the duchess at Vauxhall?—Sir John Germaine's sister.

Who hired you?—Mrs. Briane, Mr. Briane's wife.

Was there no other relation of sir John Germaine's that lived there besides?—Mrs. Judith.

What Mrs. Judith? What is her name?—She does not know.

What kin was Mrs. Judith to sir John Germaine?—His sister.

Did the duchess use to go to no other place?

—None but to the neighbouring gardens, to gather flowers.

When you were at Mill-bank, did you ever see the duchess's father?—She hath been several times at the duchess's father's, and the lady duchess told her father and mother, that she brought her from Holland; she dressed three dishes of meat by order of the duchess.

Who was the lady duchess's father? Where did he live?—He lived at Mill-bank, but could not tell his name; the lord Peterborough, she says, but could not think on it before now.

When she lived with Germaine at the Cockpit, was there no other that lived with them at that time?—Nobody.

Did sir John Germaine's brother-in-law or sister lie in the house, at any time?—Yes; when they came first to England they used to lie there.

Name them?—Mr. Briane, and his wife.

Did you see any of sir John Germaine's relations, at any time, in the room during the time that the duchess was in bed with him?—Yes; Mr. Briane and his wife.

Was sir John Germaine in bed at that time with the duchess?—Yes.

Eleanor Venes cross-examined.

Q. Was it at Vauxhall that the lady duchess said, that Germaine was her brother?—A. Yes. Did the duchess tell you, that sir John Germaine was her brother?—She gave it out among the neighbours, but never told her so.

Was you cookmaid?—She was hired for cookmaid.

Did you continue to act as cookmaid?—Yes, at Vauxhall.

Was you at the Cockpit?—She used to clean the rooms, and nobody was suffered to come into the room but she, Mrs. Susannah, and Nicholas.

Was there no other woman in the house but you?—Yes, Mrs. Susannah.

Where did you see sir John Germaine and the duchess in bed?—At Vauxhall.

When came you from Holland?—About five or six weeks ago.

Where have you been since?—She does not know no place nor street in London.

How came you over?—About a year and half ago she met Nicholas at Amsterdam; she asked him how he did, and if he had got a place. He answered, No; but he believed he should very soon have one in England.

Who sent for you, or brought you over from Holland this last time?—She met Mr. Nicholas about a year ago, and said, she had a great mind to go and live in England again; and he said, he would get a place for her.

Who sent for her?—Does not know.

When you came over, who paid your passage, and first took care of you?—Nicholas hath given her what she spent since.

Who brought you to town? And who furnished you with money? And where did you land? What house did you first come to?—She landed at Gravesend.

Who received her there; or, when she came to town, brought her to any place to lodge at?—Nicholas brought her to a place where she was secure.

What place is it?—She does not know, she never was in London.

Did you not live at Vauxhall, and at sir John Germaine's house in the Cockpit?—She was no further than those houses; she means, she was never in the city of London.

Where is the house she has been at these six weeks?—She cannot tell whereabouts it is.

Was you not sent for back from Holland to be a witness?—No, knew nothing of it till about — now about eight or nine weeks ago.

In what street is the house you have been at?—I cannot tell.

How long is it since you went into Holland, since you left the duchess's service?—About eight years ago.

Did you never tell any body the occasion of your going over?—Yes, in Holland, but not here.

To whom did you tell it?—To a great many.

Know you any of those to be in England, that you did tell it to?—Does not know any.

Did you ever discover this matter of your own accord? or, was you asked to do it?—I said, I would tell the truth if I were asked.

Can you name the person that asked you?—Mr. Nicholas.

Had you any discourse about this matter about eight weeks ago?—When I asked Mr. Nicholas if he could get me a place in England, I told him, I would say the truth.

What discourse had you with Mr. Nicholas about it?—I asked Mr. Nicholas, whether there was any danger of any such thing?—He said, he knew nothing of it.

Did you ever discover that you were sent out of the way into Holland?—No.

Whether you and this gentleman that interprets have not talked most of this matter before you came hither?—No.

Who have you talked to about this matter, since you came into England, besides Nicholas?—Nobody.

Are you a single woman, or a married woman?—A single woman.

The Duke's Counsel.

Q. Was it your business to look after the chamber, to keep the door constantly, or on what occasion?—A. I used to wash the duchess's cloaths, and bring them to sir John Germaine's house, and keep the upper rooms clean, where sir John Germaine lay.

Did Susan go over with you into Holland, and come back with you?—Mr. Nicholas brought me into a room where she was kept, and I stayed a while with her.

Did Susan go with you, and come with you again?—Nicholas, and Susan, and I, were in a room together, and Mr. Germaine came every night, when the house was broke up, and told us what passed.

Did Susan go to Holland with you? Whether did you go before Nicholas, or with him?—Sir John Germaine ordered Nicholas and she to go into Holland, and Nicholas went with her.

(Signed) ELIANOR VANESE.

DEPOSITIONS OF NICHOLAS HOSIER.

February 22.

(Nicholas Hosier sworn.)

Q. Whether he knows sir John Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk?—A. Yes, Sir; I understand, I know both.

How long have you been acquainted with sir John Germaine, and, upon what occasion?—The first he came to know him was in Suffolk-street.

Whether ever he was a servant to him?—Yes; I was a servant to him there.

When was it you first came into sir John Germaine's service?—It was above half a year before king James went away.

Did you live with sir John or the duchess? With sir John Germaine.

Where did he dwell at that time?—He had lodgings at the Golden Ball.

Was you with him afterwards when he was at the Cockpit?—Yes; and I lived with him at the Cockpit too.

At that time did you know the duchess of Norfolk?—I knew her, because they told me she was so.

Was there any lady that lived with sir John Germaine at the Cockpit?—At that time there was Mrs. Briane, sir John Germaine's sister.

Was there any body else used to lodge there?—There was none there but her at first.

Was there any other afterwards?—Yes, about two or three months after he was there; but I don't justly know how long afterwards.

Who was there then?—There was his sister, by name Mrs. Judith Germaine.

Do you know any thing about the duchess of Norfolk at that time?—Yes.

What conversation had sir John Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk?—She was in the house, and they eat and drank together, and lay together.

Where was that?—At sir John Germaine's house, next the Cockpit.

How came you to know they lay together?—Because I was his valet de chambre, and helped to undress and put him to bed.

Where was the duchess at that time?—The duchess was sometimes a bed, and sometimes not, according as he came home, early or late.

How long was the duchess with sir John Germaine at the Cockpit?—She was at the Cockpit before I came there.

Whether he went from sir John Germaine's service, after he came to live there?—He left his service several times.

When was the first time he went from sir John Germaine's service?—The first time he left his service was in Suffolk street.

How long was it before he came to live with him again?—He came into his service again, the summer after this present king came into England.

What time of the summer was it?—He cannot justly tell that.

Whether the duchess was there before he came to the Cockpit, or not?—She was there before.

How long continued she there?—About fifteen days after he came to sir John Germaine.

In what manner did sir John Germaine and the duchess live there during those fifteen days?—He says he hath already explained that before, he used to undress him and put him a-bed together with the duchess.

Where did the duchess live after she went from sir John Germaine's house?—She went and dwelt at Vauxhall.

By what name did she go when she was at Vauxhall?—She went by the name of my lady Beckman.

Whether he went with her, or continued in sir John Germaine's service?—He went with my lady duchess for some time, by sir John Germaine's order; he was sometimes with the one, and sometimes with the other; sometimes one paid him, and sometimes the other.

Whether sir John Germaine went to Vaux-hall?—He came there sometimes; he has seen him there several nights.

Whether he stayed all night there?—Sometimes.

Whether he was alone, or any body was with him?—There was somebody lay with him.

Who, upon his oath?—Madam the duchess, madam Beckman.

How know you that?—Because he undressed him when they lay together.

How often was that?—He cannot justly say how often, but it was several times.

What service was he in when he went out of England, and upon what occasion?—He left sir John Germaine's service at that time when the trial was depending between the duke and the duchess of Norfolk.

By whose order did you leave that service?—He desired leave.

How came you to leave that service at that time?—Because he was afraid he should be obliged to speak the truth of what he had seen.

Whether any went with him, and who went from their service when he went?—There were two servants of the duchess's.

What was their names?—One is called Susannah Barrington, and the other Elianor Vaness.

Whither did they go?—He was ordered by sir John Germaine to hire lodgings for them, where they should be unknown and private.

What was the reason why they should be in private?—He knows no other reason, but the difference before the parliament between the duke and duchess of Norfolk; he was obliged to take the lodgings, because the wind was contrary for them to go for Holland, and took private lodgings for them by the order of sir John Germaine.

What became of Susannah Barrington after that?—She stayed about three weeks with him, and then sir John Germaine came and fetched her back again, and where he carried her he does not know.

What became of Vaness, and yourself afterwards?—When the wind favoured, we passed the seas.

What time of the year was it?—It was about Easter that he came into Holland.

What time he went from his service, and was ordered to be private?—It was about the time of the trial.

Whether he hath any paper under sir John Germaine's hand for his discharge? We do not ask it, but only to refresh his memory. [The paper was dated 8th of February, 1692, reckoning the year to begin the first of January.] Whether that was the time he left the duchess's service?—Yes, about six or eight weeks after he went to sea.

Where did you stay in the mean time?—In the Mippories near the Tower.

How came you to stay there so long after you were out of service, before you went beyond sea?—Because the wind was contrary.

Who went over with him? What became of Elianor Vaness?—She went with him to Holland.

Who bare her charges thither?—Sir John Germaine gave him seven guineas to pay for the expences that he was at here, and to cross the sea.

How long after that he continued in Holland, before he came into England?—He did not stay long in Holland, but went into his own country.

How long was it before you returned to England?—The summer following.

Was he sent far over into England, and by whom?—Yes, sir John Germaine sent to him often, by himself, and by his brother in Holland.

When he came over in the summer following (in ninety-two) whose service did he come to?—He returned to sir John Germaine.

Where did he live at that time?—Where he lives at present, at the Cockpit.

Whether after he came back in the year 1692; he observed any conversation between sir John Germaine and the duchess?—Yes; he says he saw them come together at their house.

What more?—He again then saw them a-bed together.

Where?—In the house of sir John Germaine.

How often may that be?—He cannot justly tell how often.

Whether it was often or not?—No, he cannot say very often.

When was the last time he ever saw them a-bed together?—The last time he saw them a-bed was not at the Cockpit.

Where then?—It was, at the duchess's own house, where as he believes, she lives still.

Whereabout in the town?—It was upon a corner of the park, near my lord of Oxford's.

How long since he saw them last a-bed together?—He cannot justly tell the time, it was about two or three months before he went away.

Did he mean the first, second, or third time?—It was two or three months before he went away the last time?

In what year did he go away the last time? [Let him look upon any note he hath to refresh his memory.] [Accordingly he looked upon a paper.]—It is the 27th of April, 1696.

Did you go away then the last time?—Yes, he says that it was the last time he left his service.

How long before that did you see them a-bed together?—He says it was about two months and a half before he left the service.

When my lady duchess lived at Vaux-hall, whether he can name any body else that was a servant in the house at that time?—Yes, there was one Elianor Vaness.

What servant was she?—She looked to the kitchen.

Whether he has seen her in the chamber when the duchess was a-bed there?—Yes, very often.

How came she that was such a maid to be in the chamber?—He says he cannot tell the reason or what business she had there; but there she was for one thing or other, best known to herself; he does not know.

Whether when the duchess was at Vauxhall, any relations of sir John Germaine came to her there?—Yes, they would come and see her.

Who were they?—Mrs. Brienne and Mrs. Judith; he says he does not remember that Mrs. Brienne has lain there, but Mrs. Judith has.

Where it was, and upon what occasion he met with Elianor Vaneas after he carried her over into Holland?—I met her in Amsterdam.

Whether he came over into England with her, and upon what occasion?—I met her at Amsterdam; and she asked me what business I had there, whether I had a master; and I said, no.

How was that?—About a year and a half, to his remembrance.

Whether he came over with her the last time?—Yes; he came over into England with her in company, about six or seven weeks since.

Where has she been since he came into England?—She was in lodgings.

Where?—He put her into private lodgings, that she should be secure.

Why did you put her into private lodgings?—Because he was afraid, in the circumstances that he is now, that somebody might give them some affront, or do them an injury; and therefore he thought it best to be in some place of security.

What particular reason had he why he should take private lodgings, or have that fear upon him?—He says, that when he was last here, sir John Germaine came up one night in a great passion, and swore, and said, somebody would betray him.

I desire he might repeat that again?—Sir John Germaine came one night up stairs and said, that Nicholas, this rogue, would betray him.

Who was that?—He says it was one Nicholas Rushett, that served him or both, he cannot tell, but he was in his service; that he heard these words, and that he thought in these circumstances, the securest way would be to take private lodgings.

What brought him into England the last time? Whether he was spoke to to come, and for what purpose?—He says, that about two or three years ago he happened to meet with a friend, and he desired him if he heard of a good place for him in England, to let him know of it, for he would go and serve there again.

Whether he was spoke to to come over, or was Elianor Vaneas spoke to, and what was the occasion?—My lord asked him if he would speak the truth, and do him any service; and whether he would bring this girl along with him.

Who was it that spoke to him?—My lord duke and my lord Howard.

When was that?—It was about a year ago.

Where was he at that time?—He was in London.

Did he go over of his own accord, or was he sent into Holland; who it was that sent him over, and for what?—It was a friend of his acquaintance, that he desired, in case he heard of a place, to send for him.

Who sent for Elianor Vaneas over?—He says, that after he had promised my lord duke and lord Howard to speak the truth of what he knew, they desired him, that if he met with Elianor Vaneas, to desire her to come over, and speak the truth of what she knew.

How long after did you meet with Elianor Vaneas?—It is about twelve months since I met with her.

When was the first time that he spoke to Elianor Vaneas about her coming over to speak the truth?—It is about a year since.

How long is it since they resolved to come over?—About twelve months.

Whether he was acquainted with Elianor Vaneas before he met with her in sir John Germaine's service?—He says never.

You say you went from sir John Germaine's service in Suffolk-street, and you say when you came to him again he lived in the Cockpit; did you find Elianor Vaneas there then?—He says he found her at the Cockpit.

When he waited on sir John Germaine in his chamber, who waited on the duchess in her chamber?—There was one Susannah Barrington, and Elianor Vaneas.

But who waited upon her in her chamber?—Susannah Barrington did, to dress her.

Whether he had seen any of sir John Germaine's relations in the chamber, when this lady and sir John Germaine were a-bed together?—Yes.

Name them.—He says, he saw Mrs. Brienne and Mr. Daniel Germaine there.

Did you see Mrs. Judith there?—He does not remember that he saw Mrs. Judith in the room while they were a-bed together; but the other he hath seen when they were a-bed together, but at different times.

Whether ever he hath seen the duchess at any other place?—He has been at the chapel with her, and elsewhere.

Where?—At my lord Peterborough's, and in her own house.

Cross Examined.

I desire he may reduce this to a certainty, what time he went out of England, and look upon his note again. [He looked upon his note, and it was dated 8th February, 1692.]

How long after this went he out of England?—He went away as soon as the wind was favourable.

Can he recollect the time?—He says it was some time before Easter, for he came into Holland about Easter.

When he told his grace the duke of Norfolk and lord Howard he would be true to them, whether he was in any service at that time?—No, he was in no service at that time.

How long had he been out of employ?—He has none yet.

But how long had he been out of employ, or service, before he made this proposal to the duke, or my lord Howard?—He says, he went away about the 27th of June.

Is it the same year his paper speaks of, that he spake to my lord duke?—No, it was not; he spake to my lord duke about twelve months ago.

But how long had he been out of service when he spake to my lord duke? When did he leave sir John Germaine the last time?—It is about three years and half ago; it will be four years in June next.

Has he been in any service since that time?—No, he has not.

How has he lived since then?—He says, he has something of his own in his own country, upon which he may subsist some time.

I think he said, he saw sir John Germaine and the duchess in bed together, in the house where she now lives?—Yes.

Then I desire he will tell, if he knows any of the duchess's servants that were about her at that time?—Yes, he does.

Then, that he will name them?—Henry Keemer.

What is become of him?—They told he was dead; and there was Susan Barrington.

I desire he will tell of some of the servants that lived with the duchess at that time, besides that person that is dead, and the other which is gone beyond sea, as they say?

[Mr. Northey answered, We do not say she is gone beyond sea.]—He does not know any other.

Then, that he will tell what month he saw them in bed together?—He cannot remember the month, or the day; but if they will ask him the reason why he remembers it, he will tell it them.

If you can come to any certainty about the time of the year or the month?—He cannot say the month, or any particular time.

What servant he saw in the house, or who let him in?—He had himself the key of the lower room, and could come in when he pleased.

Whose servant was he at this time he speaks of? Whether he was a servant to the duchess or to sir John Germaine?—He was servant to sir John Germaine.

He was saying he could tell a reason to fix the time, let him recollect himself of the time?

—He cannot remember the time, but he came into the room to bring a clyster, and he was desired to stay a while till my lady duchess got up.

That he may be positive whether he had a key to the lower room of the duchess's house?

—He says he had a key of the door that goes into the park, and he could come into the house by it; for it was the key of the house.

What servant was it that brought him up, for that key only let him into the lower room?

Sometimes Susan Barrington, and sometimes Henry Keemer.

VOE-REH

What room the lady duchess lay in?—It is a room that looks into the park.

Is it not a ground room? I suppose it is not.

How many stories?—He cannot tell what degree it was.

Being asked that question again upon the reading his deposition, he says he cannot tell how many stories; but, if you please, he will describe the coming into the room as well as he can.

Describe the coming into the room?—That as you come upon the left hand, there is a way to go into the duchess's room; when you have passed the little chamber-door, you go into a place full of china; and, after that, you come to the duchess's bed-chamber. On the other side, going up stairs, there is a little room, where Susan told him she lay; and afterwards you come into a room where the chimney is, as he thinks, on the right hand, and he thinks there are two windows that look into the street, he is not very certain; and in the room upon the left hand there is a door into a great room, and from that great room you can go into the lady duchess's room. It was so at that time, to the best of his remembrance.

How many rooms are there upon a floor?—There are a matter of four rooms upon a floor.

Whether he has spoke with any body that he knows is acquainted with this house, since he was examined here before?—He says he has spoke to nobody since, that has given him any account of the house.

Which side of the park does the window of my lady duchess's room look into?—Towards the pond where the brass statue is.

Does the bed chamber look towards the brass statue?—He durst not go to look out at the window for fear of being discovered, but he could see the water.

Whether he knows the Horse-guards?—Yes.

Whether he knows Arlington house?—Yes.

Whether the window does look towards Arlington-house, or the Horse-guards?—He hath been there several times, but it was not his business to go to the window; but when he was in the room he could see the water.

Whether he could tell which way the window looked?—He did not live in the house, but went there sometimes upon messages; and when he was there, it was not his business to go to the window, but he could see the water when he was in the room.

Whether the window was on that side of the little door that he came in, or on the other side?

—Upon the left hand coming in. He says he has explained himself as to the entering in, and he can say no more to it.

Was it one or two pair of stairs that the duchess lay?—He cannot be positive whether one or two pair of stairs.

Who brought him up that time he brought the clyster?—Susan Barrington.

Who told him at the Cook pit, it was the duchess of Norfolk?—Sir John Germaine, herself, and the whole house told him so.

Did he before that time know the duchess?
—No.

Did you never see other women there besides this lady?—Yes.

Did you know all the rest that you saw there?—No he did not know them all.

Whether he was not told the rest of the women were of great quality too?—He never was told so, nor did he inform himself whether they were or no.

At Vauxhall and at the Cock-pit, I think, he spoke as if he undressed sir John Germaine and the duchess; whether he undressed them both?—Not the duchess.

What year was it they were at Vauxhall?

—It was before he went to Ireland, and after he came from Ireland; but he cannot precisely tell the time.

Whether he has been in any service since 1696, when he left sir John Germaine's?—No.

Whether when he came, about a year ago, into England, there was application made to him in order to make a discovery? or, whether he offered of himself to make it?—He never did offer himself.

Who was it that first asked him the question? It was my lord Howard.

Where did you meet my lord Howard? and upon what occasion?—He says, that it was that person that he had addressed himself to, to get him into service here, that was the occasion of their meeting together.

Did you know the lord Howard before?—No.

Where was the place they met?—He called him to his house.

My lord, or that person?—He says, that person to which he addressed himself to get a place, told him he had found one.

Name that person?—Richardson.

Where does he live?—I don't know.

Were you acquainted with him before?—Yes.

Where had you been acquainted with him?

—At London; it is a woman.

Whether he can describe the room, or the furniture of the room, where this noble lady and sir John Germaine were a-bed together, where she lives now?—He cannot remember any thing of the furniture.

Was it hung or wainscoted?—He says, he cannot tell, and yet was there often.

Pray, who was the clyster for?—For Mr. Germaine.

Where was it to be administered?—A-bed.

Who was a-bed?—My lady duchess was a-bed too.

Was it to be administered at the same time as he and the duchess were a-bed together?—No.

Was the duchess there?—He laid the syringe to the fire-side, till such time as the duchess rose.

Apothecaries are exact in point of time in making their bills?—He says, I composed the clyster myself; but he did not compose it at the duchess's house, but at Mr. Germaine's.

Did you stay with sir John Germaine till all was over?—No; as soon as he had given it him, he went home to Mr. Germaine's house.

Whether he pretends to speak of any other time he saw the duchess in bed with him at her house in Duke-street, but when he carried him the clyster?—Yes, my lord, he says he has.

Let him tell the times and circumstances.—He says, he cannot very well remember the times, but he had sometimes business there, to bring and carry letters.

When was that time of the clyster?—It was about two months before he left them.

Was that the last time he saw them together?—That was the last time.

How long before that did he see them together?—Long before that time, in the same house.

He says, he has seen sir John Germaine and the duchess in bed together elsewhere. Did he never see them in bed together at the Mill-bank?—He has seen them there two or three times a-bed together.

When did your master order you to prepare a clyster?—He had order to come and wait for Mr. Germaine at the duchess's; and, that Mr. Germaine coming to the duchess's late, he ordered him to bring the clyster next morning.

At what time he came the next morning?—He had order to bring it at 9 o'clock, and he brought it at the appointed hour, and waited in the little room where Susan was till he was called in.

He says, he waited for sir John Germaine, by his orders, at the duchess's, until it was late; which of the duchess's servants did he keep company with?—He says, he remembers very well it was Mr. Keemer.

Whether that time that he saw Mr. Germaine and the duchess in bed together at Mill-bank, if it was after the first time he was sent out of England, when the bill was depending before the lords?—It was after.

What year did you see them a-bed together at Mill-bank?—It was a day or two before Mrs. D'Avenant died. A day or two before she died Mr. Germaine came to Mill-bank, and staid there about eight days.

NICOLA HAUSEUR.

DEPOSITIONS OF WILLIAM BAYLY.

February 25.

(William Bayly sworn.)

Q. Do you know sir John Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk?—A. Yes.

Was you servant to sir John Germaine?—Yes.

In what capacity?—Three years I wore his livery, and three years I was his steward.

When did you first come to live with him?—Three weeks before the king was crowned.

Was there any conversation between sir John Germaine and the duchess of Norfolk? Do ye know that they lived together, or kept company one with another?—No: I never knew them live together, but seen them keep company, together, but never saw any incivility between them.

Where saw you them in company together?
—I saw them in company in my master's house.

How long ago?—About five years ago.

Where did your master then live?—He lived then where he does now.

Did the duchess of Norfolk ever lie there?—Never to my knowledge.

What was the time she usually came there?—Commonly in an afternoon.

How often have you seen her there?—Two or three times.

At what time did she use to come? and, at what time did she use to go away?—She used to come there about four or five o'clock in the afternoon, and might stay there about two or three hours.

You are upon your oath, and pray tell whether you ever saw them in bed together?—By all that is good, I never saw them in bed together.

Did the lady duchess use to come thither masked or unmasked?—She used to come masked, but put it off when she came into the house.

Who used to come with her?—There used to come Mr. Keemer with her.

What company? Did no other use to come with her to sir John Germaine's house?—Yes, another servant, Mr. Carter.

Who was in the room with them in sir John Germaine's house?—Mr. Keemer staid commonly with them all the time they dined, and after dinner; the other servants and I were in the next room to them; and commonly, when they had occasion, they would call Mr. Keemer.

Was there no other servant but Mr. Keemer that they used to call upon?—Yes; a gentlewoman, Mrs. Susan Barrington.

Have you seen her lately?—No, not these six months.

Do you know if your master used to go to the duchess's house?—Yes, I have heard so; but I cannot say so positively.

Did you ever go with them to the duchess's house?—No; but I have gone with them as far as the Horse-ferry.

When was the last time you saw them together?—I cannot tell; I have been out of my master's service these four years.

How long before you left your master's service, do ye think it was that you saw them together?—I cannot tell, but I think it might be about half a year.

He has gone with his master as far as the Horse-ferry; pray then let him be asked where he left his master?—I left him at the Horse-ferry.

What orders did your master give you when you left him?—He ordered me to go home, and keep the house.

Do ye know whether your master was gone then?—I may judge he went to the duchess, but I cannot swear he went there.

Did sir John Germaine come home to bed that night?—Some nights he came, and some he did not.

Did you carry cloaths to him at any time?—I have carried cloaths for him to Mr. Keemer, the duchess's servant.

Where did Keemer live when you carried cloaths to him?—In a little street going to the Bowling-alley.

Who did he live withal?—He told me he lived with the duchess; but he was a house-keeper, and had a house there.

Did you always carry cloaths to Mr. Keemer for your master?—Sometimes I carried his cloaths to Mr. Keemer, and sometimes Mr. Keemer came to me for them.

Did you apprehend that your master was then at the duchess's, or at Mr. Keemer's?—I cannot tell where he was: how can I tell? I answer as punctually as I can.

When Keemer came to you for cloaths, what account did he give you where your master was?—He gave no account.

Whether did you ever see the duchess and your master together at any other place but his own house?—Never.

When you carried the cloaths to Keemer's, did your master lie at home that night or not?—Sometimes he lay at home, and sometimes he did not: many times my master has been at the duchess of Mazarine's from four o'clock this day till twelve the next.

Repeat it again, for that is material.—My master has taken his chair at his own back-door at four o'clock on a Saturday, and not come home till Sunday at twelve o'clock.

Where has your master been at that time, when he staid out all night?—At the duchess of Mazarine's; and when he lost his gold, he has sent to me for more gold.

Did he ever send to you for any cloaths when he was there?—Never.

Do ye know where he was when he sent to you for cloaths?—No, indeed.

Do ye know Nicholas Hosier?—Yes, I know him very well; I saw him here just now.

Did you know him when he waited on sir John Germaine?—Yes, he succeeded me, and I succeeded him again.

You was footman when you went to sir John Germaine: when was that? and, what year did you leave off your livery, and serve him as his steward?—I cannot tell.

He succeeded Hosier, and Hosier succeeded him: Pray let it be asked him, at what time he came into his master's service, when he succeeded Hosier?—It was about the same time that the trial was here before.

How long was it ere Hosier returned again to serve sir John Germaine?—To the best of my knowledge, it was three years; for I received and paid money for my master, and Hosier was away all that time: Hosier will not deny it, if he were called in.

You say that you succeeded Hosier at the time when the trial was here: How long before that time did you return to your master's service?—About three weeks before the king was brownd I came to my master, and served him three years, and wore his livery; and he was pleased, after Mr. Hosier went away, to make me lay out his money, to be caterer for him, and to keep his gold; and to the best of my knowledge it was three years before Nicholas succeeded me again.

How long was it before he came back again to serve sir John Germaine?—Before I saw him in my master's house, and that he took my place from me, it was three years.

Did you not see Mr. Hosier in England before that time that you went out of your master's service?—No; I beg your lordship's pardon, I will recollect my memory for that; as I have a soul to be saved, now it is come into my mind, my master sent for Nicholas into Holland about a year before Nicholas did come over: My master told me, before he came, that he would send for Nicholas again, and that I and Nicholas should have the charge of his house. Nicholas came over, and we had the play at our own house: Nicholas staid there some time, but he did not like his business, and so he went away again, because he could not have all the money.

About what time did Nicholas come into England, after the trial was before this House?—I cannot resolve you.

Had you no certificate of leave, or discharge, when you left your master's service?—No; my master was so kind, that he brought me immediately into the excise, as soon as I was out of his service.

February 26.

William Bayly cross-examined.

Q. When you carried the cloaths to sir John Germaine's, was it the time when you wore his livery?—A. I carried no cloaths to him when I wore his livery.

Had you no discourse with the duchess's agents since Saturday night?—No, I have not seen them, nor do not know them.

He says, he saw the duchess of Norfolk at the Cockpit, at sir John Germaine's house where he now dwells: Pray, recollect yourself, that you may be positive as to the time?—I cannot resolve you as to the year, it is so long ago; I believe it is about five years ago.

Can you be positive that it is not more?—To the best of my knowledge, it was about five years.

Can you be so far certain, that you can say it was not more?—I cannot swear it was, more, but I believe it may be five years, more or less.

You say you saw her two or three times there: Was it all in one year, near the same time or month? Can you reduce it to any certainty?—I believe it might be in summer.

All in the summer?—Yes, I believe, all in one; to the best of my knowledge there was not a winter between the time that I saw her and last.

Did you know the duchess of Norfolk before that time that you saw her in your master's house, and took her to be the duchess of Norfolk?—I did not know her before the trial was here.

Did you know her any time after that trial, before the time you saw her in sir John Germaine's house?—I was not sure that it was she, only as I had it from Mr. Keemer.

Then you do not undertake of your own knowledge to say that it was she?—I cannot swear that it was she, but as Mr. Keemer told me: I do not know whether I should know her now or not, it is so long since I saw her: I believe it is five years, if not more.

Did you see her before or after you saw her at sir John Germaine's house?—The first time they told me it was she, I met her in her coach in the Pallmall, with two other gentlemen with her, a little before the trial was here: I followed the coach, and the duchess went into some lady's house in Dover street, and they told me the duchess was the first woman that went out; this is the first time that ever I saw her, that I know of, till such time as Keemer told me it was she.

Whether do you know Nicholas?—I know him very well.

Can you tell how long it is since he came last into England?—No, he has been here two or three times in England since I left my master.

How long before this examination saw you him, or spoke with him?—I did not see him above these three years.

How long before you came hither as a witness did you see him?—I have not seen him these three years till I came hither to be a witness, and did admire to see him here, that a man that had got his bread under his master should appear here against him, it is so ungrateful a thing.

How came it you had so much curiosity as to follow the duchess's coach?—I had a mind to satisfy my own humour.

Do ye know how Nicholas lived since he was out of his master's service?—No; I never saw him, nor had any account of him at all, nor have seen him these three years till now.

Did you know when Nicholas and Eleanor Vaness went out of England?—No, I never knew when they went, nor when they came.

Do not you know what business he went out of England about, the time you took his place?—I know not the business he went out of England upon.

Did he at any time tell you he was to get away to hide himself from coming hither?—No, I heard not one word from him at the time of his parting.

What reason had you to say upon the first sight of Hosier, that he was ungrateful for coming hither?—I should think myself ungrateful to eat a gentleman's bread seven years, and do him all the spite and malice I could.

Repeat those words?—I should think myself very ungrateful to prosecute; if I should do any harm to a master that I had served so many years, I should think myself very un-gratefully let him think of himself what he pleases.

He added some other words.—For any thing I know, it is spite and malice.

Where did you live when you followed the duchess's coach?—At Mr. Germaine's.

This man is a witness, and so is Hosier; let him explain himself what he means, and where in there is any difference between him and Hosier, for both are witnesses?—I say, I should think myself very ungrateful, if I would do any harm to a man whose bread I did eat so long, and had got so much money under him.

What harm does Hosier do, being a witness against the duchess of Norfolk? What harm is that to sir John Germaine?—I do not know.

Do ye reckon it ungrateful to speak the truth to the prejudice of a master?—No, I would not speak an untruth for all the masters in the world.

Where is there any fault more in Hosier than in you?—I know not.

Whether did Elianor Vaness live with sir John Germaine when you lived there?—I know not who she is.

This woman that was here as a witness?—Yes, she lived there.

What time went she away from sir John Germaine's service?—I know not, I cannot tell, indeed.

(Signed) WILLIAM BAYLY.

March 5.

Counsel and witness being called in for the duchess of Norfolk (and the Duke's counsel being present) the examination of the witnesses, taken yesterday in short-hand and transcribed, were read to them, and subscribed, viz.

THOMAS HAWKSWORTH sworn, deposed as followeth:

Q. Do you know Elianor Vaness? And did you live in the duchess of Norfolk's family?—A. I came to live with the duchess about October, 1691, and left her in September, about two years within two months: Elianor Vaness lived there when I lived there, and was cook-maid.

When did she leave the duchess's service?—About the beginning of January, or the latter end of December, 1691.

On what occasion went she away?—She was turned away, to the best of my remembrance, or keeping company with Dutchmen.

Whether used she any other office but in the kitchen? or had she access to the duchess's chamber?—Never; she was not allowed to come any higher than the first floor: she used a clean that room next the street, one pair of stairs next the door, and the back parlour even with that, but was not suffered to come into the duchess's chamber.

Who waited upon the duchess in her chamber?—Frances Knight; she was constantly in the duchess's chamber, and used to warm her bed.

You say that Vaness was allowed to come no higher than the first floor; explain that?—The kitchen is under-ground backward; that room Vaness cleaned was even with the street, a ground-room; the laundry-maid cleaned the next pair of stairs.

What was the laundry-maid's name?—Susan; she is dead.

Do you know how long?—No.

Did you ever see Vaness in the duchess's chamber?—Never in my life; I never heard she was allowed to come there.

How long is it since you lived with the duchess?—About six or seven years, or very near it.

Do you remember the bill that was brought into parliament against the duchess, while you lived there?—I came to the duchess the October before that bill was brought in.

Was Vaness turned away before that?—She was gone a month or thereabouts before that.

Do ye remember the month?—To the best of my remembrance, it was about the latter end of December, or the beginning of January.

Was there any stir about the Dutch foot-soldiers haunting Vaness?—I never saw any, but have heard the servants say they did.

Can you say what time it was? Whether before or after the bill?—Before I heard any thing of the bill she was gone.

Cross-examined.

Where do you live now?—With sir Thomas Barnardiston.

What station were you in when you lived with the duchess?—A footman.

Do you know Hosier then?—No.

Where did the duchess live, when you came first to her?—Upon the row between the Horse-ferry and Mill-bank.

How long did you live there?—A fortnight or thereabouts; not much more.

Do you know where she lived before?—No.

Do you know sir John Germaine? and, on the oath you have taken, did he ever come to the duchess's house while you lived with her?—I never saw him in the house; I never saw any unhandsome thing by the duchess all the time I lived with her.

Did you never see sir John Germaine with her?—No, never; and I had the privilege of the first floor and the second floor, and helped to rub the rooms, and sometimes I rubbed the lodging-room.

Had you the privilege of going up stairs in the morning?—No, it was one Peacock that rubbed the room above stairs.

Did you know Vaness? Was she servant to the duchess when you lived there?—Yes, she was.

Can you be positive as to the time of her going away?—As near as I can tell, it was in the beginning of January, 1692. I came in the October before, and she went away the January following.

Were you by, when she was discharged?—No.

Who paid her her wages?—I cannot tell.

Did you never see Vaness in the duchess's chamber?—Never.

Did you attend at the duchess's chamber in the morning?—Not constantly; we took it by turns.

Did you never attend in her chamber when she was a-bed?—No.

Who was it of her women that attended in her chamber?—Susan —, Frances Knight, and Susan Barrington.

When did you see Susan Barrington last?—About five years ago.

Did she constantly attend in the duchess's chamber?—She and Mrs. Knight carried coals constantly to warm the bed.

How old was you when you lived with the duchess?—About eighteen years old.

How old are you now?—I think about 27.

THOMAS HAWKSWORTH.

JOHN PEACOCK sworn, deposeth as followeth:

Q. Did you live with the duchess of Norfolk in 1691?—A. It is six years since I left her service, last January or thereabouts; I lived two years and a half with her, or thereabouts; I came in August, and staid till January two years following, or thereabouts.

Did you live with the duchess, when the first trial, as they call it, came on in parliament?—Yes, I lived with her before and after.

Did you know Vaness?—I knew one whose name was called Lena.

What was her business?—Below stairs in the kitchen; I never saw her in any other room, but the outer room next to the street, and I was there, all the while she was there, and after she was gone.

Did you ever see her in the duchess's bed-chamber?—No; the work she was employed about was dirty work; I never saw her clean, but nasty, and could not eat the victuals of her dressing.

Was you there before Vaness?—Yes, I was in the house some time before her grace came over, to help the upholster, and to carry looking-glasses and stands.

When did she come over?—She came to Mill-bank, but I know not when she came over: My lady Peterborough ordered me to do what I did.

Was you servant there to the duchess before she came over?—I never saw my lady duchess before she came there, except some years before at Drayton, when he lived with her.

Who hired you?—I came there by the lady Peterborough's order, and had my victuals at my lord Peterborough's.

Who hired you?—I was not hired at all.

How long did you live at Mill-bank?—I lived about two years and a quarter, or somewhat more.

What was your proper business, when you lived with the duchess?—When the duchess went abroad, I went with the coach; and when she supped or dined at home, I laid the cloth, forks and spoons.

Did you ever wait above stairs?—Yes; I have waited above stairs.

Who waited upon the duchess in her chamber?—Frances Knight, one Susan, and one Susannah.

Upon your oath, did you ever see this woman, Helena, go into the duchess's bed-chamber?

I never once saw her there all the time I staid there; I rubbed the bed-chamber with a long rubbing-brush; I never saw her there, nor above stairs.

Do you know at what time it was she came to live with my lady duchess?—Yes; she came while I was there.

Did you live with the duchess before she came to Millbank?—I lived at another place with the duchess, but at Millbank, and at Drayton.

Do you know how Vaness left the duchess's service; and why?—Yes, upon complaints of disorders, and her ill dressing the victuals.

What disorders?—There were men came to the door to enquire for her, twice, or more.

Did you see the fellows?—Yes, I saw the fellows; they came to the door in the dusk of the evening, and I acquainted the duchess with it, and told her grace, I did not think it safe for her house, because I had the charge of silver spoons and forks.

What sort of men were they?—One of them appeared to be a foot-soldier in a blue coat.

In what manner was she put away or left the house?—Upon these complaints, the duchess said she would turn her away.

Did you hear the duchess say so?—Yes.

Was that before the trial at the Lords' House, or after?—To the best of my remembrance, it was before the trial, the latter end of December, or the beginning of January, but I cannot be positive; I think it was the latter end of December.

Did she go away before the trial, or not?—I think, before the trial, but I am not sure: Yes, at the time of the trial, I remember another cook.

Are you sure of that?—Yes, I am sure of it; it was the coachman's wife, one Gosling.

Do you know Hauseur or Nicola?—No.

You lived at Mill-bank two years; do you know no such man?—I never heard his name before; I had no acquaintance with him, nor ever saw him about house.

Cross-Examined.

Q. Where do you live now?—A. Near Huntingdon; I board in a house there.

How long have you been out of service?—Ever since I left my lady duchess.

How do you live then?—I board in a house; I follow no employment, but live on my own, except to teach children, two, three or four, out of charity.

When came you to the duchess's service first?—I served her about ten or twelve years ago; but I cannot remember the precise time, it is so long since.

How long did you live with her then?—I lived with her about half a year at Drayton in Northamptonshire; I went about November, and staid to Lady-day following.

How long was it before you came to live with her the last time?—I cannot tell.

You say you came to live with her about two years and a quarter; what time was that?—I cannot tell, but that may be easily found; I lived with her about six years ago, or thereabouts.

How long did you leave the duchess, after the hearing came on in this noble house?—I do not know; it was about a year and three quarters, or two years, I cannot be positive.

Was it after the trial began?—Yes, I think the trial began in January, and it was a year after it began.

Cannot you be positive what time you came to live with the duchess?—I came about August to Mill-bank, but the duchess was not come then; but the October following my lady duchess came.

Where did the duchess live then?—I do not know, I was at the lady Peterborough's; I helped her servants to carry things, and to get things ready.

Did you know where the duchess lived then?—No; some said she lived in Flanders, others in Holland, and some in France.

Was you never at Vauxhall while the duchess lived there?—I was never there while the duchess lived there, if she did live there.

Was you never there where she did live?—When nobody lived there I have seen the house where they said she did live.

How long ago is that?—I know not how long ago, but it was in the summer-time.

How came you to take notice of that house more than the rest of the houses in Vauxhall? Who was it told you the duchess lived there?

—I think it was one that was ——— You said the duchess went sometimes by water; did you go along with her at that time?—Yes, I did, with some other company.

Was you ever sent to the house, to fetch goods from thence?—No.

Who went with you, when you went with the duchess there?—One Mrs. Boufflers, and two or three other ladies.

Do you know sir John Germaine?—I never saw him but in his coach, as he was going along the street; I never saw him in any house, or any other place, sitting or going, but in his coach.

Was you never at his house?—I never was at his house, nor any place where he lived.

You say you were at the duchess's chamber to rub the room?—Yes, I was.

Did you not see Vanessa there?—No.

Can you take it upon your oath that you never saw her there?—No, I never saw her there; but I saw Susan Barrington there.

What service did Susan Barrington do there?—She helped to dress and undress her grace, and to mend linen, as I think.

When saw you her last?—It was about the 9th, 10th, or 11th of August last, at the George-inn in Huntingdon.

Do you know where she lived then?—She was at Huntingdon then, and came with the lady duchess to take a stage-coach for London; she was at the George-inn in Huntingdon, I think, about August last.

You say you lived at the duchess's house at Mill-bank, before the duchess came thither; did Vanessa come with her, or was she hired after?—I think she came with the duchess.

Do you know whence the duchess came, when she came there?—As I have heard, she came from Vauxhall: when my lady duchess went thither by water the summer after, I was told, that my lady lived at such a house in Vauxhall.

Did not you know that my lady duchess lived at Vaux-hall?—I never knew my lady duchess till she lived at Mill-bank.

What account had you at the duchess's house where she was then?—People said she was in Flanders.

Do you know when Vanessa came to live with the duchess?—I believe she came to live with the duchess at Mill-bank.

Do you know when she was discharged out of her service?—I think it was the latter end of December, or the beginning of January; I think so, but I don't speak positively.

Was you by when her wages were paid?—No.

Have you ever seen her since?—No, I never saw her from that hour to this.

Where have you lived since you left the lady duchess's service, and how? have you any estate?—I have a small matter to live on; I live near Huntingdon, I was born near there; it is my native place; I have lived there about four or five years, or within seven miles of that place, or thereabouts.

Did Vanessa dress the duchess's dinner, when she lived there; for it seems she was not good enough to serve you?—Yes, she did dress the duchess's dinner, but I did not care to eat victuals of her dressing.

When did you first complain to the duchess, that men followed Vanessa? or that you apprehended danger by her being there?—I cannot tell.

Was she discharged immediately after that?—I think she was discharged immediately after that.

You say there were some other ladies that went with the duchess to Vauxhall; can you name them?—Mrs. Marshal, and some others; but I cannot be positive.

Did you know Mrs. Brane?—No, I never heard her name before.

Did the duchess eat always at Peterborough house, or Mill-bank-house, as you call it?—Sometimes she eat abroad, and sometimes at home.

Who dressed her victuals when she eat at home?—Lera.

What do you mean by Mill-bank-house?—Peterborough-house.

Who did you hear say the duchess lived at that house at Vauxhall?—The duchess, that going by water, and told the ladies then, that that was the house she had lived at, at Vauxhall; and walking in the garden of the said house, told them so. JONAS PEACOCK.

FRANCES KNIGHT sworn, deponeth as followeth:

Q. How long have you lived in the duchess of Norfolk's family?—A. Twenty-seven years, or upwards.

With whom did you live all that time?—With the lady duchess's father, the lady Peterborough, and the duchess.

Did you live with the duchess when she lived at Mill-bank?—Yes, I lived with her at her first coming there.

Have you been with her ever since?—Yes.

Did you know Vaness in the duchess's family at Mill-bank, and what employ had she there?

—Yes, I know her very well; she was in the kitchen.

Did you use to be in the duchess's bed-chamber, and about her person?—Yes, I was the first in the morning there, and the last at night, constantly.

Did you know Eleanor Vaness there; and did she use to come into the duchess's chamber?—She never came there.

Where used she to employ herself?—In the kitchen.

Was she well enough in cloaths, cleanly enough, and fit to come into the duchess's chamber?—No, she was not.

What time went she away; and upon what account?—My lady put her away, because soldiers came and asked for her, and sent for her to ale-houses about ten o'clock at night. I went up one morning, and complained of her to my lady duchess, and told her that the soldiers haunted her, asked for her, and sent for her, to ale-houses at ten o'clock at night: and my lady duchess said, she would not keep a servant that kept ill hours.

Was this before the trial?—Yes; my lady put her away upon my speaking this.

Do you know why she was put away?—Yes, for having soldiers haunt her company.

Consider well what you say?—Yes, my lords; I speak what my conscience tells me: Here I am before the lords, I must speak truth.

How far can you recollect yourself, if it was before the trial, or not, that she was put away?—It was before the trial.

How long?—I cannot remember; I think it was about a quarter of a year; I cannot tell exactly, but it was near upon.

How near was you to the duchess? What was your employment?—I helped to get her to bed, as her chamber-maid.

Did Eleanor Vaness never undress her?—No, never in this world.

Did you never know her come into the duchess's chamber?—Never, never. Oh, fie! never indeed.

Do you know Nicholas Hosier?—I don't know him: there were many asked for Mr. Hosier, but I did not know them, for he has many acquaintance.

Did you know Thomas Hawkeworth, your fellow servant?—Yes, he came when my lady came to Mill-bank; Mr. Peacock came before; they were both servants together.

Frances Knight cross-examined.

You say you lived twenty-seven years and upwards with the duchess and her mother; do you live with the duchess still?—Yes.

How long is it since you lived with her mother?—After the duchess was married, I came to live with her and my lord duke.

Have you been in her service since?—Yes.

After the duke parted with my lady duchess, where did she go to live?—She lived at Mill-bank, and no where else that I know of.

Came you to live with her soon after her marriage? and have you lived with her ever since? and did she ever live at Vauxhall?—I never lived with her at Vauxhall.

Then you have not lived with her ever since?—I have lived with her ever since; I have taken my oath, and as near as I can tell you.

Where did the duchess live before she came to Mill-bank?—She lived at Vauxhall.

Did not you live with her there?—No, I broke my leg, and was brought to her mother's, and staid there a twelvemonth; Mr. Peters was my surgeon, he can tell it. I came here to speak the truth.

Do not be angry.—No.

Did you continue with the duchess till you broke your leg?—Yes, and when I broke my leg, I went home to her mother's.

When left you the duchess after she parted with my lord duke?—I left her at Mill-bank.

Do you know the question that is asked? When did you leave the duchess after she parted with the duke?—I know no such question as you ask. I speak the truth as well as I can.

Where did my lady duchess go, when you left her?—I went away lame, and could do her no service.

Where did you come to my lady duchess again, when you were well?—At Mill-bank.

Was you ever with her at Vauxhall?—I was not there, because I was lame.

Was you ever at Vauxhall?—I told you I broke my leg.

Was you ever at Vauxhall, or not?—I tell you I was lame.

Was you ever at Vauxhall at any time?—I tell you I was lame; I give you answer to your question. I tell these noble lords, that every word I speak is truth.

But you are sworn to speak the whole truth.—I speak the truth. Why should you do so?

Was you ever with the duchess at Vauxhall?—I was not able to be there with her.

Was you there with her, or not?—I was not able to go thither.

Was you never there?—I was not able to go thither.

Was you never there, or not, with the duchess?—No, I never was at Vauxhall in my life, but at Mill-bank and Whitehall I have.

[Memorandum in this interlineation was altered, upon reading over her examination. Yes, I have been there, but I did not stay there.]

Was you ever there with the duchess, or not?—I was not there: I tell you I was not there, I was lame.

Was you never there with the duchess at any time?—No, I tell you I was lame: I was never there with the duchess.

Where was the duchess before she came to Mill-bank?—That I cannot tell.

Where was she when you broke your leg?—I left her at Mill-bank with her mother.

Where did you find her, when you came again?—I found her at her mother's.

Cannot you tell where she was in the mean time?—No.

Was you never told by any of the family where she was at that time?—No.

Did Vaness come to the duchess when she lived at Mill-bank?—Yes.

How long did she live with her after?—I cannot tell; but a short time.

Do you know Susannah Barrington?—Yes.

When did you see her last?—About three weeks ago.

Is she not in the duchess's service still?—I will tell you the truth: she received a letter from Flanders, acquainting her that her mother was dead: she was very much afflicted with it: and when the duchess came in, I told her grace that Susan had received a letter that her mother was dead, and I did desire my lady to give her leave to go to Holland; and she is there.

Did you see the letter?—I saw it.

Was it from her mother, or from her sister?—Yes, it was from her sister, that her mother was dead.

Was Susanna Barrington in the duchess's service when this bill was depending?—No.

How long is it since you received that letter?—It is about three weeks ago.

How long is it since you went?—A fortnight to-day.

Did you see her any time these three weeks?—No, no.

Did you live with her in the house, and did you not see her?—She has been gone about a week.

Do you know Mrs. Judith?—No.

Do you know Mrs. Briane?—I have heard her name, but am not acquainted with her.

Had you any discourse with Vaness, when she came to Mill-bank to live with the duchess?—No, I never liked her discourse.

Did you ever hear the duchess say that she lived at Vauxhall?—No.

Do you know sir John Germaine?—I know him by sight.

Did you ever see him at the duchess's?—No.

Did you never see him at Mill-bank, or at her house here?—No, my lords, never.

Did Vaness come along with the duchess when she came to Mill-bank? or was she hired after her return?—She came after her return to Mill-bank.

What time went she away?—I cannot tell the day; that is a hard question. She went away, on my speaking to the duchess, that she was haunted with bad company.

Did not she dress the dinner when the duchess dined at home?—Yes; but she never dined at home but very seldom.

* Cannot you tell when Vaness went away?—No.

Did you know Nicholas Hosier?—No; I know no such man. There were many people came to Keemer, lord's servants and others; I do not know such people.

You have heard that the duchess lived at Vauxhall?—Yes.

At what time did she live there?—I cannot tell you; I was sick in bed.

You may recollect about what time was it. —I was lame in March, this month: I cannot tell what year.

Do you know what house she lived in?—Yes; it was one sir Thomas Grosvenor's, at Mill-bank.

I ask you what house she lived at at Vauxhall?—I know not.

How came you to know the duchess lived at Vauxhall?—You ask what I cannot tell you.

You dare not tell.—Yes, I will tell the truth before all the House of Lords.

You said she lived at Vauxhall?—No, I never said it.

Whence came the duchess, when she came to Mill-bank?—She came from the place she did; I did not ask her the question; I durst not be so bold.

Cannot you tell when she came to Mill-bank? nor from what place she came?—I cannot tell the day when she came. I do not ask from what place people come.

When did you know sir John Germaine first?—I saw him first with my lord duke there, at his house in the square.

Did you never know him keep company with the duchess?—No, but only with the duke of Norfolk there; I speak in the presence of God.

(Signed) FRANCES KNIGHT.

WILLIAM WHITE SWORN, depotheth as followeth:

Q. Did you live with the duchess of Norfolk for some years past?—A. I lived with her since the first week of the first trial, about six, or seven, or eight years ago.

What care was there taken about the duchess's door in the park?—I generally went out the first in the morning; the door had two bolts, a cross-bar, and an iron chain besides, these I unbolted every morning, and unbarred, when I went out early.

Did you ever hear or understand that Hosier had a key to that door?—I never knew any thing of it, nor know not of what use it could have been; for he could not come in: till the door was unbolted.

Say positively, whether ever you have heard, that this man had a key to that door?—I never heard of it.

Did you never see him come in at that door?—Yes.

How? Upon what occasion?—I happened to be going out myself, and to open the door for him. His business, I was told by my lady duchess's maid, was, that she had lent money to a man in Holland, and she wrote a letter to be carried by this man to her sister, to get this money; and she sent another letter by one Bull, to carry to Holland, to get the money, as she told me.

Did you let him in?—I unbolted the door, and let him in.

Did you find that this man used to come freely to the house, at that door, by any key?—No, I never knew it.

Who did he come to?—To Susan Barrington.

Did you ever see him above stairs with her?—No; he might come in, and I not see it.

Did the duchess or servants say any thing that he had leave to come in?—I never examined that, because any body that had business had leave to come in, as tradesmen, and others.

Did they tell you in the house, that Hosier was at liberty to come into the house with a key?—No, never.

Had you ever any discourse with Hosier?—I was one day coming from Change, and met Mr. L'Estrange and this Hosier. L'Estrange told me, that he was ill of the gripes. I told him, that the best thing for it was burnt claret; and he, and I, and Hosier went to a tavern in Smithfield: and while we were together, Hosier reflected upon his master, saying, his master had used him ill, and deserved to be ill used. Mr. L'Estrange heard these and some more words; Mr. L'Estrange told me, that he spoke to that purpose, he was resolved to be revenged of his master.

What did he say of his master?—He said his master had used him very ill; he had many threatening words; he said his master was an ill man, and deserved to be ill used, and the time would come when he should repent it.

When did he say these words?—It was about Michaelmas two years ago, or a year ago, I cannot tell which.

Cross-Examined.

Q. You say you lived with the duchess the first week of the first trial: was Vanessa there at that time?—A. She was gone before I came.

How long?—I cannot tell; I never saw her there, to the best of my remembrance, but have heard there was such a one in the family.

Did you know Hosier?—I see him come in at the back-door.

Whose servant was he then?—The first time I did not know; but a little after, I was told he was sir John Germaine's.

What occasion had he to come to the duchess's house?—I know not, but about the business of the letter.

How often did you see him there?—Two or three times, or more.

With whom?—With Susan Barrington.

What was his business with her? About the money, as she told me. He went along with that woman; she sent a letter by him; and she sent letters by some other Dutchmen into Holland, about the money.

Did he ask for any other servant?—Not that I know of.

Did you see him above stairs with her?—I never saw them in any apartment but that place below, where the lumber is, near the park-door.

Do you know Susannah Barrington?—I know her very well.

Do you know where she is now?—Her mother died about the 10th of January, and then I saw her all in tears; and she went away after this account of her mother's death.

When did you see her last?—I have not seen her this fortnight or month, that I know of, that I could distinguish her from another woman, except she had a mask on.

How long before this trial saw you her?—About a fortnight: she gave me an account that her mother died the 10th of January in Holland.

When did she go away?—I did not take notice of the time she went away.

Did you know Hosier at any other place but at the lady duchess's?—Never, but as I have seen him in the park, and with Mr. L'Estrange.

Was you never with him at sir John Germaine's?—Never.

Do you know sir John Germaine?—After I had lived with the duchess some time, I was told by some in the street, that that was his coach, and his livery, and that he was the man that there was so much noise about.

Did you never see him in the duchess's house?—I never saw him in no part of my lady duchess's house, nor in no apartment; and I am the only man that goes up and down stairs.

Did you never see him in the duchess's company at any other place?—No.

Did you constantly lie at the duchess's house?—When the duchess was last at Drayton, I lay at Richmond two or three nights.

Did you lie constantly there, when the duchess was there?—I was sick near a month, and all that time I lay at my wife's; but most commonly lay at the duchess's, since she is come to Duke-street to live.

You say, you used to open the door in the park first in a morning; what time did you use to open it at?—At six, seven, or eight o'clock in a morning; there was no certain hour; but I generally opened that door.

Did you ever know Hauseur come in at any other door but that?—Yes; one wet day he came in at the street-door, before the porter and all the servants, and asked for the same woman.

Did he never ask for any other body?—I never heard him ask for any but Susan Barrington, for she was his country-woman.

If Nicholas got in at the park-door, could not he get up stairs?—If he could get in at that door he talks of, he could not get into the duchess's apartment; for there was a room betwixt that, where the plate and jewels lay, that no key could open : that if he could get up two pair of stairs, he could not get in there.

If he had a key, and got in at any door, could not Susan Barrington, when he came in, without any difficulty, lead him round the house? —I cannot say but she might; but I never saw him, but below stairs with that woman, and then he went away without going up stairs.

Did you ever see him bring any thing to the house?—No.

You named one L'Estrange, that you saw with him at the tavern, what is he?—He was my old fellow-servant at the late duke of Norfolk's.

What discourse had you with him then?—He complained to me of his being ill, and I gave him the best of my advice.

What time was it that Nicholas had those threatening words against his master?—About ten, eleven, or twelve o'clock at noon.

How long ago is it?—I cannot tell if it be a year or two years, it was a little after Michaelmas; but whether it be one year, or two years, I cannot tell?

Could not Mr. L'Estrange tell?—I asked Mr. L'Estrange, and he could not tell.

Whose servant was Nicholas then?—He was nobody's servant then: he railed against his master at that time for turning him away.

Did you not know who was his master a year or two ago?—He told me he was out of place.

Did you not know him to be sir John Germaine's servant, when he came to the duchess's?—I did not know it when I first saw him and Susan together; but some time before he went away, I heard he was his servant.

But you say you did not know sir John Germaine about two years ago?—I did not know him so as to speak to him.

WILLIAM WHITE.

MATTHEW MAC-DONNELL sworn, deposeseth as followeth:

Q. How long have you lived with the duchess of Norfolk?—A. Four years at Lady-day next.

In what manner was the door going out to the park kept? Had any body a key to it that was not of the family? Did it use to be left open?—It was not to be left open; it was very unsafe to be left open; besides, it was bolted and locked.

Was there particular care taken of that door?—Yes; I myself bolted it very often at night.

Did you often unbolt it in a morning?—Yes. Whether or not, the time that you lived there, did you know any body, that was not of the family, come with a key to open that door?—Never.

Did you know Hansour, or Nicholas? Had he a key to that door?—I never knew it.

Did you ever see him come in at that door?—I opened that door for him once or twice when he rung.

When was that?—In an evening.

What did he come about?—I do not know; but he asked for Susan, my lady duchess's servant.

Did you ever see him go up stairs?—I never did hear he went up in my life.

When he asked for Susan, did he go up then?—No; I called her to him, and I never saw him go up stairs.

Did you stay with him all the while Susan was with him?—No, I had no business; I went my way.

Was Nicholas, when he rung, in the park, or at the inner door?—In the park.

Cross-Examined.

Did you know whose servant Nicholas was?—I did not know, nor I asked no questions.

How often have you seen him at the duchess's?—Three times.

Did he always ask for Susannah Barrington?—One time he asked for Mr. Keemer.

Who was Mr. Keemer?—He was the duchess's servant.

Did you use to stay with him? or, did you leave him?—No, to tell you the plain truth, I thought he came to court Susan, and did not stay with him.

Did you ever see him up stairs in Susan's room?—I never saw him there.

What employment have you under the duchess?—I am her footman.

When did you see Susan last?—On Tuesday se'n-night in the morning.

Not since?—No.

Where did you see her then?—At the duchess's house.

What became of her after that?—She said, her mother died lately in Holland, and she was going there.

When did you hear her say so?—I heard her say so several times before she went away; a month, or a quarter of a year, before she talked of going to Holland.

Upon your oath, do not you know that she is at the duchess's?—I know not of her being there.

Can you take it upon your oath when she was first wanting?—I saw her on Tuesday se'n-night last, in the morning.

How came you to know she was gone, if you do not know the time when she went?—I did not know she was gone, till I went home from the house here.

Who told you she was gone?—The servants.

She was there when you came hither?—On Tuesday morning I did see her.

Has the duchess another in her station?—There is one Mrs. Cambell, that dresses my lady duchess, but she does not live there.

Did she use, in Susan's time, to come and dress the duchess?—Yes, she used to come sometimes.

Has the duchess taken any body to do Susan's work?—I know not of any.

(Signed) MATTHEW + MAC-DONNELL.

Mr. ROBERT WELBOURN sworn, depose as followeth:

Q. What account can you give of Mr. L'Estrange's having notice to be a witness?—A. I was told by the duchess, That L'Estrange had been with her, and gave her an account of some particulars between White, and him; and Nicholas; that having the griping in the guts, they went into a tavern together; that he heard White and Nicholas talk together very loud, but he told me he had the gripes, and could not so well mind what he said; but he heard him use hard words against his master, but he could not remember that he said he would be revenged upon his master; but he would recollect himself, and, if he could remember, he would say what he could: he told me, he had been bred in the Norfolk family.

Did you ask Mr. L'Estrange about this matter?—Yes: Mr. L'Estrange told me, he remembered they were together, and heard Nicholas speak very hard, ill words against his master, but he could not be positive what they were; but what he could remember he would speak, if that would do the duchess any service. He desired my lady duchess would give him notice the night before, and he would appear.

When was this?—It was Tuesday or Wednesday; I think it was Wednesday.

Cross-Examined.

Q. Did the lady duchess tell you what Mr. L'Estrange said?—A. Yes; that gave me the occasion to speak of it. He said, he heard Nicholas say hard, ill words against his master, but not that he heard him say he would study to be revenged. Perhaps, says he, there might be some other words. That he was in the kitchen, and would endeavour to recollect who was there besides; and if he had two or three days time, he would enquire.

Did you let him know you was concerned for the duchess?—Yes; and he told me he would tell me what he could say in this matter; and he should be ready to appear at any time, if that would be for the duchess's advantage.

Did he tell you he was going abroad into Holland?—Not one word.

Did you intimate to him, when the duchess was to make her defence?—I think I did, but I cannot be positive; but he took no notice to me, that he would not be there.

Do you know Mr. La Fontaine?—Yes, I know one La Fontaine.

Is he in the duchess's service?—I believe not.

Do you know whether he is at Drayton?—I have seen him at Drayton.

Did he live with sir John Germaine, that you know of?—Never, that I know of.

When saw you Susan Barrington?—I cannot be positive; but I think, not this month or six weeks.

Have not you seen her since this bill was brought in?—Positively, I have not.

ROBERT WELBOURN.

ELIANOR MONFORT sworn, depose as followeth:

Q. Tell the Lord, if you know Nicholas Hosier, and on what account you came to know him.—A. This Nicholas lodged two or three times at my house. My husband was a Dutchman, and he was a Dutchman; they were like brothers, they loved one another.

What know you of this man, this Nicholas?—My husband told me, that this man Nicholas, (I did not know no other name he had;) my husband told me, that he had a design to rob his master, and that he knew where his gold and his jewels lay, and had made false keys, and would watch his opportunity when his master was at play, or out of town; and left the keys at her house.

Your husband told you so?—Yes, my husband bid me send for this man. These were his last dying words.

Your husband had a sad misfortune. When was it your husband told you so?—When he was in prison.

How long ago is that?—About eight or nine years ago last Christmas. I would not have your lordships think my husband was so bad a man; he was only condemned and executed for changing ten pounds of his own money.

What were your husband's last dying words?—He desired me to send for this fellow, and deliver those things he left at my house. I sent for him; he came, and had some keys in a drawer, that my husband told me he had left there. He took two or three keys, and put them in his pocket, and looked mightily out of countenance.

What did your husband say to you?—He bid me give Nicholas the keys, and bid him have a card, and keep good company.

When was that?—A week or a fortnight before my husband was executed.

Did you acquaint Nicholas with what your husband said of him?—No, and please your honours; I only told him, my husband charged me to give him those keys; but being in trouble, and having a great many enemies, I talked no further with him.

What did Nicholas say to you?—He looked out of countenance, and told me he would come and see me another time; but he never did; so that I did not see him again till I saw him in the Meuse, and then he told me that he would come to see me, but he never did, but always shunned me.

How long have you known Nicholas?—These eight or nine years. I knew him when he was footman to sir John Germaine, and I knew him when he was his gentleman. I knew him when he went, and I knew him when he came: he is like a sea-rat, he comes and goes when he pleases. I hope in God Almighty it will be considered by this House, that such a fellow's witness should not be taken in such a great concern.

(Signum) ELEANOR + MONFORT.

Then the duchess's counsel prayed that

McDonnell may be examined, as to the withdrawing witnesses, and that it be taken in writing: which was agreed to, and he examined.

Then the duchess's counsel proceeded to examine other witnesses, and their evidence taken in short-hand.

Then Mrs. Pitts being called for, and, not appearing, William Godfrey being sworn, said to this effect:

I went to serve Mrs. Pitts on Friday morning: when I came to her house there was nobody. A woman with a pitcher of water went in: I asked her for Mrs. Pitts; she said, she was not at home. I shewed her the order, and left a copy of it upon the table. She was loth to receive it; she said, the lady would be within quickly. The woman's name was Olivet. The last night I went again, and a woman came out and said, Mrs. Pitts was not at home. Then she spake in French to me: I did not understand her. I left a note for her to attend this day.

Then the duchess's counsel prayed, that some agreements between the duke and duchess, in 1694, may be read out of the deeds executed for that purpose: which was agreed to, and read accordingly.

March 5.

FRANCIS NEGUS sworn, deposeth as followeth:

Q. I desire Mr. Negus may be asked, whether the duchess of Norfolk did not send some message by him? The words I do not confine him to; but whether the message sent by him to my lord duke was not to this purpose; that notwithstanding the articles, she desired to know from his grace in what manner she should live; and that she would be governed by his directions?

A. I think it was much about the time of the transaction of these articles the duchess sent to me. Mr. Longueville was counsel for the duke, and sir Thomas Powys for the duchess. Mr. Longueville took what care he could; and when they came to talk of their living separately, I took it only to be an apprehension and fear that my lord duke would confine the duchess to some house. My lady duchess sent for me; I waited on her, and she expressed herself very sensibly of the misfortunes of the duke and herself, that such differences should have been between them; and she was desirous to let my lord duke know, and desired me that I would let my lord duke know it, that she would avoid all company that should give him any offence, and that she would not so much as pay a visit, but where he liked. I acquainted my lord duke with something to this purpose; for she often said to me, more than once or twice, that if she happened to die before my lord duke, she would leave him her estate; and I know I have said so to my lord duke.

Whether, from that time, do you know that the duke sent any message of complaint to the duchess, to the place where she lived, that he would have her live in any other way?—I know nothing of that matter.

Do you know whether my lord duke ever desired her to come and live with him?—I never heard of any such thing.

Did he ever send to her, to avoid any company?—I never heard of any such thing.

Whether had you any directions to attend the duke, that he would give way in a controversy between the duchess and a noble lord of this house, whether he would waive his privilege?—I have great reason to desire sir Thomas's favour in this matter; I know not what he aims at. I was called to the bar before, to speak the truth as to the matter of the privilege; I know not what he means by it.

I mean it only as an instance of a civil message between the duke and duchess, owing her as his wife, and that this was a message that bespoke a good understanding between them?—Will you have me to give an answer to sir Thomas, my lords? I confess, the duke did send for me, and asked me how the settlement and agreement were betwixt the duke and duchess, because of this matter of the privilege.

I did not mean that; but only as a late instance of the duke's owning the duchess so far?—When the duke sent for me, he would know, whether by the agreement he was obliged to let her have the privilege? I said, I understood it so; and though he had no mind to do it, but as he had waived his privilege, in the case of an uncle, he would do it for her.

What would have been the consequence, if the duke had not waived his privilege? Would not that have defended her from a suit?—That you may make use of as you please.

Sir Thomas Powys. I would only make this use of it, as an instance of kindness between the duke and duchess. FRANCIS NEGUS.

After the examination of Francis Negus, he being before sworn, the duchess's counsel declared they had finished their evidence.

Whereupon the duke's counsel desired to call a witness or two, to support Nicholas Hauseur's reputation. Then William Allen was sworn and examined.

WILLIAM ALLEN sworn, deposeth as followeth:

Q. Do you know Nicholas Hauseur?—

A. Yes.

How long have you known him?—Three years.

Did you not know him before that time?—I knew him about three years ago.

Had you any dealings before that time?—I had dealings with him when he lived with Mr. Germaine.

What were his dealings?—As honest and fair as any man could desire.

What office had he under Mr. Germaine?—He was cook to Mr. Germaine, I suppose.

What! was he cook to him?—He bought in the goods, and he paid me honestly for what he bought.

Cross-Examined.

Q. What trade are you?—A. A butcher.

Then he paid you his master's money for his master's goods?—Yes, he paid me very honestly.

When saw you him last?—I saw him when I was summoned here by the order of this house, but not before of late.

(Signed) WILLIAM ~~AD~~ ALLEN.

The duke's counsel moved for copies of the examinations and journals; which was granted, and the counsel withdrew. The following orders were made:

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That copies of the examinations, signed by the witnesses this day, and entry in the journal, be delivered to either side; and, that the examinations taken this day in short-hand be transcribed, in order to be read to the witnesses to-morrow.

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that to-morrow at twelve o'clock, this house will proceed to hear the examinations taken this day, read to the witnesses, relating to the duke and duchess of Norfolk, and all lords summoned to attend.

March 6.

After the examination taken yesterday, relating to the duke and duchess of Norfolk, were read to the witnesses, and they signing them, the duchess's counsel moved to have copies of the depositions taken on either side, and then withdrew.

March 5.

MATTHEW MAC-DONNEL, sworn, deposeth as followeth.

I was going to Mr. Strange's house, and I saw my lord Howard of Escrick coming that way, and he went to the door and knocked. I made up to the door, and a girl opened the door. My lord asked if Mr. Strange was within, and she answered, yes. Then I went to the door, and asked if Mr. Strange was at home; she answered, no, he went away on Thursday. I asked, by packet-boat, or how? She said, by long-sea. I thought she told my lord he was within, and so I came away.

(Signed) MATTHEW + MACDONNEL.

RICHARD MAY sworn, deposeth as followeth:

Q. Do you know Nicholas Hauseur?—A. I never saw him till Sunday fortnight last.

Where saw you him then?—At my lord duke of Norfolk's. I had a command from my lord duke to take him in there.

Where?—To lodge him in my lord duke's house: I am his household-steward; he commanded me to provide for him in the house.

I don't desire you should do any thing unbecoming to my lord duke; but you are upon your oath, and you must tell the truth?—I will freely tell what I know.

Can you give me any account where he was before that time?—I never saw nor heard of him till then.

Hath he been there ever since?—Yes; I made provision for him by his grace's command.

Do you know Vaness? Where hath she been?—On Sunday was fortnight she came thither likewise, and I was ordered to take care for her.

Where was she lodged?—In my lord duke's house in St. James's square.

Has she been there a fortnight?—Yes, a fortnight last Sunday, and coming here to attend the Lords.

Had she the liberty of the house, or was she kept close?—They were kept only as they desired themselves; nobody was denied liberty to see them: They desired to be there, sooner than any place.

Do you know that those people have been sent for, and how long before they came?—I was never privy to any thing of that nature: I had no knowledge of their names, nor whence they came.

Do you know of any money issued out for their coming over?—Not one penny.

Do you know of any reward they have had, or are to have?—I know not of any reward they have had, or are to have.

RICHARD MAY.

CHRISTOPHER RAINE sworn, deposeth as followeth:

Q. Are you servant to the duke of Norfolk?—A. Yes.

Do you know Hauseur?—I have seen him, but am not acquainted with him.

How long is it since you saw him?—It is within this fortnight.

Did you not see him at any time further off?—No, I am positive of it.

Where did you see him first?—In St. James's.

In what place there?—At his grace's house.

Hath he been there ever since?—Yes.

Was there a woman called Vaness with him?—Yes.

Did they come at the same time?—Yes.

How long ago?—A fortnight; it may be, not so much.

Had they the liberty of the house, to take notice where they were?—They had liberty to go where they pleased.

Did they go abroad since they came there?—I cannot tell; not to my knowledge.

Do you know whether they went out of the house upon any occasion?—Not to my knowledge.

Who brought them there?—I do not know.

Do you know whence they came?—No.

Did you understand where they lodged before?—No, I am a stranger to them both; I never saw them before.

Saw you them when they came first?—No, I was not at home.

CHRISTOPHER RAINE.

EDWARD COTTER sworn, deposeeth as followeth.

Q. Are you servant to the duke of Norfolk?
—A. Yes.

Do you know Nicholas Hauseur?—I did not know him but since this trial.

How long ago is that?—About a fortnight.

Do you know where he had been before?—No; I knew nothing of him, where he was, nor what he was.

Came Helena the Dutchwoman with him?—Yes, the woman came with him since the trial; I never saw them before.

Did you never know them go out of doors since they came, but to this house?—Never, no where else.

Who brought them to the duke's?—I know not.

Whence came they, do you know?—I cannot tell.

Did they never report in the house, whence they came?—No, I never heard where they lived, nor how they behaved themselves.

Do you know whether ever any reward was given them?—No.

I desire he may be asked, whether he has not known before, for some time past, within this fortnight or three weeks, more or less, meetings in Somerset house, in order to this trial?—The thing is this; I was one night at Somerset house with my lord duke, betwixt six and seven o'clock; but I cannot tell how long it is, whether it be three weeks or a month; it is no more, that I know.

What were you there about?—I went there with my lord duke.

Upon your oath, was there any thing then done there, relating to this trial?—Upon my oath, I did not know but it was concerning my lord Howard of Eserick.

Was he there with the duke?—Yes.

Did you know who they went to?—No.

Upon your oath, do not you know whether they went to Madam Pitts, or no?—They went to some house, but I do not know her name they went to.

Was there any body else there, but my lord duke, and my lord Howard?—God knows. My lord duke called me to the door, and sent me on a message; and I went and came again.

Who did you see there when you came again?—I saw none but my lord duke, and another that I did not know.

Who did you see go in?—None but my lord duke, and my lord Howard.

EDWARD COTTER.

FRANCIS HUDDLESTONE sworn, deposeeth as followeth:

Q. Upon your oath, do you know of any meetings relating to this trial, that hath been within some time past?—A. For meetings, I know not any thing of them.

Do you understand the question?—I know nothing of any meetings.

Have you not been at any place where any thing has been done, relating to this trial, against the duchess of Norfolk?—I do not understand any thing of the trial. I know nothing of the duchess of Norfolk.

Pray, give a positive answer: Have you not been present, or do you know of no meeting, relating to the proceedings against the duchess of Norfolk?—I never was at no meeting.

Who do you live with?—I live with my lord Howard.

Was you ever present at Somerset-house, where my lord Howard and others met?—I have been at Somerset-house, but know nothing of any concerns.

Do you know Vaness?—I know no such person.

Do you know Nicholas?—I do not know him.

Pray, answer positively; Do you know one Nicholas, called Hauseur?—I know several of that name, but I know not who you mean.

I mean one that lived with sir John Germaine.—I know him not; I never had any conversation with any body that lived with sir John Germaine.

(Nicholas called in.)

Q. Did you see any such man as appears here, at Somerset-house?—A. I know no such man as is called Nicholas Hauseur: I know several called Nicholas, but none of the Hauseurs.

Look upon this man; have you seen him before or not?—Yes; I have seen him twice or thrice; but I knew not who you meant before.

How long is it since you saw him first?—About a fortnight ago.

Have you not seen him, at Somerset-house?—Never.

Where did you see him?—In Gerrard-street.

Was that all the places you saw him at?—I saw him no where else.

Whose house did you see him at?—At captain Soames's lodging.

Did you not see a Dutchwoman there, one Helen Vaness?—There was a woman with him, I do not know her name.

Did you not see her at captain Soames's?—She was with this gentleman there.

Did you see her at no other time or place?—No.

Who else was there then?—Captain Soames, my lord Howard, and one or two more. I was but at the door. I have seen this man go in. I was but a footman waiting at the door. I knew not the others that were there.

Did you know no more that were there?—My lord Howard was in the house, but I know not if he were with them.

Did you ever see Helen Vaness before that time?—I have seen the woman since, but never saw her before.

Did you never see her any where else?—

Never any where else but at this house; going and coming.

(Signed,) FRANCIS H. HUDDLESTONE.

The counsel being withdrawn, the following orders were made: That copies of the examination, read to, and signed by the witnesses to-day, be delivered to either side. That this House will peremptorily proceed to hear the duke of Norfolk's and duchess of Norfolk's counsel, to sum up the evidence on both sides, on Friday next, and all the Lords summoned to attend.

The Evidence having been summed up, the Lords, after a long debate, and a division of the House, committed the bill, by a majority of sixteen.

Whereupon the duchess immediately preferred the Petition recited in the Order, March 8.

March 8.

Upon reading the Petition of Mary, duchess of Norfolk, shewing, that by the Bill now depending for dissolving the marriage between the duke of Norfolk and your Petitioner, her jointure and marriage-agreements are to be set aside, and other things in the Petition mentioned, and praying to be heard by her counsel, touching the several claims and interest, and several clauses in the Bill: It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the Petitioner shall be heard by her counsel to-morrow at eleven of the clock, at the Committee of the whole House, to whom the said Bill stands committed; at which time she is to produce her said marriage agreement and writings, as in the Petition is set forth: at which time the duke's counsel may be present, if he think fit. MATTH. JOHNSTON, Cl. Parl.

Upon which an Order was made for counsel to prepare a clause for the 10,000*l*.

The duchess's counsel having refused to join in drawing any clause, though they advised a Petition about the jointure and marriage agreement, the duke's prepared a clause, to which the Lords added a few words, and passed it as in the Bill. The Bill being sent down to the Commons, the duchess presented the following Petition:

To the Honourable the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled.

The HUMBLE PETITION of MARY,
Duchess of NORFOLK.

"Sheweth,

"That for putting an end to all differences between the duke of Norfolk, your Petitioner's husband, and your Petitioner, several articles of agreement were entered into, and executed in April 1694, by the said duke, your Petitioner, and your Petitioner's late father, the earl of Peterborough, whereby, and by deeds executed pursuant thereunto, the duke had his then desired advantage, and hath fully enjoyed the benefit thereof: That your Petitioner, about the time of perfecting the said deeds, signified to the said duke by Mr. Negus, that she should always readily comply with all such orders in her way of living and conversation, as he should think fit to appoint. Notwithstanding which, and without ever signifying any dissatisfaction to or with your Petitioner, and without any manner of notice, or previous proceeding in the common and ordinary course of justice, and to take from your Petitioner that legal trial in the ecclesiastical court, which by the laws of this realm (as she is advised) she is entitled unto, did, on the 16th of February last, exhibit a Bill in the House of Peers, intituled, 'An Act to dissolve the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the lady Mary Mordaunt, and to enable him to marry again.' Upon which the proceedings were so very quick, two witnesses lately brought from beyond the seas being forthwith examined against your Petitioner; and your Petitioner charged with facts supposed to be committed many years since, and long before the date of the said articles, could not be prepared to make her defence as she would have done, if the proceeding had been against her according to the known laws of the land. The places of abode of the witnesses produced against her being yet not known or discovered to your Petitioner: And your Petitioner having notice, that the said Bill is passed the House of Lords, and sent down for the concurrence of this honourable House,

"Your Petitioner prays she may be heard by her counsel at law and one civilian against the said Bill, before any proceedings be had thereon by this honourable House: and your Petitioner shall pray, &c. MARY NORFOLK."

A day being appointed by the House of Commons for the Committee to proceed, the duke caused the Papers following to be published.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK'S CASE;

WITH

REASONS FOR PASSING HIS BILL.

If want either of precedent for a parliamentary divorce, before going through the tedious and ineffectual methods of Doctors Commons, or of demonstration of fact, have hitherto deprived the duke of Norfolk of that relief against his wife's adultery, which the divine law allows; the late statute made in the like case, and the coming in of two, who, while the duke's former Bill was depending, had been sent away, to prevent that discovery which they now make; cannot but be thought to remove all objections against an act of parliament, not only for the benefit of the duke, but of the public, as a means to preserve the inheritance of so great an office and honours to persons of the true religion.

And since bishop Cozens's Argument, in the lord Rosse's Case, has made it evident, that those canons which govern the spiritual court in this matter, are but the remains of popery; nothing can be now requisite to satisfy the most scrupulous of the reformed religion, but to set the duke's proofs of his lady's adultery in a true light.

The reputation which the duchess had maintained, of wit and discretion, made it difficult for many to believe, that she could be surprized in the very act of adultery, as had been formerly proved. And though it then appeared, that one Henry Keemer lived with the duchess while she went by a feigned name, at a house hired for her at Vauxhall by sir John Germaine's brother; and that Nicola, who then lived with sir John, used to receive wood sent from the duchess to sir John's house by the Cockpit; the withdrawing of Nicola, and carrying with him the Dutch maid, equally entrusted with the secret on sir John's side; left no evidence of their constant conversation, but Keemer since dead, and Susannah Barrington, who had the like trust from the duchess.

Keemer, though very unwillingly, some years since confessed his living with the duchess at Vauxhall, where he pretended she was obliged to conceal herself for debt; and what share Susannah had in the secret was unknown, till Nicola appeared: Nicola coming into England some time since, in expectation of a service, expressed his readiness to discover what he knew, and to endeavour to bring with him the Dutch maid.

She proves, that for two months the first summer after the king came for England, sir John Germaine and the duchess lived together as man and wife, and were seen in bed together by her, Mr Briane, and his wife, sir John's sister; and that Nicholas Hauseur, sir John's valet de chambre, used to be assisting to him; as the duchess's woman, Susannah Barrington, was to her, at going to bed, and rising.

She proves the like conversation at Vauxhall, and the duchess's house at the Mill bank, till the duke's first bill for a divorce was depending; within which time, Nicholas Hauseur, by sir John's order, carried away her and Susannah Barrington, with intention of going for Holland, to prevent their being examined to what they knew; but the wind proving contrary, they could not go till the bill was rejected; and then sir John fetched back Susannah, who was most useful to the duchess; but Hauseur went for Holland with Ellen.

He confirms Ellen's evidence in every particular; and besides the persons mentioned by Ellen, as privy to sir John's lying with the duchess, names sir John's brother, Daniel. Nicholas having been found very trusty, his master sent for him to return to his service; and gave him the opportunity of proving the continuance of the same adulterous conversation, at several times and places, from the summer, 1692, to the 26th of April, 1696. He swears he had after his return to sir John's service seen them in bed together at sir John's house at the Cockpit, and at the duchess's house at Mill-bank, and where she now lives; and used to be let into the duchess's apartment by Susannah Barrington, or Keemer. Nor can any man who shall read the testimonials given Mr. Hauseur by sir John; by the last of which it appears, that he served him faithfully as his steward; reasonably question Hauseur's credit.

Another, who had been advanced by sir John from his footman to Mr. Hauseur's place, and from thence to a good office in the excise, very unwillingly confirmed the testimony of Hauseur and the Dutch maid, not only as to the time of their going from the service of sir John and the duchess; but though being no foreigner, he could not so easily be sent away to prevent discovery, and therefore was not let so far into the secret as Hauseur and the Dutch maid; yet he swears, the duchess used to come masked to his master's house; that he had gone with him as far as the Horse-ferry, towards her house at the Mill-bank; that then his master sometimes lay out all night, and the next morning he has carried linen and cloaths for his master to Keemer's house, or Keemer has fetched them from him: and this he proves to have been since the rejecting the former bill, and about five years since, when he was succeeded by Hauseur, as before he had succeeded Hauseur.

Two other foreigners, La Fountain, who lived with sir John, and was served with summons at the duchess's house at Drayton, and Hugonee, who ran away from the lord Haversham's since summons was taken out against him, seem to have had the same trust that Hauseur had; for both declared, That nothing should oblige them to betray their master's secrets; one said, No court could dispense with an oath of secrecy; and both declared, they would immediately go beyond sea. Summons have been taken out for Mr. Briane and his wife, and sir John Germaine's brother (who are, or lately were, in town) to confess or deny what Nicola and Ellen appeal to them for; and it cannot be imagined, that sir John should chuse the honour of being thought to have to do with a duchess, before the clearing her and himself from the imputation, by bringing his relations to disprove the charge, if what is sworn to, be within their knowledge is false.

And if sir John's vanity should prevail with him, at least it is to be presumed that his relations would be more just to him and the lady, than to suffer any thing to pass against them, which they could with truth and justice prevent.

But since none of them appear, the world will believe their absenting more than a thousand witnesses, in confirmation of what Mr. Hauseur, Ellen, and Bayly have sworn: whose evidence not only stands untouched by any thing offered by the duchess's witnesses, but is plainly confirmed by them in the principal parts.

This being the nature of the proofs, it is observable,

1. That there never yet was any case of this kind, where the evidence was not liable to greater objections than can be made to this.

Though in the latest case of this kind, there was full conviction of the lady's having children, while she lived separate from her husband, and the presumption was very visible whose the children were; yet this was but presumption, and that was weakened by the presumption in law that they were the husband's; especially, since there was no direct proof of the lover's ever lying with her.

2. Though in that case, by reason of the interval of parliament, and fear of the deaths of witnesses, a suit was begun in Doctors-Commons, it was taken from thence while the suit was depending; therefore that was rather an objection against proceeding in parliament, than an argument for it.

3. In that case, several witnesses were examined at the bars of both Houses, who had not been examined at Doctors-Commons, nor any notice given of their names before their examination.

4. It appears by that case, and the present, that the examinations in parliament are more solemn and certain than those of the spiritual court; which depend too much upon the honesty of the register, or his deputy.

5. Before that case, parliaments have either broken through the rules which bind the spiritual court, as in the case of the duke of Norfolk, Eliz. where the parliament ratified the marriage, as lawful according to God's law; though protracted and letted, by reason of certain decrees and canons of the Pope's law; or else have dissolved a marriage where there had been no application to Doctors-commons, as in the case of Mrs. Wharton, who had been married to Mr. Campbell; and yet there had been no examination of witnesses, but what had been before the two Houses. 2 & 3 W. & M.

So long before, in the case of sir Ralph Sadler, upon proof before the two houses, that lady Sadler's former husband had deserted her, and disappeared for four years before she married sir Ralph, the parliament legitimated her children by sir Ralph. 37 H. 8.

Whereas some object against the passing the bill, as if it would countenance a jurisdiction in the House of Lords to examine to such matters, in the first instance or originally; the objection would be the same if it had begun, as it might, in the House of Commons; but in truth would be of equal force against most private, and several public acts, occasioned by the examination of witnesses of notoriety of fact.

Since therefore the duke has so long, and so often in vain endeavoured to be freed from a lady, publicly famed and proved to have lived with sir John Germaine, as his wife; the duke's former disappointment cannot but be powerful arguments for his speedy obtaining that justice which the spiritual-court cannot give him, their power reaching no further than to that liberty of living as she list, some years since settled by articles: But as none of less art and oratory than her counsel, could have turned this into a licence to commit adultery, if she list, or a pardon afterwards: had there not been evidence of her acting according to such construction, the duke would have hoped she had repented of the former injuries he had received from her; but now hopes, she shall no longer continue to bear the name of his wife, and put him in danger of being succeeded by sir John Germaine's issue, or deprive him of the expectation of leaving his honours, offices, and estates to a Protestant heir.

BISHOP COZENS'S ARGUMENT,

PROVING, THAT ADULTERY WORKS A DISSOLUTION OF THE MARRIAGE.

Being the substance of several of bishop Cozens's speeches in the House of Lords, upon the Debate of the Lord Ross's Case.

—Taken from original papers writ in the Bishop's own hand.

The question is indefinitely to be spoken of, Whether a man being divorced from his wife, who hath committed adultery, and is convicted of it, may marry himself to another wife or no, during the life of her which is divorced?

The place in St. Matthew the 5th, repeated again St. Matthew the 19th, has great perspicuity: If it be not lawful for a man to put away his wife, and marry again, except it be in the case of fornication (for the displacing the words, by putting the exception before the marriage, cannot alter the sense), then contrario, it must of necessity follow, that if the wife be put away for fornication, the husband, by the tenour of Christ's words, is left free to marry again; which freedom is not allowed to the adulteress herself, nor any man else that shall marry her.

St. Mark and St. Luke have been opposed to St. Matthew; and it has been said, that Christ's words in St. Matthew did not properly belong to Christ's disciples, or the Christian church, as the words in St. Mark and St. Luke, which are absolute, do; which is a saying that neither I, nor, I think, nobody else ever heard of before: For Christ's sermon in the mount was spoken to his disciples, and especially belonged to Christians.

It is clear they are spoken to his disciples; for he says to them, that they are the salt of the earth, and the light of the world; and that they are blessed, 'when they suffer persecution for his name's sake;' which no man will say or apply to the Jews.

It is true, that in the 19th chapter of St. Matthew, Christ answers the Scribes and Pharisees, who came to tempt him with their question, 'Whether it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for any cause,' as they said Moses had permitted them to do. But the answer that Christ gave them, 'That it was not lawful, but only in the case of adultery, for men to put away their wives, and marry another; was a rule which concerned all Christians to observe for ever after; and for that reason was recorded by St. Matthew.

The words in St. Mark and St. Luke are not to be taken absolutely, but to be supplied and understood by his words in St. Matthew, as in many other cases is clear; viz. the thief upon the cross, baptism in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, &c. whereof many instances may be brought, as the destruction of Nineveh, &c.

But for Christ's words, the exception confirms the rule, and infers a concession, that in the case of fornication, the putting away one wife, and marrying another is allowed. It is alike with divers other his exceptions, which are found in Scripture: For brevity, I will instance in this one, viz. 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Upon which text, if I or any bishop else were to preach, I believe we should not discharge our duty, unless we should tell the people, That if by the grace of God they did repent, they should not perish.

The exception here, si non nisi, unless, is parallel with the 1 Kings, iii. 18. 'None were in the house except we twain;' they two therefore were, others were not.

Such exceptions proceeding from natural equity, are tacitly implied in laws, though pronounced in general terms.

But as to the exception here, the words are not capable of any other sense, than as I have observed; for except that restraint be referred to marrying again, the sense would run thus, Whosoever puts away his wife commits adultery: which stands not with truth or reason; since it is not the dismissal that is adulterous, but the marriage of another. It is therefore the plain drift of our Saviour to teach the Pharisees, that the marriage of a second wife, after a dismissal of a former, upon any other cause, except for fornication, is no less than adultery; thereby inferring, that upon a just dismissal for fornication, a second marriage cannot be branded with adultery.

Besides, the Pharisee's question [Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?] was not without a plain implication of liberty to marry another; which our Saviour well knowing, gives a full answer, as well to what he meant, as what he said; which had not been perfectly satisfactory, if he had only determined that one part concerning dismissal, and not the other concerning marriage; which clause if two evangelists express not, yet it must be fetched necessarily from the third; since it is a sure and irrefragable rule, that all four Evangelists make up one perfect gospel.

The Rhemists and college of Doway urge for the Popish doctrine, Rom. vii. 2. The woman which hath an husband, is bound by the law to her husband as long as he liveth; but,

1. This place is to be expounded by Christ's words.

2. St. Paul hath no occasion here to speak of divorce, but of marriage whole and sound, as it stands by God's ordinance.

3. He speaks of a woman who is under her husband; so is not she that is divorced from him.

4. St. Paul useth this to his purpose of the law being dead, to which we are not bound.

5. Nor is their doctrine more favoured by 1 Cor.

vii. 10. 'Let not the woman depart;' as being in her choice whether she would depart or not; but in the case of fornication she was to depart, or rather be put away, whether she would or not.

The bond of marriage is to be enquired into, what it properly is. Being a conjugal promise solemnly made between a man and his wife, that each of them will live together according to God's holy ordinance, notwithstanding poverty or infirmity, or such other things as may happen during their lives; separation from bed and board, which is part of their promise so to live together, doth plainly break that part of the bond whereby they are tied to live together both as to bed and board. The distinction betwixt bed and board and the bond, is new, never mentioned in the scripture, and unknown to the ancient church; devised only by the canonists and schoolmen in the Latin church (for the Greek church knows it not) to serve the pope's turn the better, till he got it established in the council of Trent; at which time, and never before, he laid his anathema upon all them that were of another mind; forbidding all men to marry, and not to make any use of Christ's concession.

Bed and board, or cohabitation, belong to the essence and substance of matrimony; which made Erasmus and bishop Hall say, that the distinction of those two from the bond is merely chimerical and faney.

The promise of constancy and mutual forbearance, if it hinders divorce as to the bond, hinders it also as to bed and board; and because the same bed and the same table were promised in the marriage contract; but the promise does not extend even to tolerating adultery, or malicious desertion; which, according to God's ordinance, dissolves the marriage.

Our Saviour speaks of divorces instituted by the Mosaic law; but they were, no other than divorces from the bond.

6. The form of the bill of divorce among the Jews was this. Be expelled from me, and free for any body else. To give the bill of divorce, is from the Hebrew root kar, which is to break, or cut off the marriage. With this agree the ancient canons, councils, and fathers of the church.

Concil. Neocæsar. & Elib. forbid the retaining an adulterous wife. Concil. Elib. Aurelian. & Arelatens. give liberty in such case to marry again. Clemens's Constitution, Tertullian, St. Basil in his canons, approved by a general council, are for marrying again. Concil. Venet. If they marry in any other case than fornication, they are to be excommunicated.

cated, and not otherwise. Concil. Wormat. gives liberty to the innocent party to marry after divorce. Concil. Lateran. gives leave for the innocent party after a year to marry again.

Concil. Lateran. If any one take another wife while a suit is depending, and afterwards there be a divorce between him and the first, he may remain with the second.

Lactantius, St. Hierom and Epiphanius, are for allowance of marriage after divorce. Chrysostom, Hom. 19. 1 Cor. 7. says, That the marriage is dissolved by adultery; and that the husband, after he hath put her away, is no longer her husband.

Theophylact on the 16th of St. Luke says, that St. Luke must be interpreted by St. Matthew. St. Hilary is for marrying again, as Dr. Fulk saith upon St. Matthew the 7th. The eastern bishops, in the council of Florence, are for marrying again: Justin Martyr speaks of a woman giving a bill of divorce to a dissolved husband, without finding any fault with it.

St. Ambrose says, a man may marry again, if he puts away an adulterous wife. Theodoret said of a wife who violated the laws of marriage, therefore our Lord requires the bond or tie of marriage to be dissolved.

All the Greek church to this day allow it. Erasmus, Cajetan, and other papists: The civil law, and the laws of the emperor are clear for it: and the constitutions of our own church of England, in the time of H. 8. Ed. 6. and queen Eliz.

The practice of the English church, in the stat. 1 Jac. c. 11. against second marriages, divorces are excepted; and in Canon 107. it is provided they shall not marry again; but it is not said such marriages are void, only the caution is forfeited: Neither doth the Canon speak of such separations, wherein the bond is broken, as it is by fornication.

Even the Canon-law allows marrying again, in case a woman seeks her husband's life, and in case of a bond-woman. Gratian says, in the case of adultery, lawful marriages ought not to be denied. In the case of an incurable leprosy, it was the advice of St. Gregory to Austin the monk, that he that could not contain, should rather marry. Bellarmine owns, that the bond of the marriage of infidels is dissolvable; but the marriage of the faithful, and of infidels, is of the same nature: and Justinian a jesuit, confesses, that it is simply lawful for the innocent party to marry again. And the Roman doctors allow a dissolution of the bond of marriage, if the parties should, after consummation, transfer themselves into a friary or nunnery.

The Canons* which, in the case of adultery, prohibit marrying in the life-time of the guilty person, are contrary to two acts of parliament made 25 Hen. 8. and 3 and 4 Edw. 6. wherein no canons are allowed that be any way repugnant to the laws of God, or the Scripture, the king's prerogative royal, and the statutes of this land: thirty two persons were to review the canon-law; in which review, drawn up by archbishop Cranmer, the innocent person is permitted to marry again, according to Christ's law and concession.

We have examples of such marriages in H. 4. of France, and H. 8. of England, lord Mountjoy, lord Rich, bishop Thornborough, and divers others. And it is observable, that in the case of the marquis of Northampton, 5 Edw. 6. who had been divorced for his lady's adultery, and married another before any act of parliament made concerning it, an act which passed afterwards (only two spiritual and two temporal lords dissenting) declares, he had been at liberty by the laws of God to marry, and did lawfully marry another: where the act manifestly supposes, that whatever had obtained for law till that time, was void, as being contrary to God's law.

The most considerable men of the reformed churches, both at home and abroad, are of this opinion: Grotius quotes Tertullian, in whose time it was lawful for the innocent party to marry.

Lancelot. Instit. Jur. Can. acknowledges, that divorce is a dissolution of the marriage.

Selden, who is not likely to contradict the laws of this kingdom, maintaineth, that marriage after divorce is to be allowed; and in that particular Dr. Hammond doth not contradict him; but is clearly for it.

The opinion of Anesius deserves to be set down at large: "Marriage, says he, cannot be dissolved by men at their pleasure; and for that reason, as it is considered simply and absolutely, it is rightly said to be indissoluble, because marriage is not only a civil, but a divine conjunction; and is also of that nature, that it can, not be dissolved without detriment of either party: yet it is not so dissolvable, but it may be dissolved for a cause which God approves as just; for the indissolvability was not instituted for a punishment, but for the comfort of innocent persons; and it admits an exception, wherein God ceases to conjoin. By adultery two are made not to remain one flesh: Hence it is that a contagious disease is not a cause of dissolving marriage. By adultery the very essence of the contract is directly violated; but the contract ceasing, the bond depending on the contract necessarily ceases. It is against all reason, that all matrimonial duties should be for ever taken away, yet the bond or obligation to those duties should continue. The words of our Lord, Mat. v. 32. and xix. 9. have no distinction or limitation of the putting away, but simply and absolutely approve of putting away, therefore they approve of putting away, not partial, or to a particular purpose, from bed and board, but total."

None are against the reformed divines, but Dr. Howson, Mr. Ranny, and Dr. Prideaux. Dr. Howson was a professed adversary to

* Ref. Leg. Eccles. Tit. de Adulteris et Divortii.

Dr. Raynolds, who was a great maintainer of the church of England against all the points of popery, and particularly in this:

Dr. Taylor, bishop Hall, Dr. Fulke are for second marriages; no authors against them but the council of Trent, and those of the church of Rome; whose credit is only saved by those of our church who agree with them.

Upon the difference of explication between St. Ambrose, Origen, and St. Austin, a new kind of divorce has been thought of, from bed and board; but this divorce, or name of a divorce, was unknown to the Jews and ancient Christians.

I said so much before, at the first and second reading of this bill, that I was in good hopes to have had no further occasion given me of answering any objections against it now; but seeing divers new arguments have been studied and framed against it since that time, I shall now endeavour to satisfy and clear them all.

1. The first argument against it, is, that the separation from bed and board doth not dissolve the bond of marriage. To which I must reply, as I did before, that this is a distinction without a difference, newly invented by the Canonists and school-men, and never heard of either in the Old or New Testament, nor in the times of the ancient fathers, who accounted the separation from bed and board to be the dissolution of the bond itself.

2. That first institution of marriage, that they may be one flesh, is by adultery dissolved, when the adulteress makes herself one flesh with another man, and thereby dissolves the first bond of her marriage.

3. The objection, that if the bond be dissolved, and afterwards, if the man or woman be reconciled, they must be married over again, is no necessary consequence, no more than it is in a person baptized, who may break his covenant, and renounce his baptism, and yet upon true repentance be received into God's favour by virtue of the first covenant, without any new baptism. Suppose a witch, who, they say, makes a compact with the devil to renounce her baptism, should afterwards, by the grace of God, seriously and truly repent herself of the wickedness; I do not believe that any body would take upon him to baptize her again: And if a priest should renounce his orders, and turn Turk, and yet afterwards repent him, and return into the church, he need not be re-ordained a second time. The case will be the same in marriage.

4. I said heretofore, that the Roman doctors allowed this dissolution of the bond, when the man and wife, even after the consummation of marriage, would transfer themselves into a friary or a nunnery; but because it hath been since doubted, that no authority can be shewed for this particular, I shall here shew it out of the old constitutions of the church of England.

"And,* in the case of religion, that is the true understanding, that to wit, either of them betaking themselves to religion before carnal knowledge, the bond of marriage be dissolved: But if both enter into religion, and make solemn profession, then such marriage is dissolved, even as to the bond."

* Prov. Will. Lyndewode, sive Const. Ang. fol. 94. Ver. nulla tenus separantur.

5. It hath also been said, that if the bill pass, it will pass against the church of England; which, I confess, I do not understand; for the church of England is within the kingdom of England; and if the laws of this kingdom be for the bill, and have declared it by the assent of the king, lords and commons, as in the case of the marquis of Northampton was heretofore declared, in the time of king Edward the 6th, that by the laws of God the innocent party was at liberty to marry again; certainly the spiritual lords, as well as the temporal and commons, are bound to admit it: And I know not why they should be called the church of England that join with the council of Trent, and plead so much to uphold it, rather than others, that join with all the reformed churches, and plead against the canon of the church of Rome, which hath laid an anathema upon us, if we do not agree with them.

As to the supposed inconveniences that will follow upon marrying again:

1. More inconveniences will follow if they be forbidden to marry again.

2. The father would be in an uncertainty of the children, if they should retain the adulteress.

3. There would be danger of poisoning or killing one another, if no second marriage were allowed.

4. Where the parties should consent to new marriages for their own lusts, the magistrates have power to overrule such practices.

5. If they be kept altogether by divorce from marrying, it would occasion the innocent party to sin.

A little before the main question about passing the duke's bill, the duchess's agents handed about this paper, among such as they thought to be her friends:

THE

CASE OF MARY DUCHESS OF NORFOLK.

Upon the marriage of the duchess with the now duke of Norfolk, in the year 1677, her father, the late earl of Peterborough, paid as part of her portion 10,000*l* and settled on that marriage lands of near 1,000*l*. per annum, the remainder of which, on failure of issue, was limited to the now duke and his heirs for ever; and the earl after his and his lady's death, secured to the duke the forfeiture of Drayton, worth 10,000*l*. more; and the duke received also, by agreement, 1,000*l*. per annum for twenty years out of the earl's estate, besides very rich jewels, plate, and other things of great value, which the duchess brought with her into the duke's family: And great debts having been contracted for the support of the duke's honour and his service, while he cohabited with the duchess, she hath, since his separation from her, paid them out of her own estate.

That by the evil and malicious insinuations of the duchess's enemies, the duke was prevailed on to carry her, then a Protestant, into France, and put her into a monastery (where she could not be admitted without changing her religion,) and left her there, on great assurances of sending for her home in a short time; and so parted with great expressions of kindness.

That a considerable time after, by the duke's consent, she returned into England, and lived retiredly at Drayton in Northamptonshire; and at the time of the revolution she again retired to France, where she continued till she heard of her father's imprisonment in the Tower, and then came back to England, and lived privately, till her father obtained his liberty, when she came home to him.

That the 8th of January, 1691, the duke was prevailed on, by the instigation of her enemies, to exhibit a bill in the House of Peers, to the same effect with the bill now depending, and divers witnesses were examined on both sides; after which, and a long solemn debate and due consideration had by their lordships of the witnesses, and what was sworn by them, the 17th of February, they were pleased to reject the bill without a second reading.

Notwithstanding which, the duke was again prevailed on, the 22d of December, 1692, to exhibit a second bill in the House of Peers, to the same effect with his first; which, after several debates, was the 2d of January following again rejected.

Some time after this, and for accommodating all differences between them, proposals were made to the duchess, which, after long agitation, on the 28th of April, 1694, were reduced into writing, and executed by the duke and duchess; the preamble of which articles is in the words following: "Whereas diverse controversies, debates, demands, and suits of several natures have for some time since been agitated, and continued, between the said duke and the said duchess, his wife, &c. unto all which it is at last held fitting (it being conducive to their respective quiet and ease) to have an end put, and the like for the future prevented: It is therefore hereby, and by the parties to these presents, declared and agreed in manner following; whereby the duchess conveyed to the duke's use the manor of Castle Rising," &c. And also the said duchess and her trustees assigned their interest in a considerable part of the manor of Sheffield in Yorkshire to the use of the said duke; so that by these articles, and that deed executed thereupon, the duke had his then desired advantages.

That after the execution of these articles, the duchess sent for one Mr. Negus, the duke's principal gentleman, and expressed herself very sensible of the misfortune of the duke and herself, and desired Mr. Negus to tell the duke, that she would avoid all company that should give him any offence; and that she would not so much as pay a visit, but where he liked: which Mr. Negus lately testified before the Lords, and that he acquainted the duke with it; as also, that she had several times told him; if she died first, she would leave the duke her estate.

That notwithstanding the said agreement, whereby the duke and duchess agreed to live separately, yet without his signifying any dissatisfaction to or with the duchess, and without any manner of notice, or previous proceeding in the common and ordinary course of justice, but by taking from her that legal trial in the ecclesiastical court, which by the laws of this realm she is entitled unto, he did, on the 16th day of February last, exhibit in the House of Peers the bill now depending for dissolving the duke's marriage with the duchess, and for enabling him to marry again: upon which the proceedings were so very quick, two foreigners (a French footman, and a Dutch cookmaid) lately brought from beyond sea, being forthwith examined against her, charging her with facts supposed to be committed many years since, and long before the date of the said agreement, and on which the two former bills were founded, that it was impossible for her to make her defence, as she might have done if the proceedings had been against her according to the known laws of this land.

The duchess thought herself under a necessity of complying with all the orders of the House of Peers; and accordingly, as well as she could, made her defence, though less than a week's time was allowed her for doing it; and upon examining the evidence of the duke's witnesses, many contradictions appeared, some whereof follow, as doth appear by the depositions taken in writing, and now remaining in the House of Peers.

For Hauseur the footman swears, the duchess was at the Cockpit, when, and before he came to live with sir John Germaine; and, that he continued there 15 days after; and that after the duchess left the Cockpit she went to Vauxhall.

Vaness the cookmaid swears, Hauseur came to sir John when the duchess was at Vauxhall.

Hauseur swears, That the 8th of February, 1692, he left sir John's service, when the trial was between the duke and duchess in parliament, and after lived privately six or eight weeks, till he and Vaness could get for Holland, and arrived there in the Easter following.

And yet in another place he swore, he desired leave to go; and afterwards, that he also went for Holland as soon as the wind was fair.

But note, all the evidence was closed and ordered to be summed up the ninth of February; so that he needed not afterwards to have gone. And whereas he insinuates, That he and Vaness were secreted, and kept from being witnesses:

Note, It doth no where appear; that either he or Vaness were ever thought on for witnesses.

Hauseur swears. He returned again to sir John in summer 1692, being often sent to by sir John.

Whereas Bayly, another of the duke's witnesses, swears, he did not return again to sir John in two years after he went away, Bayly the witness being all that time, and three years before, a servant in the house.

Note also, That this very summer, 1692, to wit, in Easter term, the duke brought his action against sir John, which was tried Michaelmas term 1692; at which time it had been more likely, if sir John had believed he could have done him any harm, he should have kept him in Holland, rather than have sent for him over, especially considering that this fellow afterwards swears sir John swore in a rage this fellow would betray him.

Hauseur being asked, who sent for Vaness over?

He answered; that after he had promised the duke and lord Howard to speak the truth of what he knew, they desired him, if he met Vaness, to desire her to come over, and speak the truth of what she knew.

And being asked, how long after he met Vaness? answered, about twelve months since.

And being asked, when was the first time he spoke to her about coming over to speak the truth? answered, it is about a year since.

And being asked, how long it was since they resolved to come over? answered, twelve months.

Vaness being asked, whether she was not sent for from Holland to be a witness? answered, she knew nothing of it till eight or nine weeks ago.

Vaness swears, she was sent away on account of the trial.

Whereas Peacock, Hawksworth and Knight, three servants of the duchess's, swore the duchess turned her away before the trial, for keeping company with Dutch soldiers; and they do swear a new cookmaid before the trial.

Hauseur swears, he had a key of the door going into the Park, and could come in when he would.

And yet owns he knew but two of the servants, one whereof is long since dead.

And also the duchess's servants swear, they never heard any body had a key; and that if any key had been, they must have known of it. They also prove the shutting up, bolting, and chaining the door every night, and opening it every morning; and but one of the servants remembers ever to have seen him at the door, and then he rung the bell; but came only to see a country woman of his, and to carry letters to Holland, and brought answer back to her, but was not admitted beyond the passage.

Hauseur and Vaness swear, they saw the duchess and sir John in bed together at Millbank.

The duchess's woman swore, she has put the duchess to bed, and taken her up every night and morning several years, and never saw him in the house. And two others swear, they were constantly in waiting night and morning, and positively deny any knowledge of any such thing, and say, they never saw Hauseur there; and that Vaness was never admitted up stairs, she was so dirty a creature; much less to dress or undress the duchess, as she pretended often to have done.

Vaness swears, she could not tell the places she has been, at those six weeks last past. Whereas,

Mr. May, and two other of the duke's servants, swear, she has been fourteen days in the duke's own house, with the full liberty of the house.

Vaness being asked, whether she ever told any body of the occasion of her going away? she swore, yes, she told it to a great many in Holland, and not here.

Yet being afterwards asked, whether she ever discovered that she was sent out of the way? she swore directly, no.

These are some of the many plain contradictions and disproofs of these evidences, besides the great improbability in their own nature, in several things sworn.

But it is also to be noted, that Hauseur left sir John's service in a disgust; and so it is proved by Bayly, another of the duke's witnesses, and that what Hauseur swore could be nothing but spite and malice: Yea, it is proved on the duchess's part, that he swore he would find a way to be revenged of him, and that perhaps it might not be long first: and Mr. Strange, Mrs. Pitts, and her two maids, who could have deposed very materially for the duchess, refused to appear, though often summoned, being persons not in the duchess's interest or power.

This Hauseur has been out of place ever since he left sir John's service, April 96, and is so still, as he swears, and so in consequence likely to be necessitous.

Note also, that Hauseur swears, sir John gave him seven guineas to pay the charges of himself, Vaness, and another, which were ordered to be kept private till they could be shipped off, and also for their passage into Holland, which was in time from the 8th of February, 92, till Easter.

Which does not look like a bribe for a secret of this nature, being hardly sufficient to maintain three people, and pay their lodgings, for two months.

Hauseur would be thought a mighty confident, so as to have a key to the duchess's house, to come in and go out when he pleased, and yet, as well acquainted as he pretended to be with the house, and the duchess's bed chamber, he could not tell on what floor it was, nor what furniture it had, nor whether wainscoted or hang'd. And when he was asked, which way the windows of the bed chamber looked? he trifled in that question, and concluded, he could see the water, but was afraid to go near the window, for fear of being discovered; and yet had no scruple of coming into the house with his key, at any time.

These things being observed, it must be considered, that the facts now in effect charged against the duchess are suggested to be done many years since, and were debated and considered before the peers, before the rejection of the two first bills, and long before the agreement for putting an end to all controversies ~~and~~ debated. Now it is very hard to put the duchess to account again for those very facts, considering, that after eight or nine years many people are dead, others dispersed, and not in a little time to be found out, and circumstances of times and places (which in the nature of all these cases is almost all that is left to discover a falsity) forgot.

The duchess is also under the unavoidable necessity of proving a negative against downright swearing, and that without any matter introductory; and also by two mean servants, the one turned out of her place for keeping company with foot soldiers, and the other leaving his place in disgust, because he could not have the play money.

Masters are already too much in the power of their servants: and if they charge their masters with adultery, felony, and even treason, it is not easily in the power of the master to defend himself against downright swearing; servants having those opportunities of the knowledge of times, and places, and company, which cannot be denied or avoided, and which others have not; whereupon they may frame and build false evidence, and many times are of ill principles and desperate fortunes, and of tempers very revengeful; so that whoever turns away a servant, he is in his power for his estate, honour, and even life itself; and therefore, for the safety and freedom of families, in other countries, they are not permitted to be evidence against their masters, in any matter criminal whatsoever.

Note also, that the duchess thinks she, as an English subject, has, by Magna Charta, the same right to a trial in the legal and ordinary way of justice, as the rest of the king's subjects, especially considering that there never yet was in England one precedent of a bill exhibited in parliament to dissolve a marriage at the first instance, without any previous proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts, (which in these cases is the law of the land) and not above five or six bills in above 600 years ever passed to dissolve marriages, or make second marriages good, even after there had been a divorce in the spiritual courts, and those bills too in cases generally where the husbands were without any recrimination.

No impediment appears why the duke should not have endeavoured a divorce at law before he had attempted a bill to dissolve the marriage; for any application to the legislature for trial of matters of private right is improper, because there are proper judicatures that give that remedy the law allows.

To ask any thing of the legislature, in private causes between party and party, beyond what the known laws in force give, seems to be improper; because,

1. It is to make a law in one person's case, which is not the law in another's.

2. It is to retrospect actions, and after the fact, to augment or alter the penalty. Our laws are certain and known, that persons may conform their actions to them.

3. The courts and forms of law are equally the subjects right with the law, and the application to the legislature takes away all that right of form and charging; whereas a certainty in time to answer, and exceptions to witnesses, and other legal defences of the fact, cannot be denied the meanest subject.

The consequence that short and summary ways of proceedings may have on the settlements of estates and families, may be very dangerous; and though the duke of Norfolk's bill passed the House of Peers, yet a great number of the Peers both spiritual and temporal, entered their protest against its passing, and their reasons for it.

It ought to be no prejudice to the duchess, that the next heir presumptive to the duke doth not yet appear to be a Protestant; because when a bill, which hath lately passed both Houses, is become a law, it is not likely that noble family will be without a Protestant at the head of it.

If any of the witnesses formerly examined on the bill in 1699, be now again produced, it is humbly apprehended, that as the validity of their testimony they then gave was totally overthrown by a greater number of witnesses, so it will be again, though under the disadvantage of the great distance of time.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

March 19, 1700.

The reading the bill, for dissolving the marriage of the duke of Norfolk, the second time, and hearing counsel as well on the behalf of the duchess against the bill, as on behalf of the duke for the bill, being the order of the day, before the counsel was called in, to prevent the inconvenience of people crowding into the House, the House made an order, "That none but the counsel, solicitors, and parties should be called in, and that the witnesses should have notice to attend without, ready to be called in, if the House should think fit.

It was also intimated, That if the duke and duchess did think fit to come into the House, they should be accommodated with chairs, that being a respect shewed to the nobility when they come into the House.

And then the counsel, and solicitors, and parties of both sides were called in: and first the bill was read to them.

And then the lady duchess's Petition was read.

The counsel that appeared were, sir Thomas

Powys, Mr. Dodd, Dr. Pinfold, for the duchess. Mr. Serj. Wright, Mr. Northey, Mr. Atwood, Dr. Oldish, for the duke.

And Mr. Speaker then spake to this effect :

Mr. Speaker. You are here, I see, counsel on both sides. The House have ordered, that my lady duchess should be heard according to the prayer of her petition ; and my lord duke had likewise an order to be heard to make good his bill. I think the petitioner is to be heard first, to make good the allegations of her petition ; and when the House have heard you both, as to that, they will consider whether they will proceed to hear the allegations of the bill made out.

Sir Thomas Powys. Mr. Speaker ; with your favour, Sir, I am of counsel with the petitioner, the duchess of Norfolk, against this bill that is now before you ; and I believe I may say with some assurance, that this bill in the manner it is now brought before you, is the first that ever was attempted in this honourable House. It is Sir, true, that several years ago this bill, or another of the same nature, was attempted twice in the other House, and as often rejected ; but it is as true, at last it does come from thence hither, but not without a protestation there ; and I humbly hope that you will take notice, that this is a bill of divorce in parliament, in the first instance without a previous prosecution to examine the fact in any of the ordinary courts that have authority in those matters.

It is a bill not only to divorce the duchess upon a very short warning, who hath begun a wife twenty-three years, but to render her infamous to all posterity by act of parliament, which I account to be the greatest misfortune possible to befall any person ; and at the same time it takes from her the legal trial of the fact whereof she is accused, and which she hath a right to by the laws of the land, sure as much as the meanest subject ; and which we don't apprehend she has in any wise forfeited ; nor is there any reason assigned, why his grace has not been pleased to proceed in the ordinary course. I hope, Sir, you will take notice also, that this is, in truth, nothing but a suit between party and party. It is merely a cause matrimonial between husband and wife, began originally in the House of Peers ; and as hitherto the beginning of causes between party and party, in that House, hath been strongly opposed, so I hope it will be thought reasonable to do so always, because it deprives the subject of that legal defence due to him by the law of the land. If this was always complained of, when the proceedings were in a judicial way, surely it is a great deal worse to begin there a private cause between party and party in the legislative way. I can see no manner of difference with respect to the loss of those great advantages the party is intitled to, only this seems rather to be the most against reason.

Sir, this is a summary proceeding with a witness. It began but the 16th of February, and but a week's time given to the party accused of so high a crime, and of so great consequence to the party accused, to be heard to it ; and though perhaps we may with reason enough find fault with the tedious proceedings in some courts, where appeals and writs of error are justly due, as where property is well fixed, it must needs be reasonable : I say, from various causes, though suits in the ordinary courts are very tedious ; yet I am sure a summary way of proceeding without due warning, or any certain way of making defence by any known rules, and without oath, as here without appeal, without any possibility of retrieving the matter again, with great submission ; and if this must be for all that one has in the world, such a summary way is a very terrible thing.

I would be glad any one would make it his own case, and think with themselves how they should like it, if their life, estate and all they had, were put upon such a summary way of proceeding. It is true, in some kingdoms, where the government is arbitrary, the proceedings are summarily, and most commonly they go together : and if we were in a place where the judges were infallible, and there were no false witnesses, and truth could be discovered at an instant, a summary way would be best ; but since men are fallible, since there is passion and partiality in the world, since oftentimes there is notorious detections of perjury, and several things are difficult to be disclosed, and require a reasonable time for examining into facts ; from thence it is that there are settled courses for determining all questions in England between party and party ; and there are known rules and good methods for the relieving against any ill judgment that is given.

Whatever you may think of this particular case of the duchess of Norfolk ; the example is of mighty consequence to all parents, that perhaps make hard shift to give their daughters considerable portions, and may think they have married them well, and made provision for them and their children : I say it will be hard, if their daughters should be sent home to them upon a fortnight's warning, and that witnesses should be examined against them without their having notice so much as of the places of their abode ; and a thing should be determined before the witnesses can be well known : and it must be agreed to be of great consequence to all collateral heirs, if marriages are so easily and suddenly set aside for want of issue ; which I find to be one of the causes assigned for this bill, and that it might be in a summary way, perhaps before they can well hear of it. I am sure, this is a matter of too great temptation to be put upon men that may grow weary of their wives, and desire a better fortune, or desire change, or may be moved by a thousand reasons we cannot think of, to revive old quarrels, and think of things long since passed, if you will see such a precedent of divorcing in such a summary way.

This is sure of infinite concern to us in higher matters. A bill of divorce of a woman in parliament, without a legal trial, is just the same thing as a bill of attainder against a man for treason; the one forfeits the estate, corrupts the blood, and takes away his life, and the other does very little less: for I find, according to the bill, it is to forfeit her jointure, to defame her person, corrupt her reputation; and though it leave her life, it is left with infamy, which is worse than death; and in a case of this high moment, sure you will be careful how you alter the course of trials. I beseech you, Sir, will not the reason be the same, that a bill of attainder may be brought against a man, and that witnesses against him may be fetched from beyond sea, which he had formerly discharged from his service, and put the other side to prove what is always very difficult, the negative, to make his defence, which must needs require a reasonable time for the making out of circumstances, and laying evidence together? Where will be the difference between proceeding against a man for his life without a trial, and proceeding against a woman for her jointure, where her name, family, and reputation is concerned, and perhaps her children, the legitimacy of whom must come in question; and in a case, where the person by no behaviour of hers hath forfeited such a trial, nor the person that prosecutes this bill, cannot shew, that he hath been obstructed in his proceeding in the ordinary way? I need not take notice of what every body knows, that we have a happy constitution, if we can keep it; every man can call his wife his own, and his estate his own, because it cannot be taken away but by legal trial; but if you will go into these extraordinary resorts, when the courts and the law is open, without any previous preparations for that matter, by having a fair examination, that the party cannot say there is a surprize, I know not where it will end; and though in one case it may be desirable, that there should be an extraordinary relief: but will this go no further? Can any body say that?

That which we find in Magna Charta is not to be forgot, where there is so much care in the several instances of it for the preserving of property, and the right of trials, Quod nullus destruatur, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittimus, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terræ.

Why, in this case the ecclesiastical law is lex terræ. And if that be to be taken away without any reason, why may not the law in any other case?

We have, perhaps, in time of great emergency and public difficulties, had some extraordinary laws grounded on extraordinary reasons; but now we are in a time of settled peace, when there may be a just determination according to the law of the land, I cannot see any reason for this proceeding, no, not in this particular case.

I would, Sir, with your favour, take notice of those few instances of this kind, that have been in England by act of parliament, and in what manner they have proceeded.

There have not passed hardly six in six hundred years; I think I may challenge them on the other side to shew so great a number, but those I have I shall quote: but they proceeded in another manner than this has done.

It is true, where persons have had a fair trial in a proper court, and witnesses have been examined, and sentence final been pronounced, and where the party as to the fact hath been concluded according to the law of the land; when all this hath passed, some instances there have been, that afterwards an act of parliament has passed to strengthen the sentence, and to carry it farther than the ecclesiastical court will allow, even to the dissolving the marriage, and enabling the innocent person to marry again; but you will find all those acts are founded and built upon the sentence of those courts, and recite those sentences as a great inducement to the passing of those acts; and I crave leave just to take notice of those. The first we find, is that made in the case of the marquis of Northampton, which was in 5 E. 6. He was married to a daughter of the earl of Essex, and she eloped from him, and was prosecuted in the ecclesiastical courts, and there was sentence against her of divorce. The marquis, from hence, took upon him to marry a daughter of the lord Cobham; and after four years marriage of her, he obtained an act of parliament to ratify the second marriage: which act recites a settlement of divorce in the ecclesiastical court.

This took its rise from examination according to law; and that act of parliament is grounded upon it, and recites it as a previous matter necessary to induce that act.

The next that follows was the famous case of the lord Ross, afterwards earl of Rutland, though there perhaps was as great a notoriety of fact as can be pretended in this case, and he did not stand impeached of any immodest behaviour; but even in that case the divorce by the act, followed a divorce in the ecclesiastical court, and that passed with such difficulty, that it was four years in hand; it began in sixty-six, and was not passed till seventy: I have a copy of it, and it says, That forasmuch as Maunors, commonly called lord Ross.

And it proceeds thereupon to enable him to marry again; but this, Sir, could not be but by two acts of parliament, besides the sentence in the ecclesiastical court; for he first got that court to declare the children illegitimate, and then in the year (70) the parliament passed this act.

I know of no other, till we come to a case that happened within our memory; it is the case of a person of great worth, and I hope it will give no offence when I cite the precedent.

It was the case of Mr. Lykenor, who had been grossly abused by his wife, by elopement and open adultery; but the act he obtained went no farther than to disable the children born while she lived in open adultery; and that act recites a sentence of divorce: I have a copy of it, and I crave leave I may read a few lines of it; it recites that Mr. Lukenor's wife had eloped from her husband.

There was indeed a famous case not long ago, of a lady that was taken away by force, and pretended to be married, and an act of parliament came afterwards to declare that marriage null and void; but even there was a proceeding at law with a witness. The person that had been concerned, was actually indicted and executed; it was not there to make a divorce, and so it had been a vain thing to have gone into the spiritual court, where there was no marriage; for it was only a law after the fact declaratory by way of caution, to give the more satisfaction that that marriage was null and void.

Sir, the last I know of (and it may be proper for you to observe how quick these people come after it) was that of a noble earl, that did obtain last parliament an act for divorcing him and his lady: it is the case of the earl of Macclesfield; but in that case it will be proper to take notice to you, that there were previous proceedings in the ecclesiastical court; there was a libel exhibited against her, a charge upon her, and witnesses examined, and she had a fair opportunity of making her defence; there was a regular and a long proceeding against her, and a prosecution of her, in order to a sentence of excommunication; and then there came the earl's petition into the House of Peers, setting forth, that there had been such a proceeding as this, and that she stood in contempt, having been prosecuted as far as that court could go: After an examination of witnesses, in all the cases I have heard of a divorce by act of parliament, there have been proceedings in the ecclesiastical court; this was the way of former time, but now we are beginning where the matter ought to end.

And now the first application is to that place, wherein all these instances (as I think it ought to be) was the last resort. It is true, this method may not please the duke, for we know his grace is in haste for cutting the knot asunder at once, by the legislative power; but I hope, upon these precedents, you will think it more reasonable, it should be at first untied, or at least loosened by a judicial proceeding. If you will, I do not see how in justice the parliament can deny the like remedy the next sessions to any other that may be in the like case; it may be in worse, for here is no pretence of any spurious issue. Can the parliament of England, whence we take our measures of justice, deny the like remedy in justice to any others that are in the like case? What is it that guards you from an iniquitous application of this nature, but requiring persons to take the ordinary course first, and to come round about to the parliament, as the last remedy, to carry the sentence perhaps farther than the ecclesiastical court can do: but if persons can come up directly hither, I am apt to think your lobby will be crowded with petitioners of this nature the next sessions; though the sessions now are long and frequent, this single business may be so great as to obstruct all other business; I am sure a committee for adultery would have a full employment.

Let it be considered how strange it would be, if some poor man, upon this precedent, shall come and make application, and tell you he stands in need of such a bill from the condition of his family; that his wife plunders his house, sells his goods, and lives in adultery, and prays this matter may be examined in a summary way; because he is not able to go through the costly course of ecclesiastical courts, and he favoured with a divorce; would not this poor man's case seem to have the like justice, or possibly more? And yet if such a mean man should come with such a petition, perhaps it would look strange; but yet in justice there is no respect of persons; the law in England is, 'unum pondus et una mensura;' and if this should be done in the case of a great and rich man, and not for a poor man, they may say what has been said by some, 'That our laws are like the spider's web, which only hold the lesser insects.'

Shall those that expect the best fortunes and greatest advantage by marriage, not undergo the bad fortune of marriage too? I am sure if this be so, it is a privilege of peerage never thought on before.

You may see, Sir, by this bill, how precedents grow upon you; at first in the case of the marquis of Northampton, it was hard to get an act after a divorce: so it was in the case of my lord Ross; the last sessions in the case of the earl of Macclesfield; it went farther there, because there had been a previous proceeding in the ecclesiastical court, and his lady had obstructed that sentence, that act passed before sentence; but now we are come to have it done without so much as a trial to get a divorce in the ecclesiastical courts; to have all passed at once in a summary way, it will be but to petition the parliament, and all shall be determined without a possibility of being re-heard.

I know nothing can be said on the other side with good reason (unless that which I heard in another place), why they should not go to the ecclesiastical court, which is, that those courts cannot divorce a vinculo matrimony; therefore it would have been a vain thing: this may be a good reason for them to come to you afterwards, but it is no reason for them to come here at first, unless they would say at the same time, that every thing ought to be begun in parliament, because it is possible every thing may be brought to the House of Peers at last: will they say that all ejectments ought to be begun originally in the House of Peers, because after the parties have been at great charge and trouble in the courts below, they may be brought thither by writ of error at the last? This would have been a good expedient, in a cause lately where a deed was tried over and over, if the persons concerned in so many verdicts, had once thought of having begun in parliament to have had it settled, whether it was a just deed or no; if this be the rule, it would be well it were known, and made to be the law of the kingdom; for that law will be always reckoned hard which is made in one case, if it may not be had in another; the law of England does go throughout, and if it be law for one it is for another. I have but one thing more to lay before you, and that seems worthy of your consideration, besides all that I have said.

You observe the bill is general, without restraint of time and place, or description, or circumstances relating to the fact: now, Sir, I must take leave to acquaint you, that so long ago as April 1694, his grace the duke, who complains of this matter, as if some misfortune had befallen him, having made former complaints and attempts for obtaining what he now desires, did at last in April 1694, not suddenly, but by advice of counsel, with his friends about him, after a long time of agitation, come to articles with his wife the duchess; of which I crave leave only to read the preamble.

The articles are between his grace the duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Peterborough, and recites, &c.

It is therefore determined by the parties, and agreed as followeth; and thereupon the articles proceed to settle every thing between the duke and duchess to his own satisfaction, and according to his own desire: his grace hath reaped the benefit of those articles, by having received a great sum of money; and the duchess parted with her interest in that great and noble manor of Sheffield; his grace hath had all that he on his part was to have, and hath executed abundance of deeds, pursuant to his agreement. Now if, after all this, there be a prospect of farther advantage by another marriage, that will not move you to give him a liberty for a departure from so solemn an agreement; in what a condition are people that have purchased their peace as the duchess has, if they may have liberty to go back beyond this, for the bill has no stint? Surely all reconciliation between men and their wives, and all acts towards them, and all acts of kindness, are to be favoured; and matters of a divorce are of an odious nature, and not to be encouraged after such composure of differences, and reconciliation. We have instances of some that have taken their wives again, and lived comfortably afterwards; surely it shall not be in their power to go back and say, Pray let us be divorced; it is contrary to the use of all acts of pardon. What is the end of all acts of parliament of general pardon, and all statutes of limitation, but to ease people in such a case? For it is impossible that any person can be able to defend their actions nine or ten years ago; they cannot keep their witnesses alive, and therefore the law hath often limited a time, beyond which persons shall not go back: and thus, we think, the duke hath done by articles, and surely they are conclusive both before God and man.

I shall say no more, but that I do not apprehend the nation will be in any great danger, if the duke do, betwixt this and the next session, proceed in the ordinary course, and prepare matters against another session; I am sure it is of great consequence: no man can deny but we have a good constitution; but if it is in the case of a particular person to be broken, such a breach in this constitution may not be very easily recovered.

I hope this cause, that is precipitated here out of time, and before those preparations were made that have been in all other cases, shall be remitted to its proper place, where her grace will give the duke a meeting, if they be not before that time reconciled.

Mr. Dodd. Mr. Speaker, I desire the favour of a word of the same side. These bills are not common; I think there are not above three instances to be found in the records of this kingdom.

This bill is to dissolve a marriage after twenty-three years continuance, and that not upon so many days notice as there has been years of the marriage, for to serve the particular purposes of one person: It is a law after the supposed fact committed; the law should go first, and the fact follow; it is not a general law for all the people of England; as such, it would have been another consideration: there is no occasion for a particular law, it is a bill from the Lords, and in a little time, for what I know, the Lords will prescribe to it. There is not one of these bills for a commoner, unless in my lord Ross's case, who was of a noble family.

It is not pretended by this bill, that the duchess hath had any spurious issue, though that was the circumstances of one of the bills that did pass, and that was a material circumstance in the case; and that is not alledged here. These bills are not to be made use of, but upon extraordinary occasion, and the utmost extremity, and till then I hope such bills shall not be made use of; and we think the proceeding upon this bill in this case, will appear much harder; for it is the first instance of this nature, when there has been no proceeding in any court whatsoever, to convict the duchess of this offence, no citation all this while in the ecclesiastical courts, where the duchess might have an opportunity to make her defence.

If those courts have jurisdiction in any one thing, it is in case of matrimony: If this was brought into those courts, the duchess would be allowed to make her defence, not only by way of recrimination, but examination of witnesses; a commission might be had to examine witnesses beyond sea, if she had any witnesses there, or in the country; she might appeal to a superior court, and thence to the delegates: These are all proper defences that the law allows, that there may be no surprize upon the party; and if injured, he may be righted in another place: These proceedings we think are necessary to go before a bill of this nature, for then the fact would be plain; and if the duchess had been convicted in this manner, as to the fact, we must not have opened our mouths against it.

By the same reason that a bill is brought to dissolve this marriage, in a little time you may have a bill to marry people: Be it enacted for such and such reasons, such persons shall be married. This would be a much readier way in case of contracts, than any proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts. And though they may say the law of England takes notice of contracts of matrimony, as well as any other acts, that is no answer; for the fact is, whether there is any contract of matrimony, or no; and so it is here, whether my lady is guilty of the crimes charged here in the bill; and for this she ought to have a proper trial, and ought to be called to an account in the ordinary methods of the law; and then it might be proper to carry the sentence farther than those courts can. I hope you will be very tender of making a new precedent; and I do not know of any bill before this, to convict a woman of a supposed crime; then this is the first bill of this nature, and you will consider, whether you will make a precedent of it or no. Though this before you is the case of a great and honourable person, yet your justice will be the same if it should happen that any other man in the kingdom should be in the same circumstances, and willing to slip over all trials, whereby the person accused might have an opportunity of making her just defence, as is the case of this noble lady, who is hurried on after twenty-three years marriage to a determination in as many days in this extraordinary manner.

I hope therefore you will not proceed in a bill of this extraordinary nature, of which there is not one instance to be given, where you have begun to examine a supposed crime, but you have always left it to the determination of the law in the ordinary course; and we think it ought rather to be so in this case, because it is not pretended by the bill, that there is any stop put to their proceedings there; there is no absence of witnesses, no incapacity, but his grace may proceed there to convict this lady of the crime he supposes her guilty of, and she will there have her just defence; and till then there is no crime for you to judge upon, and I hope you will think fit to reject this bill.

Dr. Pinfold. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak a few words as to the ecclesiastical law, which is a part of the law of England as much as any other, for our law does not receive 'majus et minus;' and the ecclesiastical courts have been settled for several ages, and are governed by such rules which every subject has a right to. Sir, this bill is to dissolve the bond of marriage, and to give leave to marry again; and I crave leave to shew the House what our ecclesiastical constitutions are in that case, and how tender they have been in that point, and how those constitutions are grounded upon the canons and decrees of councils.

The cases where the bond of marriage is to be dissolved are but few, and they arise before marriage; it is in the case of a precontract or nupture, or consanguinity, and there the bond is broken by the sentence of the judge, and the person hath liberty to marry again; but for what comes afterwards, whether it be the case of adultery, or any thing else, the law ecclesiastical, which, as I said before, is part of the law of England, hath been very careful not to dissolve the marriage.

The 48th canon says, if any layman shall put away his wife, and marry another, he shall be excommunicated: That was the sense of those early days; and sure they did not think it an indifferent matter because they punished it with so heavy a punishment. So it was in the council of Arles, 314, and there it was decreed; that if a man took his wife in adultery, he should be forbidden to marry. There what was to be done? Counsel should be given him not to marry while she lived, though she was an adulteress.

And in the council 402, the Neapolitan evangelical, apostolical council, it was decreed, That if a man was divorced from his wife, or a wife from her husband, there they were not to marry, but should remain unmarried, or be reconciled.

And in the African council, canon 102, there it was provided, That they who were divorced, whether it was a husband from his wife, or a wife from her husband, they should remain unmarried. This was the sense of the ancient canons and councils, and this is received into our ecclesiastical constitution. In the 15th year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, in the chapter of divorces, it is said, That upon a sentence of divorce there must be an admonition, and a prohibition, that the party shall not marry again.

And in the year 1602, in the beginning of king James's reign, there was a farther provision made to keep them from being married again, and that was this, That they should give bond and security that they should not marry again; this is certainly our ecclesiastical constitution, and grounded on the sense of the ancient canons.

Now it remains to shew some advantage this would have had: If she had had the trial which of common right is due to the meanest subject, she would have had the advantage of challenges, which she cannot have here; for here the evidence must drop from the witnesses' mouths, who are foreigners, and have been long absent; there they must give an account of themselves, which here hath not been done by any body. The lady might have given her exceptions to those witnesses, and had a commission into Holland, to have examined how these witnesses behaved themselves, and whether these persons were to be believed and credited: here she would likewise have liberty to give an account how this design began. I do now speak with respect to the duke, but I do say it does seem to have begun a year and a half ago: She would likewise have had the advantage of a thorough reconciliation: and here are some deeds in 1694, between the duke and the duchess, which I hope, if the House will take an account of, will have its due effect; she would likewise have had the advantage of an appeal, the common right of the subject, and grounded upon good reason; and in case there had been a neglect in the first instances, the party may be righted in another place.

By this bill she is debarred of the advantage of recrimination, to which she hath a right, for the text law is:—

And the text law, de divoritiis, were the charge most true, which we do not admit; yet if she can prove the same thing against her husband, the fault of one must be set against the fault of another, and he cannot have the advantage of his prayer.

I shall repeat only one thing more, and that is the case quoted already of the earl of Macclesfield; but in that case the lady withdrew herself five or six days before sentence; yet there the lord Macclesfield had all her defences, and even her recrimination, and had a time to prove it; there was publication, and a day set down for sentence; but she spun out the time till the parliament was ready to rise, and then my lord's friends advised him to begin in parliament; and when the Lords were acquainted of my lady Macclesfield's standing in contempt of the court, and she was prosecuted so far, that she was almost ready to go to prison for her contempt, then the House of Lords did think fit to receive my lord Macclesfield's bill, and not before; but before my lord Macclesfield brought his bill in parliament, there was nothing remained to be done in the ecclesiastical courts but sentence: and I hope for all these reasons, you will not proceed upon this bill.

Mr. Serj. Wright. Mr. Speaker, I am of counsel for the duke of Norfolk, who is your suppliant for this bill, for redress against the highest injury that can be offered; the rights of his marriage-bed have been invaded, and he comes for that relief here, which no other court can afford him; for the learned doctor on the other side tells you plainly, from the canon law, that there can be no divorce a vinculo matrimonii in their courts: now to send us to a court for relief, that they tell us before-hand can give us none, is in effect to tell us we shall have none at all.

The bill is founded upon the suggestions contained in the first three or four lines of the bill, that the duchess of Norfolk hath, for divers years, lived in separation from the duke her husband, and hath had unlawful familiarity and adulterous conversation with sir John Germaine, and is guilty of adultery on her part, and hath broken the bond of matrimony; those are the reasons for which the duke desires this bill may pass; it is for the adulterous conversation of the duchess, not for one single act, but a continual series of the like acts for many years; for we shall not give only one single act or instance in evidence, but prove this conversation for several years, beginning in 1687, and carried on to the latter end of 1695.

It hath been objected, that this is the first instance of a divorce, the first bill of this kind, where there has been no proceedings in the spiritual court: that it is the first bill of this kind we deny; but that there have been no proceedings in the spiritual court, we own; for the earl of Macclesfield's was the same, to all intents and purposes, as this is; for though it is true, they had been in the spiritual court, yet it is as true, they came here into parliament before any sentence in the spiritual court: now to what purpose is it to go into the spiritual court, and not to stay for the determination of that court, if the judgment of that court is to have any weight in the case of the earl of Macclesfield? It is true, they had been there and examined witnesses on one side with all precipitation, yet would they not stay for a sentence there, but quitted their own proceedings, and came to the parliament. Now I do take it, that they had better never been there, than to have come away before sentence; for when they were in the spiritual court, and were proceeding there, to leave that court, shewed rather a mistrust of their own case. But it was no objection in that case, that it was taking it away from the jurisdiction of the spiritual court. We do not come to you for any thing the spiritual court can grant us; for that court goes no farther, if the fact be proved, than to make a separation a mensa et thoro, but the bonds of marriage is to be continued still: now with submission, this is to punish the innocent instead of the guilty: what would the duchess desire more, than to be separated from the bed and board of her husband, and be left free to accompany sir John Germaine? But we go further, for we come to the parliament to dissolve this marriage for that which is allowed by several learned writers to be a justifiable reason for so doing, for adultery committed by the wife: it is expressly, that a man shall not put away his wife, except in case of fornication; this text plainly allows, that in case of fornication a man might put away his wife: but the Popish canons the doctor has named, have put a construction upon it: say they, you shall put her away; but how? She shall be removed from your bed and table, but you shall not marry another. Then they say, there is no precedent of a bill of this kind, but there hath been a previous prosecution in the spiritual courts. I agree the marquis of Northampton's case, that that act does recite the proceedings in the spiritual court: but that case is stronger than this, for there the marquis of Northampton had married even in the teeth of their canon law, and comes afterwards an act of parliament to make this marriage good, and there the divorce was no ingredient upon the passing of the bill: but the parliament enacted the marriage to be lawful. In my lord Ross's case, there is no mention of any divorce.

I appeal to the Journals of your own Houses for that; but notwithstanding the divorce, the whole matter was examined over again, witnesses were examined both in the House of Lords, and here upon the first bill which was brought, which was to illegitimate and bastardize the children; and the witnesses proved, that my lord Ross and his lady had not lain together for a long time, and that she had kept company with others; so that the parliament did not found the bill upon what had been done upon the divorce.

I appeal to your own memory, that in the earl of Macclesfield's case, there was no use at all on that side; the bill was brought, that there had been proceedings in the spiritual court, nor is there any such thing recited in the bill, but only an express downright charge of adultery; nor was it proper for them to have mentioned any proceedings in the spiritual court, since they waved that prosecution; but we on the other side insisted on it, as a reason why the parliament should not proceed in it, it being to take upon them an original jurisdiction; but we were then answered by a learned gentleman against this bill, that it was in vain to go there, for they could not give the remedy that might reasonably be expected. I beg the favour to mention a case or two, where divorces have been in parliament, and there have been no proceedings in the spiritual court; one of them was the case of Mrs. Knight, who was married infra annos nobiles to Mr. Goodwin. Every one knows, that a marriage infra annos nobiles is a good marriage; and if the woman be above nine years old, she shall be cudowed; and yet notwithstanding, for some irregular proceedings, without going into the spiritual court, they came into parliament; a bill was passed, by which this marriage was dissolved; and I think it is expressly enacted,

That she shall not marry till such an age. This goes farther; for here I am sure the doctor would have explained, and told you, if there had been reason to dissolve the marriage, they could have done as great a feat in the spiritual court; that they could have examined witnesses upon oath, and could have told you whether there was proper evidence; yet the parliament, without any regard to what they could do, would assert their own jurisdiction.

The case of Mr. Wharton was mentioned on the other side; and therefore I need not say any thing to it: there was nothing of divorce, nor needed any.

They say this bill begins where it is proper for matters of this nature to end; and that after we have taken a turn into the spiritual court, and travelled three or four years there, then it will be fit for the judgment of parliament. I would know if they had been seven years in that court (and perhaps if they come there, we shall not get out sooner) to what use the examination of that court would be. This house, I presume, would not let those depositions be read here, especially if the witnesses to their facts were living.

They say this is a very summary way of proceeding; it may be too quick for the duchess; but you may be pleased to consider, that there was a bill brought into the other House some years ago, and rejected; upon what terms, that will rest upon us to shew you by and bye.

But the matter was, the witnesses that proved the fact, was sent out of the way by the duchess and sir John Germaine, when things were under an examination; and we hope a matter of this nature never shall be baffled by keeping the evidence out of the way.

We told them long ago, who the witnesses were; they were the duchess's servants, such as they thought fit to entrust.

They say this bill deprives the duchess of her trial; I hope nobody thinks the parliament will pass a bill, without due examination of witnesses, and legal proof of the fact; if so, what matter is it, whether the proof be made before the parliament, or some inferior court? If the duchess be guilty of this crime, we come here for relief, which the spiritual court, the doctors tell you, cannot give us; since the duchess hath broke the bond of matrimony, we come to you to dissolve that marriage, and I hope we shall have it.

The doctor hath insisted on one thing, that I think is very extraordinary: he tells you, by the rules of their law, if the woman can recriminate, and prove her husband guilty, in such a case, they must set the fault of one against the fault of the other.

I wish the doctor could have told you the offence had been equal; that the injury to families had been equal; a man by his folly of this kind brings no spurious issue to inherit the lands of his wife, but a woman deprives her husband of any legitimate issue; for when she converses in this manner with another man, the issue may be equally looked upon to be that man's, if not more, and his lady hath kept this conversation ever since the year 1687, and left the duke.

One thing is farther objected, and they insist upon certain articles of agreement in ninety-four, and they read to you the preamble of them: why, Sir, the articles, if they come to be read through, I am sure it won't amount to what they pretend; it does not amount to this, that the duchess might use her body as she pleased; there is no agreement, that she should live after her own pleasure. Indeed, she was to have the use of her household goods, and servants, and live where she pleased; but that will not justify her in her way of living.

Then to tell you, these are matters of long standing; they are so, and of a long continuance; for, if my instructions prove true, we shall prove this scene of adultery for matter of eight years successively, and that by servants that were privy to the intrigues, who were sent away to Holland; but no sooner was the bill baffled, but the man was sent for again, and the same conversation continued that was betwixt the duchess and sir John Germaine before he left England.

The same was continued after he came back to his service in (1691); only they were something more cautious, and people were not admitted so familiarly to see them in bed together in (1692); and so it continued till 1695.

They mentioned the Statute of Limitations, which was to put an end to frivolous and vexatious actions: how they can apply it to this case, I cannot see; because a man shall not bring frivolous and vexatious actions after a long distance of time, therefore a man shall not complain when he hath received the greatest injury that can be done to mankind.

Sir, they are kind to us again, in recommending it to the duke to go into the spiritual court till the next sessions: but we think we are in proper method here, for that relief which the spiritual court cannot grant; and since we have so good reason to come here, if we prove the fact, I hope this high court will not send away a complaint of this nature, without such relief as suitable.

Mr. Northey. Sir, I am of the same side: I would beg leave to say this: As to what the counsel have said in relation to the evidence, that there were three witnesses examined upon oath, in the House of Peers, before the bill did pass there; and I believe they are aware of that, and that when you hear our witnesses, there will be no answer to be given on their side; and indeed the witnesses they brought, were so far from contradicting our witnesses, that they did really confirm them. But that is not the case now, what our evidence is, or whether it be fit for you to believe them, that will be when you have heard them; and for the matter of the time, that you cannot take notice of neither, till you hear our evidence. But this I may say, we shall bring a man that will speak to within four or five years.

But the matter they apply themselves to, which is material, is, whether it is proper for you to proceed on this bill, that is, to give such a relief as we desire, by dissolving this marriage? And in the next place, whether this be a proper time to ask this favour?

For the first, the learned doctor tells you, it is not proper at any time to do it, for he would have the canon law govern here, as it does in their courts. But the counsel on the other side have cited you several precedents where it hath been done. In the Case of the marquis of Northampton, the second marriage was contrary to the canon law, and yet that marriage was confirmed according to God's law. And this bill is to relieve against the canon law.

Now, whether we are here in a proper time; sir Thomas Powys has said a great many things, which may be proper to many other purposes. One argument was, because the witnesses cannot be upon oath; but that we know will not prevail in this place. In the next place they except, because this proceeding is in a summary way. I would know of them, whether there is not the same objection to all proceedings before a jury, that they have no notice what witnesses will be produced?

Then in the next place they bring a great argument for the recital of some of these bills, that there have been a sentence in the ecclesiastical courts. Now, it is true, they have been so in some of those cases: But I beg leave to observe, that in the case of the marquis of Northampton, the bill was not to confirm the sentence, or to enable them to marry, but to deliver them out of the hands of the ecclesiastical courts, who said it was not lawful in that case to marry, for they were married before.

I beg leave to say, that in the case of my lord Macclesfield, there was no notice in the bill that came down to you of any proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts: And I take this to be the reason, because there was no sentence, though where there was a sentence, they had good reason to take notice of it. And I think there is as much certainty, and as good ground to proceed on this bill, as in the other case, for the witnesses have been already examined in the House of Lords. In the case of my lord Ross, there was no regard to the determination of the ecclesiastical courts, as a guide to the parliament; and it was looked upon as of no consequence, for the witnesses were examined again.

It is true, when we came before you without such a proceeding, we came under this disadvantage, you will be sure to expect a plainer and fuller proof; but for that we will undertake to make the fact so plain, that they cannot give the least pretence to answer to it.

We are here asking that we cannot have any where else: their great design is delay, and that we have learnt from the civilian, who tells you, their methods are very grave and deliberate, and, that they may have a commission to examine witnesses beyond sea; and that is to enquire how their own servants have lived beyond sea.

As to what sir Thomas Powys would have, that is, that we should go into the spiritual court, and apply ourselves here again next sessions, I do not think the legislature will send us back to ask that in the spiritual court which both have submitted to: For after the duke had miscarried in the relief he sought by another bill, by the duchess's sending the witnesses out of the way; why, truly, after that, to prevent any prosecution in the spiritual court, the duchess submitted to a separation by articles, and that was all the duke could have pretended to by the ecclesiastical law: We follow her upon that, and come to enforce that separation. And, to make it effectual, and for that which we humbly hope will be thought but justice to the duke, that is, to be delivered from this wife, and to have liberty to marry again; we think there is no occasion for delay, and that nobody can be hurt by a precedent that carries relief in this nature, and deliver us from a law, which in the days of popery was put upon us. Upon the whole matter, I hope you will think that we are here very properly for relief, and that we shall have the favour to call our witnesses.

Dr. Oldish. Sir, the great objection against the passing of this bill was, because witnesses had not been examined in the proper court. It is very true, generally speaking, in cases it ought to be so; but here is a very great exception to that rule, and which, I think, cannot admit of an answer, and that is, the notoriety of the fact; and in that case they begin with execution. And if that be so, I think there never was a clearer demonstration in the world; for when formerly the duchess came to give in her answer in the House of Lords, to the charge against her, she did declare, that in the year 88, or thereabouts, she went out of England, and tarried three years, and returned about the time of the revolution. And it does plainly appear there, beyond all question, that she was at Hambeth, and went under the name of the lady Beckman, and was attended by one Keetner, who went then by the name of Goodman. Besides this, there are witnesses that speak to particular facts. Now, I say, here is that which amounts to demonstration; and where there is a notoriety of fact, that is an exception out of the general rule, and it is proper to begin with execution.

There is an exception to the general councils and canons that have been mentioned, that there shall not be a divorce à vinculo. Sir, I say, it was an ecclesiastical constitution, which was against the law of God; and it is demonstrably so; for where our Saviour says, that a man shall not put away his wife, except in case of fornication; it is plain, that in case of fornication he may.

There is another thing insisted on, and that is, that there was a reconciliation between the duke and his duchess. It is true, a reconciliation should drown all things before that time; but when the law takes notice in case of a relapse, that does recrudescere, it rubs upon the old sore, and then that which was before laid asleep is brought again upon the stage, and will return with greater vengeance. And we have plain proof of her living in the same manner since, as before.

But they would insinuate to you, that in case there was a trial in the ecclesiastical court, there might be a recrimination; but there must be a compensation, which cannot be thought in this case; for, I think, in this case, under favour, there is no comparison. I do not think they are pari, for it is impossible for the husband to do that injury as the wife may; for she may bring a bastard into the family, and then the estate does not go according to the law of God and nature, for every body desires his own blood should succeed him.

Sir Tho. Powys. Sir, I shall say but very little. But three or four things have been mentioned on the other side, which they offer as if they conceived them to have great weight, and yet they seem to me as very capable of being answered; and I crave your favour to do it.

They have gone much upon the proofs that they are ready to make, and, I think, not very properly, because we speak against their proceeding upon this bill; but I am sure it turns upon them: For, according to their own shewing, they are very well prepared to proceed in a regular course, for they have their witnesses ready, and nothing does obstruct them.

Mr. Serj. Wright mentioned a thing, which, I must confess, I was surprized in; for when I told him, he could not find any precedent of such a bill as this, without a previous proceeding in the spiritual court; Mr. Serj. Wright said, it was quite otherwise; and to shew you it was so, he cited two cases where there was no marriage. Now, I always understood, a divorce must be in any case where there was a marriage, for the case of Mr. Knight's, that was very lately: That was the case of an infant, who they pretended to have married infra annus nubile; and therefore, says he, the declaring of that marriage to be null and void by act of parliament, was a divorce. The other was the case of Mrs. Wharton, which was no marriage neither, for marriage must be by consent, and that was a force: and that he fancies to be a case, where there was a divorce too, without proceeding in the spiritual court; and yet, of his own shewing, it was no marriage.

Another thing I am much more surprized at, we insisted, that they would not shew an act for making a divorce without giving the party an opportunity to make a defence; and the doctor says, in common cases it ought to be so: and they cited the earl of Macclesfield we first mentioned, and the doctor told you the progress it had, and that there was a full and regular proceeding, of great length of time; and, that my lady Macclesfield had all her witnesses examined, and my lord prosecuted her to an excommunication, which is in effect a sentence, for it is in our law as in cases of outlawry. This he calls a precedent wherein they proceeded to get an act of parliament, without a previous proceeding in the spiritual court.

He tells you in the next place, That notwithstanding the divorce in the case of ray lord Ross, the parliament did examine witnesses; it is true, they did, for I don't think they will so entirely pin their faith upon those proceedings, as to have no other satisfaction. But will he therefore say they took no notice of it, when it is the foundation and ground of the bill?

He tells you in the next place, that the crime does not seem equal between the one and the other; and so, in some sort, they ridicule the doctor's notion of recrimination. But I apprehend the doctor is right in it: for it would be hard if a man should marry a young woman, and give her an ill example in his own family, (I do not say it is this case) and bring her acquainted with loose and ill company, and by his example or provocation lead her into the same offence; would that man deserve to be rewarded with a new wife, and another portion, because his first wife had only followed his example?

They say, the offence is not equal, because the man brings no children into the family.

I doubt it happens oftentimes to them that go abroad, that they bring home that to their wives which sticks longer by them than their children.

Then to come and say, the articles cannot be of any use to us at all; and to imagine that we use the articles so, that the duchess might be at perfect liberty to live in adultery; I wonder how that conceit hath followed him hither, when we told him we had not such a thought as to live in adultery, but they to direct her to live separate; and so we used them, as an answer to that part. We used them likewise as an act of total oblivion and remission of any thing beyond that time; and, I hope, to such purposes they shall be thought sacred.

Now I beseech you, Sir, on the whole matter, have they on the other side said one thing, but what does totally tend to bring all cases of adultery immediately before you? Have they distinguished this case from the case of any other person? And then, if they have not, I do not see from henceforward, that any but fools will go to the ecclesiastical courts for relief: For says, the serjeant, they cannot give them a final relief, and enable any person to marry again, and therefore let nobody think to go there again; but here is a relief to be had worth a man's having. But, I hope, we shall have the benefit of the law, as it is, till you think fit to alter it, and then you will erect some judicature, where people may have their trial. Now therefore the argument goes too far, or it argues nothing at all; because, if there be any thing in it, it goes to take away the proceedings of those courts totally."

But though those courts cannot do all that these gentlemen desire, they can do what is very proper to be done; they can examine witnesses, and pronounce sentence, and give the party a full opportunity of knowing the accusation and accusers; and then the cases we have mentioned have had the aid of an act of parliament.

Sir, we have spent a great deal of your time already; I hope, since you see what use they make of the last precedent of my lord Macclesfield, where he did proceed to an excommunication. Now from thence they argue, that you should proceed originally in this case. When is the time to make a stand, but in the first case? and then no man can complain of any injury. If you grant this to my lord, I think in justice you cannot deny it to any other that stands in need of it. I believe there never was the like before; and therefore, I hope, you will put a stop to it here.

Mr. Dodd. The gentlemen on the other side have told you, that our Saviour hath said. That no man should put away his wife, except for fornication. It is true, the text is so; but he cannot shew you any text wherein our Saviour says, That the man may marry again, though he might put his wife away. Another thing was said, as to the proceeding in the ecclesiastical courts: Dr. Oldish says, there is to be nothing but execution where there is notoriety of fact; and here the fact is notorious, and therefore you may come up to order execution; but that is a strange doctrine to our English constitution. Would they hang one first, and try him afterwards? That would make work. Let the fact be never so notorious, yet it is the right of all the people of England to have a legal trial; and, I hope you will not interpose till there hath been a regular trial in another place.

Then Sir Thomas Pymys offered to produce the articles, but they were not admitted.

March 25.

The House resolved themselves into a committee of the whole House, to consider of the duke of Norfolk's bill. Sir Rowland Gwynne took the chair of the committee of the whole House. And the counsel and solicitors were called in, and the bill read to them; and then Mr. Northey, of counsel with the duke, opened the evidence thus:

Mr. Northey. I am of counsel for the duke of Norfolk. I shall not trouble you now (because I think it not fit) to say any thing for the bill, for that you have approved of by commitment of the bill, and declared it to be a reasonable and just relief against the duchess, for the adultery charged in the bill. I shall not spend any of your time in aggravating the crime of adultery.

But that which is incumbent on his grace's counsel now, is to lay before you the proofs of the fact suggested in the bill; and the facts to be proved are the introduction of the bill, That the duchess has lived for divers years in separation from the duke, and had unlawful familiarity and adulterous conversation with sir John Germaine; and for that fact we will call our witnesses.

And our evidence will make this out to you, as plain as it is possible to expect a matter of this nature to be proved.

However, I think they have managed things in that manner, as we shall be able to give as plain a proof of these facts as might be expected of those acts which are in their own nature most public. However, in the nature of the thing, there were but a few persons to be intrusted with it, and those were generally servants, who had attendance on the duchess's person. We shall produce you servants both of the duchess and sir John Germaine; and, I hope, it cannot be an objection that they are servants; for to object to them for that reason, is to say, you shall prove the fact, but you shall have no witnesses; for these are facts that cannot be proved but by such as were concerned with the duchess.

For our evidence, it will fall out to be this: The duke and duchess were married in the year 1677, and they lived together till about the year 1685: And then the duke having some account of her conversation of this nature, they did part, and afterwards she came to live openly with sir John Germaine; for, in May 1689, the witnesses will give you an account, that for two months together she lodged with sir John Germaine at the Cockpit; and they lived there as man and wife, as the witnesses phrase it. During the time they lived there, there was a near relation of sir John Germaine's, Mr. Daniel Germaine his brother, and Mrs. Blane his sister, did frequently come to the house; and two of the witnesses were frequently in the room while they were a bed together.

After two months time, the duchess thought fit to be a little more private, and it was given out she was gone to France: but in truth she removed to Vauxhall, to a house that was taken by sir John Germaine's brother, and went by the name of my lady Beckman; and she lived there two years successively; and sir John Germaine came there frequently, once or twice in a week, and lay there at nights during that time. We have two witnesses that did attend the duchess, as well as at the Cockpit; one of them is Ellena Vaness, who was hired by sir John Germaine's sister, and lived with the duchess at the Cockpit two months. We have a second witness, one Hosier, who was with sir John Germaine at the Cockpit fifteen days before the duchess went to Vauxhall; and afterwards he went to Vauxhall when she removed there, and staid with her all the two years.

These are both foreigners, and Dutch people, and it was reasonable enough to expect foreign witnesses, when an English duchess had a foreign gallant: they are such as he thought fit to entrust about her.

After she had lived two years at Vauxhall (this brings her to the year 1691) she removed home again to her house at Mill-bank, and there sir John and she were frequently together, and have been seen a-bed together.

This brings us to the time when the duke having an account that she had this conversation with sir John Germaine, brought a bill into the House of Peers for a divorce; but it happened that the duchess and sir John Germaine, to avoid the condemnation, kept the witnesses out of the way, and afterwards caused them to be sent into Holland.

The woman staid abroad till about three months ago, but the man returned before into sir John Germaine's service; and he will give you an account of what observations he made there, for the familiarity continued between them then. He was admitted into the room where they used to be, and he will give you an account how he hath seen them frequently together; and he brings it down to within the year 1695.

We have another witness, one William Bayly, who likewise was a servant to sir John Germaine, and came into his place when Hosier went beyond sea. He is an unwilling witness, because he hath been preferred by sir John Germaine; but when he was upon his oath in the other House, he did give an account, That while he continued in sir John Germaine's service, notwithstanding this public reproach in 1695 and 1696, she frequently came to sir John Germaine's house with one Keemer, whom she had great confidence in, and one Susannah Barrington, I think, yet in the duchess's service. And this Mr. Bayly will give you an account, that his master was often from home; and when he was so, he used to carry his linen to this Keemer, who was the duchess's servant, or this Keemer would come to him for it: and this will bring it down to 1696. There are several witnesses to confirm this; but we think, with submission, after the duchess had been so accused in the House of Lords of such a familiarity, any evidence of a conversation between them afterwards, is as much as a thousand witnesses; for no woman that valued her reputation, having been accused as she was, would have had any conversation with sir John Germaine afterwards. But we do not want circumstances to support the evidence of fact; we have as plain evidence in this case, as can be expected in a case of this nature. We will spend no more of your time, but beg leave to call our witnesses.

Mr. Atwood. Sir Rowland Gwynne, please to favour me with a few words on the same side; I shall not mispend the time of the committee in repeating any thing said by Mr. Northey; I shall only observe, that the witnesses, Hosier and Vaness, say, That Susannah Barrington was privy to this adulterous conversation: and this Susannah Barrington has withdrawn herself since the Bill was depending in the House of Lords.

It is further proved, that Mr. Daniel Germaine and Mr. Briane's wife were in England lately, and that these were privy to the same conversation.

Then the witnesses were called in one by one, and interpreters allowed.

The witnesses that were examined before the Committee of the Commons were Ellena Vaness, Nicholas Hosier, William Bayly, and Ann Read.

But all, except Ann Read, were examined in the House of Lords, and their evidence there being at large set forth, the reader is referred to the same. The evidence of Ann Read is as follows:

Ann Read being asked, whether she had ever seen the duchess go to sir John Germaine's house, and when? says, That about April 1697, (which was soon after the duke's bill had been rejected in the House of Lords) she saw the duchess of Norfolk go in a chair to sir John's house; that the door was immediately opened upon her chair's being set down, and she went into the house with her mask off.

She being asked, whether she had seen sir John come to the duchess's house, and when? says, She, within a twelve-month last past, or thereabouts, followed him to the duchess's house, about three of the clock in the afternoon, and that she did not see him come out.

After the witnesses were examined on the part of the duke of Norfolk for the bill, Sir Thomas Powys, of counsel with the duchess of Norfolk, being called upon to make defence, spoke to this effect:

Sir Thomas Powys. I am at a loss, Sir, and under some kind of a surprize, because, as far as I apprehend, you call upon us to make our defence. I hope in a case of such moment as this is (and it may be there cannot be greater), and since you are pleased to take this case out of the usual way of trials, and to try it in the first instance, you will be pleased, that we should be fairly and regularly heard. And since it was not allowed us, upon our being heard against the bill, that we should have a time to make our defence; now we have heard what the witnesses swear, we shall desire but a short time, no more than what is absolutely necessary, to make our defence. This hath spent us six hours already; and I am sure the witnesses that have been examined have given such variety of answers, that it doth afford a great deal to be said to it. We have likewise a good many witnesses to be examined, but I am far from proposing any thing to delay it. We had a week's time allowed us in the House of Lords, but that is no rule for you, and we do not expect it here: But, even while we are at this bar, a person from a very worthy member gives us intelligence, upon sight of this cook-maid, of a matter that will defame her; and he will be ready to make it out, that she was turned away for being a common thief in Holland; and therefore, Sir, you see how time is necessary in point of accidents that do happen; and I cannot make our defence now.

Thereupon the counsel withdrew; and the committee having considered of the desire of the counsel for the duchess to have time allowed them to make their defence, were of opinion, that the counsel should proceed then to make their defence; and candles were ordered to be brought in.

And the counsel being called in again, sir Rowland Gwynne being in the chair of the committee, acquainted them with the determination of the committee.

Then sir Thomas Powys observed upon the evidence that had been given, and insisted, that the evidence given before the Committee of Commons did differ from the evidence given by them upon oath in the House of Lords; and offered to produce the examination of the said witnesses upon oath in the House of Lords. And an objection being made, that such examination ought not to be read in that case, as evidence before this committee; the counsel withdrew, and the committee considered of the said objection, and were of opinion, that the said depositions should not be read.

And the counsel being called in again, were acquainted with it, and that if they had any witnesses, viru voce, to encounter their evidence, they might produce them.

Sir Thomas Powys. Sir, by this resolution my client is deprived of that defence I thought I could have made for her; but I submit to the pleasure of the Committee.

Mr. Atwood. The examinations in the House of Lords were so lately, that it is an easy thing for the solicitors, who were by, to give an account of a contrariety in the evidence, if there were any.

A Member. Whether you have any other evidence to offer, but as to this point?

Sir Tho. Powys. All our evidence would tend to contradict these witnesses; and if the reading of those depositions will not be allowed, we must abide your pleasure, and submit it to you.

Mr. Dodd. We must submit it to you; our witnesses were in concurrence with that sort of evidence.

Sir Rowland Gwynne. There are several persons named, who are persons of credit and good reputation, Mr. Briane and his lady, Mr. Daniel Germaine and his sister; these would be witnesses of credit, against those that are, you say, not of credit.

Counsel. We have summoned them and Mrs. Pitts, and done all that we could on our side to get them here; and I hope you will not prejudice our case, to say they are in our interest; that is to determine the question. We have likewise summoned Mrs. Pitts and her two maids; and whether they will appear, or not, that we cannot tell; but this we are ready to make out to you.

Mr. Atwood. Susannah Barrington, the duchess's woman, privy to the whole conversation, is proved to have been with her since the bill was brought into the House of Lords.

A Member. Whether he has one living witness to produce, that he can make good his defence by?

Sir Tho. Powys. Sir, if you expect an answer by me, I am assured that we have witnesses; but if I cannot bring those people against themselves, if I cannot bring Nichola against Nichola, I despair of doing any good, if I bring a thousand other witnesses against him: and therefore I pray this favour of you, that since it is your pleasure that this evidence be not allowed, you will not make a bad construction of it, that I do not proceed to make a defence to this bill; for I cannot truly do it, unless I had some other instructions from my client, but shall defeat her expectation to proceed upon the other part of the case, since what we built upon with good authority, as we thought, is not thought fit to be admitted.

Sir R. Gwynne. Sir, you are at liberty to go on, if you have any thing more to say, than that you cannot proceed without further directions from your client.

A Member. Whether they have any thing to offer in the defence of the duchess, upon the crime she is charged with; for, I believe, it is a new thing for the counsel, when their client is charged with a crime, to say, they cannot defend her unless they go and ask, whether they shall defend her, or no? If they have any thing to say in her defence, we shall be ready to hear it.

Sir R. Gwynne. Sir Thomas Powys, have you any thing more to say?

Sir Tho. Powys. I cannot but repeat what I have already said, that I would be glad to make the best defence this case may bear; and I may say, I have defended it twice with very good success, and this is a third time; and I would make the best defence this case would bear now. And I must own to you, that the course of our evidence, we did propose to ourselves, is so far broke, by the first determination you were pleased to make, that I cannot venture upon the rest of the defence, if so be your pleasure be not to admit of this matter.

Sir R. Gwynne. You may by any solicitors or agents, that were present when these witnesses were examined in the House of Lords, prove what they swore there.

Mr. Dodd. We apprehend you have already determined the matter, and we cannot now meddle with it; but if I apprehend it aright from the chair, it is your opinion, that we may produce the solicitors and agents, to give an account of what was sworn in the House of Lords. Now we are under this disability by your determination, that we, relying upon what you have determined against us, are not prepared with our solicitors, or others, to give evidence of that matter, but in a little time they will be able to give an account of what was then sworn.

Mr. Atwood. It seems they want to be taught their lesson.

* And then the Counsel withdrew, and the Committee proceeded upon the Bill clause by clause, and went through it, and ordered the same to be reported; which was done accordingly; upon which the Bill passed.*

410. Proceedings against Sir WILLIAM WILLIAMS; bart. for the Publication of Dangerfield's Narrative: 36 CHARLES II.*—7 WILLIAM III. A. D. 1684—1695.

AN INFORMATION against Sir WILLIAM WILLIAMS, for Printing and Publishing a seditious Libel, reflecting upon the Duke of York, the King's Brother.

REX v. WILLIAMS. Trin. 36 Car. 2.

Midd. ss. QUOD Willielmus Williams nuper de Westm' in Com' Midd' Ar' existens homo perniciosus et seditiosus ac machinans et false malitiose et seditiose intendens pacem et comin'

* Mr. Wynn, in his learned "Argument upon the Jurisdiction of the House of Commons," p. 31, notices, that the "Bill of Rights, after enumerating among the invasions of the constitution, 'the prosecutions in the court of King's-bench, for matters and causes cognizable only in parliament,' declares, 'that the freedom of speech and debates, or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament.'" And he says, "That this declaration applies specifically to the cases of the prosecutions of the Speaker and Sergeant [Topham] will be evident, when it is observed, that no other cases had occurred in the reigns of Charles 2, or James 2, where it had been attempted to question, in any other court or place, the freedom of proceedings in parliament."

It is observable (though I recollect not to have met with the observation) that the House of Commons appears to have been desirous that the Bill of Rights should abolish all informations in the court of King's-bench.

On January 29, 1688-9, that House appointed a committee (of which Mr. Pollexfen, sir George Treby, sir Edward Seymour, Mr. Finch, sir William Williams, sir Robert Sawyer, Mr. Sommers, Mr. Eyres, and other eminent persons were members) "to bring in general Heads of such things as are absolutely necessary to be considered for the better securing our Religion, Laws, and Liberties."

tranquillitat' hujus Regn' Angl' Inquietate molestare et perturbare ac seditiohem discord' et malevolentiam int' dict' Dom' Regem nunc et subdit' suos hujus Regn' Angl' facere movere excitare et procurare necnon serenissim' et excellentissim' principem Jacobum ducem Ebor' et Alban' unicum fratrem dict' Dom' Regis in maximum odium contempt' et vilipendin' cum dicto Dom' Rege et ligeis et fidel' subdit' ipsius Dom' Regis inducere ac inferre

On the second of February, sir George Treby reported, That the committee had agreed upon several Heads, which he read in his place and delivered in: after some amendments made to some of them they were agreed to by the House. The twenty-second head is "Informations in the court of King's-bench to be taken away."

On the fourth of February, it was, among other things, referred to the same committee "to distinguish such of the general heads as are introductory of new laws from those which are declaratory of ancient rights." In the afternoon of the 7th of February, sir George Treby accordingly made a report, in which, among the practices which are declared to be "utterly and directly contrary to the known laws and statutes and freedom of this realm," he enumerated the "causing Informations to be brought and prosecuted in the court of King's-bench, for matters and causes cognizable only in parliament:" and, among the new laws by which it was proposed and advised to provide for making a more firm and perfect settlement of their religion, laws, and liberties, and for remedy of several defects and inconveniences, one was "for taking away Informations in the court of King's-bench;" and to this report the House agreed.

Ultimately the suppression of Informations in the King's-bench was not specifically introduced into the Bill of Rights, but it seems probable that it was one of the articles concern-et ad nequissimas nefandissimas et diabolicas intentiones machinacion' et practicacon' suas pred' perimplend' perficiend' et ad effect' rediing which the two Houses disagreed, and which were discussed in the conferences between them, respecting that most important statute during its progress. The House of Lords, it seems, indeed objected altogether to the clause reciting the prosecution of Informations in the King's-bench, for matters cognizable only in parliament, &c.* they alledged that they did not fully apprehend what was meant by it, nor what instances there had been of it, which therefore they desired might be explained if the Commons should think fit to insist farther on it. The Commons answered, that they thought it a very high grievance and a matter of the greatest consequence to the Lords, and to themselves, that matters and causes cognizable only in parliament, should be drawn into examination in inferior courts. See Commons Journals, February 8, 11, 12. On the last of which days sir William Williams was added to the managers of the conference, and he reported the proceedings upon the free conference which was had on that day, although Mr. Sommers had reported the proceedings of the ordinary conference which had taken place on the same day. It appears as if the two Houses had adjusted by a compromise their disagreements upon the subject.

According to Mr. Barrington "the attorney general's power of filing Informations ex officio, seems to be borrowed from the civil law, where there is always a purti publique, or public prosecutor." Obs. on West. primer.

In a recent Case (Rex v. Mary Jones and another, Mich. Term, 52 G. 3.) that most upright and learned magistrate, Mr. Justice Bayley, seemed to be of opinion that Mr. Attorney's power of filing Informations ex officio was sometimes exercised vexatiously.

The question, Whether commitments by a house of parliament may be examined by a court of law? has been frequently agitated. See the Cases of captain Streater, vol. 5, p. 365, of Richard Thompson, vol. 8, p. 1, of Benjamin Flower, A. D. 1799, the recent Case of sir Francis Burdett, and the other cases and authorities, particularly the learned investigations of Mr. Hargrave, therein referred to. In vol. 5 of this Collection, p. 948, upon a motion for a Habeas Corpus, it was held by Newdigate, a Common-law judge of B. R. that a prisoner committed by the parliament could not be discharged by an inferior court. The following Report of Pritchard's Case, 17 Car. 2. B. R. I have extracted from 1 Keble 871, 884, 837. The same case is shortly and ill reported in sir Thomas Raymond 120, 1 Lev. 125, Siderf. 265.

"The House of Lords ordered him to be committed, and delivered the order to the Sergeant at Arms to take him, and after the House prorogued he was taken; and detained till fees

paid, and security given to appear the next sessions; which per curiam is illegal, and such order cannot be executed afterwards. But by Hyde chief justice, the chancellor of course may cause their orders to be executed. But by Twisden, he must have a special order from the House to execute their orders. But by Keeling and Windham, the House of Lords is not like other courts, but is wholly determined by prorogation, and ceaseth till the next session. And so was Streater's Case, [See it as above referred to] on Habeas Corpus 1654: he was delivered, the parliament being determined, against which he spake those words, for which he was committed. Adjournatur.

"The return of the Habeas Corpus was, that he was committed March 27 to the Fleet, till fees paid, being taken into custody by Lee, Sergeant at Arms of the House of Lords, (not saying when but only) by their order dated 11 Feb. Coleman excepted for the uncertainty; it doth not appear what the fees are, nor who should be judge of them. Also the commitment is not only for fees, but till security given to appear the next sessions. Adjournatur.

"The parliament by prorogation is quasi ended: and were the prisoner committed for a contempt, the court might in convenient time have bailed him. But here the want of the day of the taking is material, being in the knowledge of the Sergeant at Arms; therefore it shall be presumed the taking was after the rising of the parliament, which court consists of King, Lords, and Commons; at which time all the privileges of each particular House cease, and each prorogation is a new parliament; and the bill twice read before must now be begun anew; and therefore we cannot bail him till the next parliament, but the party ought to be discharged. Parliament, Br. 86, and 4 Inst. 1 H. 7. 20, in Flowerdieu's Case. By Windham, recognizance taken by parliament is fruitless by their session, but judgment given there is delegated to the chancellor, being as a thing finished; but this is but process. And by Twisden, its all one whether he were taken sitting the parliament, or after, for that is but a contempt to them, which this court may discharge: and in Chenye's Case, in this very parliament, I heard it declared, that whatever is done, must at the next prorogation be begun anew, except in error, where scire facias may be returnable at the next sessions, being grounded on judicial record. But this is but matter of contempt, which is discharged by the session of parliament. Hyde chief justice, 22 Ed. 3. 23, determines this Case: and omnes in omnibus concurred clearly that he ought to be discharged."

in Com^o Midd^o Vi et Annis, &c. falso illicitè injuriè nequit^è malitiose scandalose seditiose et illibolice pro Lucro suo proprio inprimi et publicari causavit et appunctuavit quoddam falsum scandalosum seditiosum et defamator^{um} Libell^{um} intitulat^{um} 'The Information of Thomas Dangerfield gent.' in quo quidam libello int^{er} al^{ia} continet^{ur} prout sequitur. The Information of Thomas Dangerfield gent. About the months September or October 1679, when Mrs. Cellier and myself (pred^o Thomas Dangerfield in informatione pred^o mentionat^{ur} innuendo) waited on my lord Peterborough (Henricum Comit^{em} Peterborough innuendo) to be introduced to his highness the duke of York, his lordship inquired of me (prefat^{us} T. D. innuendo) if the lady Powis had given me (pred^o T. D. iterum innuendo) any directions how to discourse the duke (pred^o Jacob^{um} Ducem Ebor^{um} innuendo) I (seipsum pred^o T. D. innuendo) replied she (pred^o ducissam Powis innuendo) had: then he (pred^o Com^{ite} Peterborough innuendo) desired to know what they were, upon which, I (pred^o T. D. innuendo) shewed his lordship a little book, in which was contained a scheme, and the pretended discovery, which I (pred^o T. D. innuendo) had made in the Presbyterian Plot, which book his lordship carefully perused, and finding some omission therein, he (pred^o Com^{ite} Peterborough innuendo) ordered me (pred^o T. D. innuendo) to write, while his lordship did dictate to me (seipsum T. D. innuendo) those words, videl^{icet}, that the Presbyterian party intended to make an insurrection in the north, and so to join with an army of the Scots: Immediately after this his lordship took us (pred^o T. D. et Margaretam Cellier in Informatione pred^o silit^{ur} mentionat^{ur} innuendo) into the duke's closet (pred^o Ducem Ebor^{um} innuendo) at Whitehall, where we (pred^o T. et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) both kissed his hand (manus pred^o Jacobi Ducis Ebor^{um} innuendo) and me (pred^o T. innuendo) he (pred^o Ducem Ebor^{um} innuendo) took from the ground, for I (pred^o T. innuendo) was kneeling; then I (pred^o T. innuendo) gave his highness (pred^o Ducem innuendo) the aforesaid little book, which he (pred^o Ducem innuendo) after some short perusal thereof thanked me (pred^o T. innuendo) for, and also for my diligence for the Catholic cause, and did advise me (pred^o T. innuendo) to go on, and wished good success to all my undertakings, adding in these very words (viz.) That the Presbyterian Plot was a thing of most mighty consequence, and if well managed, would be very conducing to the safety of the Catholic cause, and F(ictum Ducem innuendo) do not question but the effects of it will answer your expectation, especially in the northern parts, where I (pred^o Ducem innuendo) am well assured the major part of the gentry are my (pred^o Ducem innuendo) friends, and have given sufficient demonstration of their affections to me (pred^o Ducem innuendo) as also of their intentions to prosecute this Presbyterian Plot to the utmost, for they are no strangers to the design; Immediately after this his highness (pred^o Ducem Ebor^{um} innuendo) ordered Mrs. Cellier and myself, in the hearing of my lord Peterborough, who was privy to the whole discourse, to be very careful of what we (pred^o Thomam Dangerfield et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) communicated to the persons who were to be the witnesses in that new Plot, lest we (pred^o Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) should be caught in the subornation, and so bring a terrible odium upon the Catholics, and make ourselves (pred^o Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) incapable of any further service: After this the duke (pred^o Ducem innuendo) informed us (pred^o Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) that in a month or two's time, the commissions would be ready, but ordered us (pred^o Thomam et Magistrum innuendo) in the mean time to bring our part to bear with the commissioners, and particularly ordered me (p^{ro}d^o Thomam innuendo) to find out some persons (as there were enough sure amongst the Catholics, as well as elsewhere) which were fit to be trusted, and that should accept of such commissions, which should be delivered to them by a person appointed for that purpose, but not to be known to them to be any other but a Presbyterian, so that when occasion should require, they might, together with those which we (pred^o Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) then had, be ready to swear in the Plot, and that the Presbyterians were raising forces against the king and government, and had given out commissions to that purpose; and in order to this, I (pred^o Thomam innuendo) did in some short time after procure one Bedford, Curtis, Grey, Hill, Hopkins, and others, to accept of such commissions when they should be ready, whose business in the mean time was to spread reports in the coffee houses, that the Popish Plot was a contrivance of the Presbyterians, &c. Now for our (pred^o Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) encouragement in the prosecution of that sham plot, the duke (pred^o Ducem Ebor^{um} innuendo) promised, that he would take care that money should not be wanting, but ordered us (p^{ro}d^o Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) to use all the expedition the thing would allow, to make a discovery thereof to the king's attorney: after which, the duke (p^{ro}d^o Ducem Ebor^{um} innuendo) said, the Catholic party would be eased of the charge, in regard he (pred^o Ducem innuendo) was sure it would be defrayed some other way: then the duke (pred^o Ducem innuendo) made divers vows, and bitter execrations, to stand by us (pred^o Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) in the thing, and engaged on his honour to be our rewarder, adding, that such considerable services were not to be slighted, and further promised, that to whose lot soever it should happen to be imprisoned, according to their fidelity and stedfastness in the cause, so much the more should their reward be augmented, and that all care possible should be used to support and preserve them, but particularly desiring we (pred^o Thomam innuendo) to keep up to the courageous and active character which his highness (p'd' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) had heard of me, all which I, (pred' Thomam innuendo) promised to do, whereupon we (pred' Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) withdrew to the lord Peterborough's, where we (pred' Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) continued till his lordship (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) had introduced sir Robert Payton to the duke, which being done, his lordship left them together, as he (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) said, and came to us (pred' Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) where, amongst other discourse, his lordship (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) told me (pred' Thomam innuendo) I had a great opportunity to make my fortune what I would myself, if I (pred' Thomam iterum innuendo) would but follow the advice of his master the duke of York, who, as his lordship said, would certainly be my king in a very short time, adding, that I (pred' Thomam innuendo) must be resolute in my undertakings, for said he (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) much affects resolution, but hates mortally the timorous man; then I (pred' Thomam innuendo) answered his lordship (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) that I (pred' Thomam innuendo) valued not my life, provided to lose it would be serviceable to the duke's interest, at which expression he (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) seemed fully satisfied, and from that time called me (pred' Thomam innuendo) captain Willoughby, and at our (p'd' Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) coming away, his lordship (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) gave particular order to his servants, that at what time soever, day or night, either Mrs. Cellier or myself (pred' Thomam innuendo) should come to speak with his lordship, we should be forthwith admitted, and then we (pred' Thomam et Magistrum Cellier innuendo) parted. Some short time after, I (pred' Thomam innuendo) went to wait on his lordship (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) from the lady Powis at midnight, to desire him (pred' Com' Peterborough innuendo) to move the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) to get me (pred' Thomam innuendo) with all expedition to the king, for then I was ready. About four days after this his lordship sent for me, and took me (pred' Thomam innuendo) to the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) again, who was in his closet at Whitehall, and the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) told me (pred' Thomam innuendo) I must prepare myself to wait on the king, to give his majesty a more particular account of the Presbyterian Plot, than what the little book made mention of, which book the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) said he had given to the king, and that he (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) had so ordered the matter, that I (pred' Thomam innuendo) should be furnished with money to enable me in the prosecution thereof; but his highness (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) charged me to consider well my story, before I (pred' Thomam innuendo) waited on the king; then the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) told me (pred' Thomam innuendo) I had gained by my diligence a good reputation among the Catholics, and that I (p'd' Thom' innuendo) should highly merit by my services to that cause, adding, that I (p'd' Thom' innuendo) should in a short time see the Catholic religion flourish in these kingdoms, and heresy torn up by the roots, and that he (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) had heard of the proposal which had been made me (pred' Thomam innuendo) by the lords Powis and Arundel, about taking off the king (Serenissim' Dom' nostr' Regem innuendo) and of my refusal, as also of what I (pred' Thomam innuendo) had accepted touching my lord Shaftesbury, and of all my transactions in the Presbyterian Plot, saying, in these words, (viz.) If you (pred' Thomam Dangerfield innuendo) value the religion you profess, my interest (Interesse pred' Ducis Ebor' innuendo) as you say you do, and your own future happiness, take my advice (Advisament' pred' Ducis Ebor' innuendo) and depend upon my honour and interest for your advancement. You look like a man of courage and wit, therefore less discourse may serve with you (pred' Thomam innuendo) than another, so that if you will but move by the measures which I (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) will give you (pred' Thomam innuendo) you shall not only escape with safety, but be forward according to the greatness of your actions; to all this, I (pred' Thomam innuendo) replied, I (pred' Thomam innuendo) would stand and fall in the defence of the Roman Catholic religion and his highness's service (servitium pred' Ducis Ebor' innuendo) and was not a little concerned for my refusing to kill the king (Serenissimum Dominum nostrum Regem innuendo) whom I (p'd' Thomam innuendo) was then well satisfied by my ghostly father, stood condemned as an heretic; but this I (pred' Thomam innuendo) did offer, that if his highness (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) would command me (pred' Thomam innuendo) to the attempt, I would not fail, either to accomplish it, or lose my life, upon which the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) gave me twenty guineas, and said, if I (pred' Thomam innuendo) would be but vigorous in what I (pred' Thomam innuendo) had undertaken already, he (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) would so order it, that my life should not be in the least danger, adding, in these words, (viz.) We are not to have men taken in such daring actions, but to have them make an effectual dispatch and be gone, upon which I (pred' Thomam innuendo) took my leave. Some short time after this, when I (pred' Thomam innuendo) was ready to convey the letters into colonel Mansel's chamber, I (pred' Thomam innuendo) went to the lord Peterborough, who brought me to the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) to whom I told how I (pred' Thomam innuendo) was ready to fix the letters in the colonel's chamber, so, which his highness (pred' Duce[m] Ebor' innuendo) answered, I (pred' Thomam innuendo) must make haste, that I (ipsum Thomam iterum innuendo) might be impowered to make a general search of the like nature, for said the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' iterum innuendo) in these words, (viz.) Since I (pred' Ducem Ebor' iterum innuendo) saw you (pred' Thomam iterum innuendo) last, the lady Powis has informed me (pred' Ducem Ebor' iterum innuendo) that there are abundance of letters and witnesses ready, so that it is now high time to begin; by this time there was some great man come to wait on the duke, so I withdrew. About four days after this, when I (ipsum Thomam Dangerfield iterum innuendo) had been pressing earnestly with Mr. Secretary Coventry for a warrant, and could not prevail, I (ipsum Thomam iterum innuendo) went to the lord Peterborough, and did desire his lordship to make application to the duke (pred' Ducem Ebor' iterum innuendo) to use some means for a warrant, to which his lordship (pred' Comit' Peterborough innuendo) answered, it was my fault there was not a warrant granted, and that the duke (prefat' Ducem Ebor' iterum innuendo) was sensible of my neglecting to make an affidavit, so that now he (pred' Ducem Ebor' innuendo) did begin to doubt my courage. This Case was argued on behalf of sir William Williams, by sir Robert Atkyns, who appears to have volunteered his assistance in the conduct of the cause, as one which concerned every Commoner in England, although he was at that time resident in the country, and had so entirely retired from the profession, that he was obliged to borrow a gown to appear in court. For this information, I am indebted to the kindness of Mr. Williams Wynn, who possessed some letters from sir Robert (by an unfortunate accident they have been burned lately), upon the subject.

SIR ROBERT ATKYNS'S ARGUMENT.*

The Information taken singly by itself, (without the Defendant's Plea) contains a very severe and heavy charge in it, against the defendant, set out with the highest aggrava-

* From a Tract printed in 1689, intitled, "The Power, Jurisdiction, and Privilege of Parliament; and the Antiquity of the House of Commons asserted: occasioned by an Information in the King's-bench, by the Attorney General, against the Speaker of the House of Commons. By sir Robert Atkyns."

In the case of the King against Wright, 8 Term Rep. 293, it was argued in support of a motion for a criminal information against a bookseller for printing and publishing a Report of the House of Commons [which Report had in fact been previously printed by order of the House,] reflecting on the character of Mr. Horne Tooke, that the House of Commons themselves were not justified in directing or giving a sanction to the publication of the libel; or at all events they had no legal authority to direct or sanction the publication of matter that amounts to a libel on any individual, beyond an entry on its own Journals, or for the use of the members of the House; but even if they possessed such an extraordinary power, the House having in that instance only directed an entry on its own Journals, and ordered the printing (by their own printer) of as many copies of this Report as were sufficient for the use of the members of the House, that did not give the defendant, a stranger, the right of printing and circulating copies of it, so as to furnish him with a legal defence either to an action for damages, or to an information or in-tions: and this against a gentleman of the profession of the law, and one who hath had the honour to be Speaker of several parliaments.

We may observe in this Information the worst of adjectives or epithets fastened upon the defendant: it stiles him, a pernicious and seditious man. It charges him with the worst of actions; sc. stirring up of sedition, disturbing the peace of the kingdom, endeavouring to procure ill-will between the king and his subjects; and to bring the duke of York into contempt with the king and his subjects; and with the printing and publishing a false, scandalous, seditious and infamous libel. These crimes and actions are set out in Mr. Attorney's Information with the worst of adverbs; and with a great heap of them together; viz. That these things were done by the defendant, falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, wickedly, maliciously, scandalously, seditiously and devilishly. And to add (if possible) to all this, it is charged to be done out of one of the basest principles: out of malice; and for one of the most sordid and odious ends, viz. For his own lucre.

It may further be observed, That the Information does not alledge or affirm, that there is any such person in the world as Thomas Dangerfield (though it mention the name;) nor that any such person did ever frame or draw up any such scandalous and libellous book or information, as is mentioned in Mr. Attorney's information. But (for all that Mr. Attorney shews) the name of Thomas Dangerfield may be but a feigned or borrowed name, dictment for a libel. The House of Commons were not justified in making the Report in question, inasmuch as it reflected on innocent individuals. It is the undoubted right of every subject, who is accused of a crime, to be tried by a jury of the country; and as it appeared on the former part of the publication in question, that Mr. H. Tooke had been acquitted by a jury, it was a foul libel on him to say that he was guilty of the crime of which he had been acquitted. And it was mentioned, that in this case of R. v. sir W. Williams, where an information was filed against the defendant, who had been speaker of the House of Commons, for publishing a libel, "Dangerfield's Narrative," it was determined by this court that the defendant was not justified in publishing, though he had published as speaker, and by order of the House of Commons. This determination still remains in force, notwithstanding several attempts in parliament to get rid of it; and sir Robert Atkyns in his "Treatise on the Power, Jurisdiction and Privilege of Parliament," vindicates the legality of this determination. This decision therefore proves, that the House of Commons themselves cannot justify the publishing of any matter reflecting on an innocent individual.

But by lord Kenyon in giving judgment, "The case of R. v. sir W. Williams, which was principally relied upon, happened in the worst of times: but that has no relation to the and that the defendant may be the author and composer of this libel, as well as the publisher. And one would not imagine, upon reading Mr. Attorney's information, that any thing of these matters thus charged, was ever transacted in parliament: but Mr. Attorney gives them another date, both of time and place. He does not lay the scene at Westminster, but at St. Martin's in the fields, and he times it to the year 1682, whereas there was no parliament in that year. This was wisely done.

Thus the case stands upon Mr. Attorney's information, and should it be left here, it would be a woeful case with the defendant; but as Solomon says in his Proverbs; the first in his own cause is just, then comes the other party and enquires into him. The plain English of which is, as we used to say, 'One tale is good till another is told.'

The Defendant, in his Plea, states the matter truly and fully, and tells us, that there is nothing true in this Information exhibited against him, save only that there was such an Information of Dangerfield's, but that the defendant was none of the author. It was drawn up and delivered into both houses of parliament, first to the Lords, upon oath; and there ordered to be entered in their Journal: and afterwards delivered at the bar of the House of Commons. And that the Defendant, being Speaker of the Commons, he examined that Information of Dangerfield's, and directed the printing of it: but it was all done in time of parliament, and ordered to be done by the House of Commons.

present case. There the publication was the paper of a private individual; and under pretence of the sanction of the House of Commons, an individual published: but this is a proceeding by one branch of the legislature, and therefore we cannot enquire into it. I do not say that cases may not be put in which we would not enquire, whether or not the House of Commons were justified in any particular measure, if, for instance, they were to send their serjeant at arms to arrest a counsel here who was arguing a case between two individuals, or to grant an injunction to stay the proceedings here in a common action, undoubtedly we should pay no attention to it. But the Report in question, being adopted by the House at large, is a proceeding of those who by the constitution are the guardians of the liberties of the subject; and we cannot say that any part of that proceeding is a libel." And Grose, J. added, "It must be remembered that that [the case of sir W. W.] was declared by a great authority, to be a disgrace to the country."

It is remarkable that in this case of Rex v. Wright (8 Term Rep. p. 294) the Reporter represents the learned persons who argued in support of the application for an Information to have stated that sir Robert Atkyns, in his Treatise on the Power, Jurisdiction, and Privilege of Parliament, vindicates the legality of the determination of B. R. in sir William Williams's case.

By this narrative of the Plea, all the unlucky adjectives and untoward adverbs are thrown off, and the defendant cleared from the malice. Nor is it true that is said in Mr. Attorney's Information, to be done for the defendant's lucre. He did it out of obedience to the parliament; and he denies that he made any profit by it, but according to the order of the House; the profit of the printing was to Dangerfield. And all this is confessed by the demurrer.

The plea consists of these parts: matter of fact, matter of record, and flatter of law. It begins with matter of law; and sets down the law and custom of parliament. Then he does assume the matter of fact, and of record, and brings them home to that law. He tells us, That, for certain, there was such a thing as a Popish Plot, and that it was a desperate, horrid, devilish plot. And here all the bitter adjectives and adverbs would have been well bestowed, rather than upon the Speaker of that parliament; which parliament with such admirable zeal and courage did prosecute some of those plotters.

He sets forth, that the lord Stafford was in parliament convict before the Lords of high treason, committed in that plot; and he was convicted at the prosecution of the Commons, according to the law, and custom of parliament. He says, that the king in his Speech to the Lords and Commons, charged them to make a further strict and impartial enquiry after this plot. Then the plea tells us, They did accordingly make an impartial enquiry, and divers others were thereupon convicted of that plot.

It now appears plainly, that all that is contained in this Plea was not only done during the parliament, but by the parliament itself; and that the defendant only acted as Speaker. And it is worth the remembering too, that there has been another parliament since, namely that at Oxford. And though all that was done by him in the parliament at Westminster, was then very well known and remembered; and though he were so pernicious and seditious a man, in the opinion of Mr. Attorney's information, yet the world had a better opinion of him, for he was chosen Speaker again, in that latter parliament, and his majesty approved of him.

At last, the defendant concludes his plea to the jurisdiction of this court: viz. That what he had so acted, being acted in parliament time, and by order of parliament, he demands the judgment of this court, whether they will take consance of it.

The Attorney General demurred to it.

The subject matter of this record is a very large field, viz. The Power and Jurisdiction of Parliament, and yet I shall have but a narrow path to walk in. It is a very nice and tender point: it is my case, as it was heretofore with those that were to undergo the old Saxon trial by fire or daub (per ferrum candens) if I tread aside and make a wrong step, I may do myself a mischief. But by the grace of God, I shall take care neither on the one hand to give any just occasion of offence to those above me; nor yet on the other hand, shall I be wanting in that duty I owe to the kingdom's cause. I shall speak my mind freely in it, and leave the success to God. And while I must argue for the freedom of acting in parliament, and speak for the Speaker, and endeavour to maintain their rights and privileges, I may justly claim that ordinary and reasonable privilege for myself, that if I happen unawares to misplace a word, or to be misapprehended in what I say, I may have the liberty instantly to explain myself. And I take myself to be under the protection of the law, while I argue the law.

In arguing this case, I shall make three points, or lay down these three positions:

1. That what is done in this case, is done in a course of justice, and that in the highest court of the nation (the parliament) and according to the law and custom of parliament.

2. That however, that which is done in this case, is not to be imputed to the defendant, who acted in it but as the servant or minister of the parliament, though in a very honourable station.

3. That these being matters transacted in parliament, and by the parliament, this court of the King's-bench ought not to take consance of them; nor hath it any jurisdiction to judge or determine of them.

As to the first, I shall frame this syllogism: No indictment or action lies for what is done in a course of justice, or in a way of legal proceeding. But what has been done by the defendant, and by the House of Commons in this case, hath been done in a course of justice, and in a way of legal proceedings, and that in the highest court of the nation. Therefore what hath been here done, is neither subject to an action or indictment.

I shall first prove the major proposition: That no indictment or action lies for what is done in a course of justice.

The reason of the law is, That the law and courts of law, and justice, and remedies against wrong, ought to be free and open; and no man must be frightened nor discouraged from a legal prosecution of his right.

To prove this, I shall make bold to cite the opinion and authority of a town-clerk. The report of it is in the Holy Scripture, the truest and highest report. It was the opinion and advice of the town-clerk of Athens. We read it in the Acts of the Apostles, and it instantly stilled and quieted a mighty uproar, it had so much weight in it. 'If any man,' says he, 'have any matter against another, the law is open, and there are deputies; let them say he, 'impend one another.'

The parties to a suit in law, the counsel, the attorney, the witness, the officers, the jury, are all under a protection of the law for what they do or say in the prosecution of a suit in law, or any legal proceeding.

I will put some few cases suited to every one of these who are the several actors in a suit.

By the stat. of 3 E. 1, called the stat. of W. 1, he that reports slanderous news, whereby discord may grow between the king and his people, or the great men of the realm, is to be imprisoned, till the first author of the tale be brought into the court. This comes near our case; and this is all the punishment that the statute inflicts upon this crime of reporting such a slander.

Sir E. Coke in his exposition upon this stat. in his 2d Instit. 228, says, That this stat. extends only to extrajudicial slanders: And therefore, says he, if any man bring an appeal of murder or robbery against any of the peers of the realm, although the charge be false, yet shall not the peer have an action De Scandalis Magnatum, neither at the common law, nor by this stat. of W. 1, nor any other stat. for any such appeal, nor for affirming the matter of it to be true, either to counsel or attorney, or for speaking the same in evidence to a jury.

It was the lord Beauchamp's case, 13 H. 7, Keilway, 26, 27, 28. Sir Richard Crofts sued a writ of forgery of false deeds against the lord Beauchamp: The lord Beauchamp sues sir Richard Crofts in an action De Scandalis Magnatum, upon the statute of 2 R. 2, c. 5, for this slander, in charging him with forgery. Keble, of counsel for the lord B. admits, that at the common law no action did lie for this slander, it being in a course of legal proceeding. But Keble was of opinion, that this statute of 2 R. 2, did give the action in such a case, though it were a slander occasioned by a suit. But by Brian and the rest of the court, the action De Scand. Magnatum, did not lie for such a slander, though the matter of it were false, because it is in prosecution of a lawful suit. With this agrees Boulton and Clapham's case in justice Jones's Rept. 431, and Weston's case, Crok. Jac. 432.

Sir E. Coke puts the difference in his 2d Inst. before cited. If a man prefer a bill in the Star Chamber against a great peer, and charge him with forgery or perjury, no action De Scand. Magnat. lies, it being in a legal proceeding, and in a matter wherein that court had a jurisdiction. But if in such a bill in the Star Chamber a peer be accused for felony (which that court hath nothing to do with, nor no jurisdiction in) this (says sir E. Coke) has not the face of a legal proceeding, and shall not excuse a man in an action De Scand. Magn. sir Rich. Buckley's case, 4 Rep. 14, Cro. Eliz. 230, the same case. Yet where there is but a mistake of the jurisdiction, if the suit be once well commenced, some little irregularities in the proceedings shall not expose them to the action De Scand. Magn. as, if a man bring an appeal of murder, and through the ignorance of the party, or his clerk, or attorney, it is made returnable in the Common Pleas, where they have no jurisdiction in it: yet no action De Scand. Magn. lies for this, the suit being well begun, and it being in the nature of a lawful suit. So says sir E. Coke.

In the case of a counsellor pleading for his client.

He likewise in what he affirms or pleads for his client, if it be pertinent to the matter of the suit, and he has it by instruction from his client, he shall be protected against an action of slander for it. This is a point that may concern many of us.

It was the case of sir Hen. Mountagu recorder of London, M. 3 Jac. Cro. fo. 90, in B. R. Ral. Brook brought an action upon the case for slander against sir H. M. for saying of the pl. Brook, that he had committed felony. Sir H. M. pleaded specially to the action, That he was a counsellor at law, and was retained against the pl. Brook, and at the trial in giving of evidence to the jury, he did indeed speak those words; but averred that they were pertinent to the matter, and were part of his instruction. It was resolved upon a demurrer, That the plea was good, the words being pertinent, though they were false. And there is a further reason given by the court in that case, viz. the words appear not to be spoken out of malice: and no actions of this sort, nor will any indictment of this nature lie, unless there be malice in the defendant; and where there is any justifiable occasion of speaking words that a man in discharge of his function or calling is led by the subject-matter of discourse, as a preacher, or pleader, or the like, to speak words in such case; it shall be presumed they were not spoken out of malice.

In the case of an Attorney.

Sir E. Coke in his 2d Instit. in his exposition of the stat. of Articuli super Chartas, 28 E. 1, c. 10, tells us, That in the very next year after the making of that stat. viz. 29 E. 1, Will. de Weston brought an Action of Conspiracy in the King's-bench, against William of Hempswell, parson of Newton, and John of Malden, parson of Askerby, for causing the plaintiff to be cited before the archdeacon of Lincoln for a trespass, whereof he had been acquitted in the king's court. John of Malden pleaded, That he was 'Communis Advocatus pro suo dando,' and so justified as an attorney; and it was found the parson was Communis Advocatus, and so not guilty of the conspiracy.

In the case of a Witness: For what he says as a witness, or for what is said against him, to disable him from being a witness, or to take off his credit, no action of slander will lie.

35 H. 6, 14. In an action of conspiracy, one of the defendants justified as being a witness, to the jury.

Crok. Jac. 432. In the King's-bench, Weston against Dobneet, in an action for slander. There was a suit in the spiritual court, and the plaintiff that brought the action of slander, was produced as a witness in that cause, and the defendant in that suit in the spiritual court, put in exceptions against him, That he had been perjured, and therefore ought not to be used as a witness. Thereupon, Weston the witness, brought this action for that slander. And after arguments, the whole court held, that the action of slander did not lie for this manner of slander, because it was in a course of justice, and not ex malicia.

In a Writ of Conspiracy. One of the defendants pleaded, that he was one of the indictors. Judgment, si actio. And the plea is allowed, 20 H. 6, 5. and 33.

Nay though it be not in a course of justice, in a suit of law, yet if a man be in the doing of his duty, and in discharge of his function and his lawful calling, and in discoursing of a subject proper for his function, and enforcing of every man's duty of avoiding of any sin, and in pursuit of it, tells a story which he takes up upon trust, and does not know it to be false, and it prove at last to be utterly untrue, and an innocent person is highly slandered by it, yet he shall not be subject to an action of slander for it. The occasion of speaking shall clear him from the malice, without which the action will not lie.

In the Book of Martyrs, written by Fox, there is a story of one Greenwood, who lived in Suffolk, that he had perjured himself before the bishop of Norwich, in testifying against a martyr that was burnt in queen Mary's time: and, says Fox, this Greenwood afterwards, by the just judgment of God, had his bowels rotted in him, and so he died.

This story by Fox in his Book of Martyrs, was utterly false of Mr. Greenwood, and after the printing of that Book of Martyrs, Mr. Greenwood was living in that very same parish.

One Prist a parson happened to be presented to the living of that parish where this Mr. Greenwood then dwelt; and 27 Eliz. in one of his first sermons, happened to inveigh against the sin of perjury; to which his text did lead him; and the better to deter the people from the sin of perjury, he told this story out of Fox's Book of Martyrs, and named the very man Mr. Greenwood; and Mr. Greenwood himself was then in the church, and heard this story told of himself, but the preacher knew it not, but thought the story to be true. Greenwood brings an action of slander against Prist the preacher; and upon the trial of the cause before the L. C. J. Wray, the case appearing to be thus, he directed the jury to find for the defendant, for that it appeared it was not done out of malice: And C. J. Popham affirmed it to be good law, it being a matter delivered after his occasion, as matter of story. This case is cited by sir E. C. in sir Henry Mountagu's case, before mentioned. Crook. Jac. & 90. With this agrees the case of the lord Cromwel, against Denny a vicar, 4 Rep. 13. b. in an action de Scand. Magn.

There is a case in many circumstances of it much resembling our case.—It was the case between Smith and Crashaw, and others, M. 20 Jac. in the King's bench, in sir Jeff. Palmer's Rep. 315. An action upon the case is there brought against the defendants, for maliciously causing the plaintiff to be indicted of treason; upon which indictment the grand jury found an ignoramus. To this action the defendants pleaded not guilty, and were found guilty. It was moved in arrest of judgment; That to accuse one for treason was not actionable, for the safety of the king and state: For if a man be subject to an action for it, it will be a means that treason shall be smothered, and men will not expose themselves to actions, by making such discoveries.

J. Houghton held the action would not lie upon an ignoramus found; for by that the party is not acquitted, but may be indicted again and convicted. But he holds, that if he be indicted, and upon trial 'Legitimo modo acquietatus,' then he shall have an action upon the case, in nature of a conspiracy; for now he is absolutely acquitted and cleared of the accusation, and never can be indicted again for that particular fact.

Dodderidge agrees with Houghton, and puts this case; If an action of conspiracy be brought against a man, for indicting the plaintiff of treason, the defendant may plead specially (and that is the safest way of pleading) that he heard the plaintiff speak such and such treasonable words, and that he thereupon complained to a justice of peace, who committed the plaintiff upon it, and this (says he) shall excuse him.

Ley, Chief Justice, inclines too against the action, and gives a strong reason, because, says he, it is misprision to conceal it; and yet if we allow of this action, it shall be dangerous too to discover it, so that, the defendant does 'Lupum auribus tenere.' And so the judgment was arrested.

But we find, that soon after, when the judges of that court were changed, the same plaintiff brought a new action for the same cause: And it was adjudged for the plaintiff, that the action would lie; but the judges acknowledged it was the first precedent. I suppose it was upon pleading not guilty. Perhaps the court might have been of another opinion, had the defendant pleaded specially, and justified, according to the opinion of judge Dodderidge. The case is Cro. Car. 15; & Latch. 79.

The allowing of such actions of conspiracy, or upon the case, or of indictments or informations for what is said or done in a course of justice, and especially by way of discovery of treasons, would prove of a mischievous consequence; and would be an occasion of multiplying actions against the parties to the suits, against counsel, the attorneys, the witnesses, and so suits would be infinite. As in this present case, should an action be adjudged to lie against the defendant for what he has acted by authority of parliament, what a multitude of actions would be stirred up by it? If the Speaker be liable to this information for what he has done: by the same reason he would be liable to the actions of the several great persons that are said to be defamed by the printing of Dangerfield's Narrative. And if the Speaker be liable, who acted but by command of others, and as their minister, how much more would all those persons be liable, by whose command he so acted? And how many narratives have there been printed, wherein several great persons were severely reflected on, and how many votes of the like nature have there been printed? So that there would arise a multitude of suits.

In sir Drue Drurie's case, 6 Rep. 74. The justices in judging of that case, give a very good rule and caution: they say, That judges ought to have good consideration in all cases depending before them, not only of the present cases, but also of the consequences, what general prejudice may ensue upon them either to the king or subject. The case before you exceedingly requires that consideration. The prejudice to the king will be, that he will not be safe, for by this means men will be discouraged from discovering treasons. The subjects will receive prejudice, by the multitude of suits that will arise by it. This may suffice to be said in maintaining the first proposition, That no information or action lies for what is said or done in a course of justice.

The minor proposition is, That what is here done by the defendant, in this case, was done in a course of justice, and in a legal proceeding, and that in the highest court of the nation, (in the court of parliament) and done according to the law and custom of parliament. This I must make out in the next place.

In the making this out, I am under a necessity of speaking of the transcendent power of the high court of parliament, and I must assert these positions following.

1. That the House of Commons was originally, and from the first constitution of the nation, the representative of one of the three estates of the realm, and a part of the parliament.

2. That what is done by either house, according to the law and usage of parliament, is properly, and in the judgment of law, the act of the whole parliament: And that what concerns the one, must of necessity concern the whole; not merely by consequence, but by an immediate concernment, as being one and entire.

3. That what hath been acted in our present case, by the defendant, as Speaker, and by the House of Commons, whose minister he was, and by whose command and order he did what he did, was done according to the law, and usage of parliament.

As to the first, That the House of Commons was from the first constitution of this kingdom, a part of the parliament. There has been an opinion, that hath been stiffly maintained by some divines, and others of late, that the House of Commons originally were no part of the parliament, at least not as now elected, and consisting of knights, citizens and burgesses; but that their beginning was in the 49th year of king Henry 3, when that king had given a total overthrow at the battle of Evesham, to Symon Montford earl of Leicester and the barons. And that to balance the power of the barons, that king caused the knights, citizens and burgesses to be chosen, and to make a part of the parliament. And from hence some unquiet innovating writers, 'quorum res, et spes ex adulatione pendet;' and who would destroy foundations, and remove our ancient landmarks, and the ancient and just limits and boundaries of power and authority; persons of necessitous estates, or of greedy and ambitious appetites, which drive them upon devising how to do some acceptable service to those that maintain them: or at the best out of unsettled judgments, and too much zeal, which carries them to a contrary extreme. These men conclude, that therefore all the power and privilege the House of Commons claims, is not by prescription, but that they depend upon the king's royal will and pleasure, and had their original by his mere concession, and not by ancient inherent right, nor original constitution, and therefore may be resumed at pleasure.

It was one of the Articles against Dr. Manwaring,* in the parliament 3 Car. 1. for which he was impeached by the Commons, and sentenced by the Lords in parliament; that to subvert, scandalize and impeach the good laws and government of this realm, and the authority of the high court of parliament, and to avert his majesties mind from calling of parliaments, and to alienate his royal heart from his people, he did in his sermons, and in his books printed, endeavour to persuade the king: that his majesty was not bound to observe the laws of the realm concerning the rights and liberties of the subjects: that authority of parliament was not necessary for raising of aids and subsidies. His sentence was imprisonment during pleasure, and but 1,000*l.* fine for this high offence, not 20,000*l.* as hath been of late times. He was to acknowledge his offences, as it should be set down by a committee in writing at the bars of both Houses. He was suspended from his ministry; disabled to preach at court; his books were to be called in, and burnt in London and both the universities.

Power limited by law is safest. It may be thought 'Potestas minor, sed tutior et diuturnior. Ea demum tuta est Potentia, quæ viribus suis modum imponit.'

To encounter these new and upstart opinions, I shall mention an author or two, whom all sober men reverence, that are of a contrary judgment to these new authors. And they are either eminent lawyers, or divines. And I am the more encouraged to do it, because his majesty that now is, hath upon several occasions been pleased graciously to declare, that he holds parliaments to be the best method for healing the distempers of the kingdom, and the only means to preserve the monarchy in credit at home and abroad; and he promises to rule the people by the law.

Hales, that solid learned divine, in his Golden Remains, cites Baldus for it: 'Digna vox est Majestate Regnantis, legibus alligatum principem se profiteri.'

And learned Hooker, that great champion for the discipline, and for the rites and ceremonies of the church, in his Eccles. Polity, delivers his opinion quite contrary to these time-servers. Pag. 87. 'All public government,' (says he) 'of what kind soever, seemeth evidently to have arisen from deliberate advice, consultation and composition between men. That composition signifies the laws.' And, pag. 28. he says further, 'That the power of making laws to command the whole politic societies of men, belongs properly to the same entire societies.'

* See vol. 3, p. 335, of this Collection.

What can be said more in confutation of the book that goes by the name of sir Rob. Filmer's?

The duke of Wittemberg, at the council held at Wormes, when other princes discoursed of many privileges and conveniences of their lordships and territories, openly protested it to be his greatest felicity, that he could 'in aperto campo, et in sinu subditorum suorum dormire. Non eget mauri jaculis, nec arcu,' &c.

I shall further add only the judgment of one or two of our most famous and learned judges concerning this matter.

Fortescue, that was first lord chief justice, and afterwards lord chancellor in the reign of H. 6, in his excellent book in commendation of the Laws of England, affirms this doctrine. 'Ad tutelam legis, subditorum, ac eorum Corporum et honorum erectus, rex est. Et ad hanc potestatem à populo effluxam ipse habet.'

Sir E. Coke, in his 12 Rep. 64. delivered his opinion freely in the Case of Prohibitions, before the king and the lords of the counsel; where there was a warm debate between the judges and Dr. Bancroft, archbishop of Canterbury. And what sir E. C. delivered for law, was with the clear consent of all the justices of England and barons of the exchequer. And there sir E. C. says, it was greatly marvelled at, that the archbishop durst inform the king, That the king had an absolute power and authority by the word of God to determine what causes he pleased in his own person.

And it is admirable to observe with what a true and honest courage that grave chief justice sir E. C. answered the king himself in that debate. When the king was pleased to say, It was treason to affirm, that the king was under the law: The chief justice answered him with the words of an ancient judge, and author of our law (that is, out of Bracton) That the king was sub Deo et Lege. And Fleta, another of our ancient authors in our science, useth words to the same effect. This doctrine differs from some of our late mottos in the Sergeant's rings.

Tacitus in his Annals, gives this excellent commendation of two of the best of the Roman emperors, Nerva and Trajan: 'Res olim insociabiles miscuerunt, imperium et Libertatem.' And that author well observes it as the true case and condition of a people, and a necessary consequence: 'amissa virtute pariter ac Libertate.'

This discourse of mine may seem to some to be a digression; but a man can never have a juster occasion for it than now, and upon this argument and suit: I make that my apology, which I learn from king James, (his majesty's royal grandfather) in his discourse of the Powder-Treason, which proves it the more seasonable. 'There is a time,' saith king James, 'when no man ought to keep silence. It hath' says he 'been ever held as a general rule in all well governed common-wealths, whether Christian, or Ethnicks, That when either their religion, or their king, or their country was in any extreme hazard, no good country-man ought then to withhold either his tongue or his hand according to his calling or faculty, from aiding to repel the injury, repress the violence, and avenge the guilt upon the authors.'

To support the power and privilege of the House of Commons, as being an essential part of the parliament; it is absolutely necessary to make it out against these innovators, that the House of Commons have ever been a part of the parliament, and that they were long before 49 H. 3. Or otherwise they are but precarious in their power and privileges, and enjoy them but of grace.

Every privilege is by prescription, says the lord Dier, fol. 60, à med. in Trewinnard's Case, which I shall have occasion to mention more at large before I have done. And in the same, Dier, fol. 70, in the case of Withers and Iseham, it is held, that a man cannot prescribe to an incident or appendant, nor indeed to any power or authority where the principal thing hath not had a perpetual continuance. Therefore where the beginning of a thing is known, there can be nothing belonging to it by prescription.

In one of our late king's reigns, the House of Commons in an Address of theirs, made mention of their privileges as their ancient and undoubted right and inheritance: but offence was taken at it, and they were told, it had been better if they had said their privileges were derived from the grace and permission of the king and his ancestors.

Now I shall clearly prove, that these Powers and Privileges were indeed their ancient right and inheritance. Which they cannot be unless that House, or the Commons by their representative, have been ever from the beginning of the government a part and member of the parliament. I shall prove it out of several authentic authors of the law, historians and antiquaries, and by a multitude of records, and by divers acts of parliament, which are all the sorts of proof that can be in question of this nature.

The Mirrour of the Justices, of which book sir E. Coke says, That most of it was written before the Conquest (as appears by the book itself) Tho. Horne, a learned man, added much to it in the reign of E. 1, in this Mirrour of the Justices, c. 1, s. 3, it is said, that king Alfred ordained for a perpetual usage, That twice in the year or oftener, if need be, the parliament should assemble. And to let you see of whom that parliament did consist, he tells us in the same chapter by whom the laws were then made. It is (says he) among other things; or-claimed, That no king should change his money, nor impair it, nor increase it, nor make any money but of silver, without the assent of the Lords and 'all the Commons.'

Sir E. C. in his Preface to the 9th Rep. tells us, That tenants in ancient demesne, because by their tenure they were bound to plow and husband the king's demesnes, before the Conquest; And in the Conqueror's time, had divers privileges, which they claimed by prescription; and among others, Not to contribute to the wages of the knights of the shire.

Now the privilege must be as ancient as their tenure and service, for their privilege comes by reason of their service, and their service is known by all to be before the Conquest, in the time of Edward the Confessor, and in the time of the Conqueror. And it is expressly said by this learned and reverend judge, That these tenants, in ancient demesne, claimed this by prescription; and it could not be so, if the wages of the knights of the shire had begun within memory of man, or of any record. Therefore it clearly follows, that knights of the shire to serve in parliament, and the paying wages to them for their service, has been time out of mind, and did not begin 49 H. 3, for that is within time of memory in a legal sense.

The same argument is used by a learned lawyer and antiquary Mr. Lambard, in his Archeion, or Commentary upon the Courts of Justice, fol. 57, and 239, and 245, where he maintains that the parliament was used in the Saxons time, and then consisted of the king, Lords and Commons, as in the time of king Ina. anno 712. He does affirm, That burgesses were chosen to the parliament before the Conquest, fol. 257, 258, 265.

Littleton's Tenures, sect. 164, says, That the ancient towns called burroughs, be the most ancient towns that are in England, for the towns that now are cities or counties, in old time were burroughs, and called burroughs, for that of such old towns came the burgesses to the parliament.

Sir E. C. in his Comment upon this text of Littl. 1 Inst. 110, says it is called Parliamentum, because every member of that court should Parler la ment. Many pretenders to learning, take upon them to censure sir E. C. for this and some other like etymologies, as being ridiculous.

Let me do right to that learned in the law, and (which is more) honest and worthy chief justice, who lives in his useful works, and in that great blessing from God) a numerous and flourishing posterity. It is true, mentum is an ordinary termination of divers words of the neuter gender, and so it is (if we will be strict) in the word parliamentum. But give me leave to say, if it be ridiculous, he is not the first nor the greatest that hath been guilty in this kind; nor is it any proof of illiterateness, nor to be charged only upon the profession of the common law, as if it were an absurdity peculiar to us. For the antiquity of the like etymology, it is of above a thousand years standing; and for the authority of it, it is to be met with in the imperial laws of Justinian the Roman emperor, and the last of the Roman emperors.

Even in the very text of the civil law, it makes the etymology of Testamentum, 'Ex eo appellatur' says the text, 'quod testamenti est.' 'Allusione quadam etymologica ostendit rei et vocis convenientiam,' says Vinus in his comment. fol. 270. 'Nomen ab officio convenienter habet.' And Vinus says further, 'Estque hujusmodi allusiva derivandi ratio, omnibus auctoribus admodum familiaris. In jocis Venustas delectat; qualis est illa Ciceronis, Fides, quia fiat quod dictum est.'

And sir E. C., it may be, was prompted to this etymon from that ancient author, the Mirror of Just. who, in the place I before cited, c. 1, sect. 3, though he did not expressly mention the word parliament, yet speaking of it under another name, he tells us what their property is, viz. 'A parler la ment.'

Thus much by way of digression, for the vindication of that honour of our profession, sir E. C. to whom not only his own, but all posterity are highly obliged, especially our profession.

The Register of Writs, fol. 261. 'Quod homines de antiquo Dominico non contribuant expensis Militum ad Parliamentum venientium.' This is the title of the writ.

The writ itself runs thus, viz.: 'Monstraverunt Nobis' says the king 'Homines et Tenentes de Manerio de S. quod enim de antiquo Dominico Coronæ Angliæ, ut dicitur, quod licet ipsi et eorum Antecessores Tenentes de eodem Manerio à tempore quo non extat memoria, semper hactenus quieti esse consueverunt, de expensis Militum ad Parliamentum Nostra, vel Progenitorum Nostrorum Regum Angliæ pro Communitate dicti Comitatus, venientium, &c.'

M. 11 H. 4, Fitzh. avowry, Placite, 52, (which is said to be the first case in our Year Books, concerning wages to knights of the shire) in a replevin the defendant avows as undersheriff, by virtue of a ferri facias, to levy the wages of the knights of the shire; and he took his distress in a town called Wotton. Tre-main, for the plaintiff, pleads in bar to the avowry, that W. temps d'ont, &c. never paid to the wages of the knights of the shire; and so issue is joined upon that prescription.

M. 14 H. 8, fol. 3, in the Year Book, by Fineux Ch. J. The parliament, says he, consists of the king, the lords and the Commons, and they are by the common law one body corporate. Now, that they cannot be at the common law, but by prescription.

I shall now proceed to prove it by several records of parliament, that the Commons have ever been a part of the parliament, as constituted at this day, of knights, citizens and burgesses.

Ex Rotulo Parliamenti, anno 51 E. 3, Membr. 3, num. 45. Mr. Pryn's 4th part of a Register of Parliamentary Writs, fol. 315, in Sir Rob. Cott. Abr. it is too short; but at large in Mr. Pryn, as before cited.

There is a Petition of the Commons to the king in French.

Item, For that of Common Right (which is the same with the Common Law, in the language of the acts of parliament) of the realm. Of every county of England there were and are chosen two persons to be at the parliament, for the commons of the counties, besides the prelates, dukes, earls and barons, and such as hold by barony; and besides cities and burroughs, who ought to chuse of themselves such as are to answer for them. And such as are chosen for the counties ought to have their accustomed wages, and to have writs to the sheriffs to levy them.

They pray that it be, ordained this present parliament, that the wages be levied of all the commons of the counties, as well within franchises as without, excepting within cities and boroughs, and excepting of those that are summoned by writ (meaning the barons) and their tenants.

Resp. Soit fait come devant ad este use en cest Case.

This was in the time of E. 3, who was but the fourth king in succession from that H. 3, in whose reign our new authors would have our knights, citizens and burgesses to have their original.

And the king's Answer to the Petition of the Commons admits the matter of the Petition to be true, and refers to usage in former times.

In the same fourth part of Mr. Pryn's register, fol. 643, 5 H. 4, rot. parl. num. 71, and 78. On the behalf of Rich. Chedder, esq. menial servant to Tho. Brook, knight for Somersetshire. The Commons petitioned, That whereas, 'After the custom of the realm, all the lords, knights, citizens and burgesses, with their servants coming to parliament, by the king's writ, in coming, going and returning, are under your royal protection,' &c. And this Petition was answered by the act in print.

We may note from hence, that their privilege, and therefore much more their being a part of the high court of parliament, it was by custom of the realm.

I would note further (since I shall have occasion to use it for another very material point) that this custom (though the then present occasion for the mention of it, was from the servant of a member of the Commons House;) yet it is alledged as one entire custom for the whole parliament, viz. all the lords, knights, citizens and burgesses. They are all but one body, one court; and their rights and privileges are entire, and not some for the Lords, and other for the Commons; but it is a joint privilege.

From hence it follows, you cannot invade the privilege of the one House, but you invade both.

Elsing, in his Treatise of Parliaments, fol. 145. It is also in sir Rob. Cott. Abr. fol. 433, but not so full.

In the time of the same king, 5 H. 4. num. 74.

The Commons pray, That whereas according to the custom of the realm, the lords, knights, citizens and burgesses, coming to parliament, ought not for any debate, &c. to be arrested.

It is said to be the custom of the whole realm (that is, the same with the common law) and it is made to be one entire custom, both for the Lords and Commons; and this is for freedom of debates, and not the same with the last that I cited, though in the same year.

39 H. 6, rot. parl. num. 9, on the behalf of Wr. Clerk, burg. of Chippenham in Wiltshire.

And 17 E. 4, rot. parl. num. 36, on the behalf of J. at Will. cit. for Exeter.

In both these cases (though upon occasion of two particular members) yet the whole House of Commons petitioned.

And the petition on the behalf of Wr. Clerk, runs thus; 'That, whereof time that man's mind is not to the contrary, it hath been used,' &c. and then sets forth their privilege.

The petition of the Commons on the behalf of J. at Will. is in these words, viz. 'The freedom of which Commons hath ever afore this time been, and oweth to be, that the knights of the shire, citizens of the cities, and barons of the cinque ports, called to any of the parliaments of your noble progenitors (among other liberties and franchises) have had and used privilege, that any of them should not be attached by their persons or goods in their coming to any such parliament, their abiding, nor returning to their proper homes,' &c.

Their freedom had 'ever' been; then it did not begin first, nor had they themselves their beginning in 49 H. 3.

And 'oweth to be:' then it was not of mere grace, and by permission, but of right it ought so to be.

And two acts of parliament passed upon these two petitions, which confirm the truth of those suggestions.

And another thing I would observe, which does naturally and easily flow from these records, and is very useful to us, viz. That the Commons petitioning to have these freedoms allowed them, does nothing derogate from their right to those liberties and franchises, nor is no argument to prove them to be mere emanations of royal favour; for the humble way of address, by the Commons to the king to have their rights maintained, is made use of by our novelists, to prove they were granted from time to time, merely by the king's grace.

I am far from condemning this humble way of subjects addressing to their sovereign: it becomes the duty of subjects, and is due to the majesty of a king, to have all decent reverence shewn: but I would not have ill use made of their humility, to deprive them of their rights. It was (as I take it) the observation of Caesar, in his commentary, of the temper of the old Britains, 'Jam domiti ut pareant, non ut serviant.'

In that famous case of Thomas Thorp, the Speaker of the Commons, 31 Hen. 6, num. 25, there are the very words of the Petition, at large set forth, in the fourth reg. of Mr. Pryn, fol. 644. Thorp was taken in execution, at the suit of the duke of York. The whole House of Commons petitioned to have their Speaker restored to them: and their petition is in these words: 'By common custom, time out of memory of man, and ever afore these times, used, in every of the parliaments of the king's noble progenitors,' &c. And so it proceeds to declare the privilege of the Commons.

I would observe also, out of these three last records of parliament; that when any breach of privilege befel but a single member of that House, as that of Walter Clerk, and J. at Will. the whole House thought itself concerned, and the whole House petitioned; especially in this last case of Thomas Thorp, their Speaker, to whom the d. of York was no friend.* This will be useful to my second point.

Hitherto I have presented you with records of parliament, as being the most proper proof of the rights of parliament, much beyond the reports of our historians, from whom our innovators fetch most of their arguments. I shall now offer you some records out of an inferior court, one of the four courts of Westminster-hall, that is, out of the Exchequer: but they are judicial records, adjudged by the whole court, by advice, with all the judges of both benches, to confirm the same point.

M. 12 E. 4, and H. 13 E. 4, in the office of the pleas in the Exchequer, mentioned by Mr. Pryn, in his fourth part of his Register of Parliament Writs; fol. 752.

In a plea of debt by Donne against Walsh. Walsh was menial servant to Henry earl of Essex, and he sued out his writ of privilege, and the writ under the great seal, was of this tenure: viz. 'Cum secundum consuetudinem in regno hactenus obtentam et approbatam, Domini Magnates Milites Comitatum ac Cives et Burgenses Civitatum et Burgorum, ad Parliamenta nostra venientes, ac eorum Familiars ratione alicujus Transgressionis' (and so proceeds to enumerate other sorts of actions) 'dum sic in parliamentis nostris moientur, arrestari aut implacitari minime debeant,' &c.

And then the writ mentions that action of debt, brought against Walsh, menial servant to the earl of Essex, in that present parliament. 'Vobis mandamus' (says the king by that writ of privilege to the barons of the Exchequer,) 'quod si ita est.' Those words do not refer to the custom set forth, nor to the law upon it, but to the allegation in the writ of matter of fact; viz. That Walsh the defendant was menial servant to the earl of Essex.

And then the defendant does by way of plea, grounded upon that writ, apply the writ to himself; and avers, that he is the same person mentioned in the writ; and avers, that he was the menial servant to the earl of Essex, and then demands allowance of his privilege.

The plaintiff in that suit traverses the custom and privilege alledged in the writ (as to the being impleaded) but admits it as to the free-dôm from arrest. This traverse is in the nature of a demurrer; for it is 'Quæstio Juris, ad quam respondent Judices non Juratores.'

'Et super hoc viso et prælecto brevi prædicto, per Barones, &c. Habitoque avisamento Justiciariorum Domini Regis, de utroque Bancq in hac parte. Quia videtur præfatis Baronibus de avisamento Justiciariorum prædictorum, quod talis habetur et habebatur consuetudo, quod Magnates et Milites Comitatum, ac Cives et Burgenses Civitatum et Burgorum ad Parliamentum de Sumonitione Regis venientes, ac eorum Familiars Ratione alicujus Transgressionis, &c. dum sic in Parlamento moientur, capi aut arrestari non debent.' (But then they adjudge that the privilege does hold only against arresting their persons, but not against the suing them.)

This strongly proves the point I have in hand, That the House of Commons have their privileges by custom, and therefore the House itself could not have its original within time of memory, as 49 H. 3 is, in a legal understanding.

It is very useful further to observe, That the single and sole occasion of this record was from the privilege of the peers, from the suing a menial servant of a peer. No man denies but the peers have ever been a part of the parliament: nay, our new modellers of the government would have the parliament to consist only of the king and lords.

And yet it is said to be a Joint Custom for the Commons, as well as for the Lords, by express and particular words. Why did they not lay the custom for the privilege of the Lords only, that might have served for that present occasion, which was about the privilege for a menial servant of the then earl of Essex?

But the Custom was an entire custom for both Houses: this proves them to be contemporaneous, and twins by birth and original.

All this is by the judgment of all the twelve judges, in a judicial proceeding: and it takes in the opinion of the chancellor, who issued out that writ.

The other record of the same court is entered H. 12 E. 4, rot. 7, inter Ryner et Cousin, keeper of the wardrobe to the king, in an action of debt too; and there the defendant claims his privilege, not as servant to the king, but as servant to Thomas St. Leger, knight of the shire for Surrey.

And the writ of privilege sets forth the same entire custom, both for Lords and Commons (though the occasion was here from the Commons only) and the court of Exchequer gives the like judgment, as in the former case, by advice, too, of all the judges of both benches.

The next record I shall make use of, shall be that of E. 2, which is a most invincible proof that the knights, citizens and burgesses have originally, and before 49 H. 3, constituted the House of Commons, and have ever been a part of the parliament.

The burgesses of St. Albans, in their petition to the king, say, That they 'sicut cæteri Bur-genses Regni ad Parlamentum Regis, per duos Comburgenses suos venire debeant, prout retro-actis temporibus venire consueverant, tam tempore Domini Edwardi, nuper Regis Angliæ, Patris Regis' (which must be E. 1.) 'et progenitorum suorum' (which must be understood of the progenitors in the plural number of E. 1, for he mentions the then king E. 2, afterwards) so that of necessity it must take in king Hen. 3, and his father king John, at the least.

And this computation much exceeds the date given to the House of Commons by these new authors, viz. 49 H. 3.

And then the Petition descends to the mention of the then king's time, viz. E. 2. 'tempore Domini Regis qui nunc est, semper ante instans parlamentum.' And the Petition complains of the sheriff of Hertfordshire, who by the abbot's procuring, refused to summon that borough.

The answer by the counsel is, 'Scrutentur Rotuli, &c. de Cancellaria, si temporibus progenitorum regis burgenses prædicti solebant venire, vel non.'

This answer admits the general usage of burgesses to be chosen for divers boroughs, in the times of the king's progenitors; for it is absurd to think, that that needed any search of the Rolls in Chancery, but the search was to be only, whether that particular borough of St. Albans was one of those ancient boroughs that had used that privilege, and had a right to it, which would appear by the Rolls, and returns of writs of summons.

The record lays the usage for the borough to have been 'semper, ante instans parlamentum;' so that the usage had been from ever.

In the Rolls of Parliament 11 H. 4, num. 59, cited by Mr. Pryn, in his Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva, fol. 185, there is a Petition of the Commons in French, reciting the stat. of 7 H. 4, c. 15, which statute (as the Petition says) was made for the preserving the franchises and liberties of the election of knights of the shire, used throughout the whole realm, and by the king's progenitors from parliament to parliament, time out of mind observed.

I will now put the court in mind of some acts of parliament, that fully prove this point.

The statute of 2 R. 2, part. 2, c. 4. (in a time, when parliaments were not so much valued): It is thereby enacted, by assent of the Prelates, Lords, and Commons, that all persons and commonalties, which should have a summons to parliament, should come from thenceforth to parliaments in the manner as they were bounden to do, and had been accustomed of old times; otherwise they should be amerced as of old times had been accustomed.

Rot. Parl. 2 H. 5. pars 2. num. 10. This is left out of sir Rob. Cott. Abr. That act declares, that the Commons had ever been a member of the parliament, and that no statute or law could be made without their assent. I will not spend time in citing those learned antiquaries, or historians; as sir Henry Spelman, Bede's Eccl. Hist. nor famous Selden, nor learned Camden, who by general words, used in the Saxon times, for the assembling of parliaments, though not by that name, prove the Commons to be a part of them; but they do not prove the Commons to be so elected, and to consist of knights, citizens, and burgesses, as is clearly proved by the records I have already offered.

The parliament in the Saxon times was styled, 'Commune concilium, tam cleri quam populi.' And the laws were made 'per commune concilium, et assensum omnium episcoporum et principum procerum comitum, et omnium sapientium senior' et popular' totius regni et populi conventus.' King Edward the Confessor confirmed the Saxon laws, and made new, says Lambert in his book De Præcis Anglorum. Legibus, c. 8, fol. 139, and there it is said, all to be done 'à rege, baronibus et populo.' These general words cannot be understood otherwise, than to include the Commons.

And so 'totius regni assensu et omnium actione et judicio,' says Mr. Selden, a judgment was given concerning Lanfrank, archbishop of Canterbury. The statute of Magna Charta was made and confirmed 9 H. 3, which was forty years before this new date of the original of the House of Commons, viz. 49 H. 3. And it appears by several statutes, that Magna Charta was made 'De communi concilio regni' says one statute: 'Per commune assent de tout le realm,' says another. 'Per le Roy, Peers, et Communes de le terre,' says another.

It is worth the while to examine the grounds of their opinion, and it will appear how weak they are.

These new authors affirm, that the House of Commons began to be admitted as a part of the parliament, not till 49 H. 3. Their reason is, because (as Mr. Pryn says, in his Plea for the Lords fol. 182, and in his preface to sir Robert Cott. Abr.) the first writ of summons of any knights, citizens, and burgesses now extant is no ancienter than 49 H. 3, dorso 10 and 11. And from thence he concludes, that it is most apparent, that the Commons had no place, nor votes by election in parliament, before the end of the reign of H. 3, and sir Robert Filmer is in like manner positive in it in his book, called The Freeholders Grand Inquest, fol. 18, and they both cite Mr. Selden and Camden and other learned authors, and Mr. Dugdale in his Origines Juridicales, fol. 18, follows them in it. It is true Mr. Selden in his Titles of Honour, fol. 717, towards the end of that fol. does take notice that the first roll that they find extant is that of 49 H. 3, for the summoning of the Commons by way of election; but he does not thence conclude, (as those new authors do) that this was the first time that the Commons came to the parliament by election.

But in other places of his learned book, he does strongly intimate his opinion to be that the Commons did very anciently and long before 49 H. 3, make an essential part of the parliament, and were summoned to it; but in what form they were summoned, and when they first began to be distinguished from the Barones Majores, Selden himself seems much unresolved.

Learned Camden does indeed date the original of the Commons as a part of the parliament, and as now elected, from 49 H. 3, fol. 13 of his Britannia, in the edit. at Lond. An. 1600. But let us take notice upon what authority he does it. He says he has it 'ex satis antiquo scriptore,' but he names not his author.

Mr. Selden fol. 713, says, he could never meet with that author, and professes he gives little credit to that relation, but acknowledges there had been a great change in the constitution of the parliament, but supposes it long before 49 H. 3, viz. in the time of that king's father (king John) and that it was done by a law, though the law be lost, as many rolls of parliament were, wherein those laws were entered.

And the distinction of 'Barones Majores et Minores' he supposes was made by act of parliament, about the time when the great charter of king John was made at Runnymede, viz. 17 Johannis. By which Charter, some of the Barones Majores were severally to be summoned to parliament by special writs. And all other tenants in capite, or tenants by knights service were to be summoned by a general summons directed to the sheriff of every county.

By this conjecture, it should seem that the court of parliament before consisted but of one house or assembly. And it is generally held, that at the first, from the beginning of the reign of William the first, till that charter of king John, all tenants in capite had a right to sit in parliament. For says Mr. Selden fol. 704, medio folij. Tenere de rege in capite, and to be a baron, and to have a right to sit in counsels or courts of judgment, are synonymous. That great charter of king John, says Selden, was made by the king and his barons, 'et liberos homines totius regni,' and that it seems first made the distinction.

But Mr. Selden does by no means leave it to H. 3, or his son E. 1, or to any other king at any time, to send his special writ of summons to such of the barons only, 'quibus ipse rex dignatus est brevia summonitionis diregere,' as Mr. Camden's nameless author taught him, and from Mr. Camden, Mr. Pryn, sir Robert Filmer, and Mr. Dugdale take it up, and so propagate that error. So that this new fancy is wholly grounded upon the credit of that uncertain writer, whom Mr. Selden could never meet with, and to whom he gave no credit. The argument upon this subject, begins fol. 701, in Mr. Selden's Tit. of Honour, and is continued to fol. 718. Now the argument taken from the rolls of summons, which are not extant before the time of 49 H. 3, is of no weight. For by the same argument it might be proved, that there was no parliament from the time of 49 H. 3, till 23 E. 1, for there is no roll nor no other testimony left of a summons for any knights, citizens and burgesses, from 49 H. 3, till 23 E. 1. And yet we know there were no less than fourteen parliaments between those times.

They may as well argue, that there were no acts of parliament, nor no parliament till 9 H. 3, when Magna Charta was made, because there are no rolls of them till that time. Whereas it is beyond all dispute, that there were parliaments and acts of parliament long before, as 4 Will. 1, when the bishops were brought in to hold by barony, (as Mr. Selden conceives) and some in H. 1, and others yet extant in history, yet the rolls of them are lost. This is observed by the lord chief justice Vaughan, in his Rep. fol. 338, in the case of Thomas and Sorrel.

In the next place, these late authors proceed further in their error, and maintain that the Commons had no further power in parliament, than what the king and the Lords admitted them unto.

And sir Robert Filmer, fol. 49, allows neither Lords nor Commons any power but by the king's bare permission, and thus they are growing in their invasions against the court of parliament, and impeach one first, and the other will follow more easily.

And sir Robert Filmer further holds, the legislative power rests solely in the king, and fol. 39, he hath these words, 'But the truth is,' saith he, 'the liberties and privileges of both Houses, have but one and the self-same foundation, which is nothing else but the mere and sole grace of kings.'

And doctor Heylin, in his Life of archbishop Laud, fol. 91, denies the privileges of parliament to be the peoples' birth-right, but holds them not otherwise exercised, than by the grace and goodness of the king.

Mr. Pryn, sir Robert Filmer, and Mr. Dugdale, lay great stress upon the diversity that is in the writs of summons, between the summons for the Lords, and the summons for the Commons.

That to the Lords, say they, is, 'super negotiis predictis tractaturi vestrumque consilium impensuri.' But that to the Commons, is, say they, only 'ad faciendum et consentiendum his que tunc ibidem de communi consilio dicti regni contingerint ordinari.'

It is true, that for many years of late, that distinction hath been so used in the summons, but not constantly so.

As to this point, I will cite Mr. Dugdale's, and Mr. Pryn's own books against their own opinion.

The very first writ of summons, which as they say is now extant, for the summoning of the Commons by election, viz. 49 H. 3, runs in these words, 'Nobiscum ac cum predictis prelati et magnatibus nostris super premissis tractaturi atque consilium impensuri.' Dugd. Orig. Jur. p. 18.

The writ, 'De expensis Militum qui venerunt ad Parliamentum venientibus,' says that writ, 'usque ad Westmonasterium ibidem de 'diversis negociis nobiscum tractaturis.' See Mr. Pryn's 4th part of a Register of Parliament Writs, fol. 8.

In Mr. Hyley's Placita Parliamentaria, it appears, that as the summons to the temporal Lords, fol. 318, was 'ad tractandum,' and so likewise the summons to the prelates, fol. 319, so also, fol. 320, it is entered in these words, 'Mandatum fuit singulis Vice-comitibus per Angliam quod de quolibet comitatu duos milites, et de quolibet civitate duos cives, et de quolibet burgo duos Burgenses eligi et ad dictum Parliamentum venire facerent ad tractandum,' &c.

In the same book, fol. 570, an. 15 E. 2, there is mention of a writ of summons, for knights out of Wales, to a parliament at York, 'ad tractandum et consilium impendendum.'

In Mr. Pryn's Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva, fol. 274, there is the very indenture returned by the sheriff of Norfolk for Great Yarmouth, 'ad tractandum, consulendum et consentiendum.' 31 E. 3.

And fol. 68, of that book, another writ, 'de expensis militum,' 18 E. 2, reciting the cause for which they had been summoned to the parliament, viz. 'ad tractandum,' &c.

And in the same book, fol. 145, it appears, that 18 E. 3, the writs to the sheriffs for chusing knights, mentioned what their work was to be, in these words, viz. 'Nobiscum, cum prelati et processibus predictis super diversis et arduis negotiis nos et statum regni nostri specialiter tangentibus tractaturi et statum consilium impensuri.'

And fol. 147 and 149, the like words in the writs.

And fol. 177, the indenture returned by the sheriff of Wiltshire, recites their trust in the same words, and pursues the words of the writ.

And 276, and 283, and 381, indentures returned from Reading, Bristol, London, with the same words. And ib. fol. 178 and 179, and 291 for Windsor, and 365. So that in the reigns of seven several kings, and those of the most ancient kings, there was no such distinction in the writs of summons.

Another argument used by these late authors, to prove that the whole power and all the privileges of the House of Commons, are not from the original constitution of the government, (as I affirm, and I hope have proved they are) but of a later original, and by the mere grace and indulgence of princes (as indeed they must be, if the House of Commons began within memory) is taken from the words and phrases of our historians, who have written since the coming in of the Normans, and ascribe the making of laws, and all the determinations and decrees in matters of judicature, and all the actings of the ancient parliaments before the time of the Normans, to the king and Lords only, exclusive to the Commons, and that the Commons had no part in them, till this time of 40 H. 3.

And they ground this opinion upon the form of penning of our ancient acts of parliament, which seem by the words of them to be mere concessions of our former kings, and to have proceeded only from their royal bounty, and at their sole will and pleasure.

And they confirm themselves in that opinion, from observing the course used in the beginning of parliaments, when the speaker makes his humble petitions to the king for the granting of them freedom from arrests, and freedom of speech.

Now to discover the falsity of these grounds, and the weakness of these arguments, taken from the words and phrases used by our historians, I shall shew that our historians, who have written since the time of the coming in of the Normans, and have translated the Saxon annals, have in those translations, instead of the Saxon titles, used the titles that were never in use before their own times, which titles used in the Saxons' times had quite different significations from the titles used in the times of the translators.

The title 'earl,' for example, is used in the penning of the Saxon laws (as among those of Athelstan) as we may see by Mr. Lambert in his book De Priscis Anglor. Legibus, and the title 'comes,' came in amongst us since from the empire; and signified a different thing from earl. Now our translators mistaking those two titles, 'earl' and 'comes,' to signify the same thing, wherever they met with earl in the annals of the Saxons, they have rendered it comes in their translations; and whatever in those times was done by earls, and whatever power the earls then used, is by our translators ascribed to our comes, who are therefore also called earls, when in truth they had different significations, and were different in their powers. Mr. Selden takes notice of this error in our Norman or English translators' proceeding from their ignorance. But from this error false conclusions have been raised, and false measures taken in our discourses, concerning the power of the peers.

Sir H. Spelman observes the same error in our translators, in rendering words and titles, 'Non è more Seculi antiquioris,' but according to the titles used in their own times, when many times they signified different things. Nobilis, says Mr. Selden, in the Saxons' times, denoted every gentleman.

Now because nobilis, in our times, is generally restrained to peers, whom we call the nobility, our new writers, as Mr. Pryn, and sir Robert Filmer, and several others, ascribe all to the earls and barons and other peers of our times, which they read in the translations of the Saxon annals, to be acted by those that are called nobiles in those annals. Although in truth in those Saxon times, they were acted by the middle sort of persons, as well as by those of the highest sort of dignity under the king.

Those translators misled our new authors, for the Norman writers translate the word thanes into barones, and these new authors of ours, whatever they find in these translations to be related of the barones, they limit it as a peculiar to our present barons, and so ascribe all judicial power antiently used in parliament to the barons only. And they bring those historians and translators for a proof?

For example, the Saxon title thanes, was in the Saxon times applied to all lords of manors. But the translators of the Saxon annals, translating the title thanes, into barones, our innovators apply all that in Saxon writers is said to be done by the thanes, that is, all lords of manors, as peculiarly belonging to the power of the barons in our times.

Hence it is that sir E. Coke cautions us against taking reports of law from historians: in his preface to the 3d Rep. he calls it Chronicle law.

The word būro was not in use in England till the Normans' times, and the root of 't (as Mr. Selden and Camden and sir H. Spelman teach us) is from the Northern language burn, which signifies the male sex, as when we put cases of baron and feme; or it signifies, 'a freeholder' hence come the words, courts baron.

'Nomine Baronagii,' says Camden, Eliz. Edit. Lond. An. 1600, fol. 137, 'omnes quod-ammodo Regni Ordines continebantur.' It comprehended the gentry as well as the greatest persons. After this manner, Godwin in his Roman Antiquities, speaking of the Roman magistrates, translates the words triumviri Capiteles into three High Sheriffs, but this affords no argument, that what was done by the Triumviri among the Romans, may therefore lawfully belong to the power of high sheriffs among us.

And so the words 'Proceres, Magnates, Optimates, Nobiles,' and such like, were not in the writers of the Saxons' times restrained to men of the highest rank then, such as our earls and barons are now, but to all persons of the better sort, though not of the highest rank, not only to Patricians, and those of the Senatorian order, but to those also that were 'Equestris ordinis.' Excluding none but the 'Ignota capita,' or 'sine Nomine turba,' such as the Romans styled 'Plebeians.' Magnates, et 'Proceres,' are said to make the statute of Mortmain, but we all know that the parliament that made it, consisted then of king, lords, and commons.

The great charter made 17 of king John, appeared by the body of the charter itself to have been made 'per Regem, barones, et liberos homines totius Regni; so that it is most plain it was not made by the king and the barons only, as Mr. Selden observes in his Title of Honour, fol. 709, and there he refers to the 'Close Rolle 17 Johannis dorso, memb. 22.' Yet k. H. 3, speaking of this meeting, calls it 'Baronagium Angliæ,' and rot. clause. 28 H. 3 'Pars uncta membr. 12, dorso,' it is called 'Parliamentum de Runni-meade quod fuit inter Dominum Regem Johannem et barones suos Angliæ.'

As for the other gross mistake, That the power of making laws rests only in the king, (as sir Robert Filmer would have it,) which he proves from the titles of acts of parliament, and the forms of those acts being by way of charter and grant from our kings in ancient times, as that of Magna Charta, 'Dominus Rex Concessit;' and the stat. 'de donis conditionalibus, dominus Rex statuit,' sure he was no lawyer that used this argument, and he never read the Prince's case.

Nor sir E. Coke, 2 Inst. nor shall I need to labour in the confutation of this error, the fallacy of it being so well known to every man that wears a gown. As for that stat. of Mag. Char. whereby the king only seems to speak, and all that is ordained by that stat. runs in the language of the king's concessions only; yet we know the stat. of 15 E. 3, c. 1, which confirms it, says of it, that it was ordained by the king, lords and commons. The stat. of 28 E. 1. c. 8, and c. 13, hath these words, viz. 'The king hath granted unto his people that they shall have election of their sheriffs every year, if they list.' One would take this to be a most gracious liberty, and an high condescension if it should be granted now a days.

And our innovators would be apt to conclude from the words of this act and from the penning of it, that the people once had this mighty privilege merely as a boon from the king, and by virtue of his grant. Whereas there is nothing more certain and clear than that the freeholders (who are often called the people, and are the true proprietors of the nation and land) had originally and from the very first constitution of the nation, the election not only of all sheriffs, but of all other magistrates civil or military that had any authority over them under the king; so that they had a mighty freedom in the very constitution of the nation, and this overthrows all the wild fancies of sir Robert Filmer, and Dr. Heylin, and some later doctors, as if all were derived from mere grace and bounty, and many other deductions might be made from the knowledge of this.

The freeholders had originally the election of the conservators of the peace, who are become out of date by introducing our present justices of peace, who have their power not by the election of the freeholders, or are they of their nomination (as anciently) but nominated by the king, and have their power by special commission under the great seal; and how, and by what means, and in what tempered times this came about, and that this freedom was gained from the freeholders of England, you may read in Mr. Lambard, in his Eirenarchæ, fol. 16, 19, 20, 147. It was done by act of parliament, in the beginning of E. 3, and in his infancy, when his mother Isabel ruled all.

The freeholders originally and from all antiquity did likewise by writ at the county-court styled in pleno Folkmote chuse the Here-reeves; What were those? That sounds like a strange word. I will imitate our Norman or English translators in the translation of the Saxon annals, and render it into the English style; you may by that rule call them lords lieutenants, or deputy lieutenants; for the Saxon laws tell you their duty or office, they were the 'Doctores exercitus.'

See Lamb. de prisicis Anglor. Legibus, in his ep. de Heterochiis, fol. 147.

All these great officers were chosen by the freeholders as our knights of the shire are, and as coroners and verderers (formerly men of great power) are chosen by writ at the county court to this day.

These were mighty powers and freedoms, and enjoyed by the people as anciently as any of our records reach, and are more authentic proofs than the writings of historians, and best shew the native freedom that the people had by the ancient constitution of our government, contrary to all the new doctrines of our late writers, and prove that the privileges and freedoms we yet enjoy are not mere emanations of royal favour, as our novelists would impose upon us.

See Sir E. Coke to this purpose. 2. Inst. 174, and 558.

I could name some great men, that have lately used the same language in books published 'sub magni nominis umbra.' Bracton, who lived in the time of H. 3, l. 1, c. 1. fol. 1, affirms 'Legis vigorem habet quicquid de consilio et consensu magnatum et Itaipub. communi sponse (authoritate regis procedente) juste fuerit definitum et approbatum.'

In the last place, that humble and modest way of the people's addressing to their sovereign either for the making of laws (which has been very ancient) or for granting of privileges (as the Speaker of the Commons hath of late years done) it shews indeed great reverence, and I do not in the least dislike it; and it becomes the majesty of the prince to be so addressed to; but let it not be made an argument that either the laws thereupon made, or the privileges so allowed, are precarious, and merely of favour, and may be refused them.

I would be loth to pay wages and to maintain at my charges every one that styles himself my humble servant.

In that act of parliament intituled, The Petition of Right, the title corrects and qualifies itself, 3 Car. 1, the Lords and Commons petitioned the king, but it was for their rights and privileges; not for, any new, but for their ancient rights and privileges, and yet they style it a petition.

In the title of this act (the Petition of Right) those 'res olim insociabiles, sc. Imperium et Libertas' are 'bene mixtæ': and from hence is a mixt monarchy.

In the Stat. of Provisors, 25 E. 3, the Commons prayed; they are found of the word, and I commend it in them; but the word was used by the figure Catachresis, as the scholars call it; not properly, as appears by the subject matter of that act that follows; what was it, I pray, that they so prayed? They prayed (says that act) that upon the mischiefs that happen to the realm, the king ought, and is bound by his oath, with the accord of his people in his parliament, thereof to make remedy and law. The peers are here included in the people; so that the word prayed, had it been used to any other than the king, had signified remonstrated, declared, or represented.

This proves too where the transcendent power of the legislature is, and that the exercise of it, though it be free and not subject to coercion, yet it is not at will and pleasure in the exercise of it, but guided by rules.

And though the Speaker does (upon his being approved of by the king) make it his humble petition to have liberty of speech allowed the Commons; from whence Dr. Heylin, and Sir Rob. Filmer, and others, infer that the Commons enjoy that liberty merely by the king's grace and favour; yet they are clearly answered by the words that accompany that humble petition, he prays they may be allowed that freedom, as of right and custom they have used, and all their ancient and just privileges and liberties. So that this from the Speaker is also a petition of right.

Nor is this request of the Speaker's, ancient in the use of it, if we may believe Mr. Hakewell, in his Treatise of the manner of Enacting Statutes in Parliament, fol. 136.

Thomas Moyle, speaker, 34 H. 8, the first that is recorded to have made petition for freedom of speech.

I hope I have sufficiently made it out, that the House of Commons as a member of the high court of parliament, are not of so late an original, as 49 H. 3, but have been as ancient as the nation itself, and may in the sense of Julius Caesar in his Comment, be accounted among the ab-origines, and that they have had a perpetual being, to speak in the language of the law, 'tempus fluit, &c. à tempore cujus contrarii memoria hominum non existit,' and that they are therefore capable by law (together with the rest of the three estates in parliament) to prescribe and claim a share in all parliamentary powers and privileges; I do not mean separately, but in conjunction with those other estates, which they could not otherwise legally have done, if their original and commencement could have been shown.

I shall in the next place endeavour to make it evident, that the three estates of parliament are one entire body and corporation; and that all their powers and privileges in the right of them, and in the title to them, are intire, 'per my et per tout,' and belonging to the whole body of the parliament, though in the exercise of those powers, and sometimes in the claim of them they are distinguished, and in the practice of their powers, they are in many things distributed into parts.

For their powers are, one thing, and their privileges are another; the latter are but an incident or attendant upon the former.

It is very material in our present case to have this matter considered, I mean the intireness of this high court; for 'Divide et Impera.' The faggot is easily broken when first the band is broken. If this be well considered, the consequence of this case will be better understood.

It concerns the defendant only by name and more immediately, but in the right and near consequence, it is now most evident, that it nearly concerns the House of Lords: this information of Mr. Attorney's, like a Terra motus, or as that great blast would have done (had not Almighty God, in his infinite goodness to this nation, prevented it) shakes the foundation of both houses, and reaches to all future parliaments; it frights me to speak what may be the effects of it, if it should prevail and be stretched to the utmost. I am far from saying or thinking it is so intended. But who knows how far a single precedent will be made use of in times to come?

All the estates in parliament, are all called by one common name, as Commune Concilium Regni, Magna Curia, they are one body politic, M. 14 H. 3, fol. 3, in the Year Book, (which I cited before to another purpose); it is said by Fineux Ch. J. that the parliament at the common law consists of the king, lords, and Commons, and they are (says he) but one body corporate.

This proves likewise (what I before argued) that the Commons at the common law (which is ab initio) were a part of the parliament.

In the case of Ferrers out of Crompt. Jurisd. of Courts, fol. 8, 9, 10, (for I keep within my proper element, and move in my sphere, and cite authors of our own science of the common law) H. the 8th, called before him the lord chancellor, the judges, the Speaker of the House of Commons, and others, and thus expressed himself before them, viz. That he was informed by his judges, that he the king as head, and the two houses as members, were knit together in one body politic, so as whatsoever offence or injury (during time of parliament) is offered to the meanest member of the house, is to be judged as done to the king's person and the whole court of parliament. And sir Edward Mountague the Ld. Ch. J. then present, confirmed all that the king had said, and it was assented to by all the rest of the judges. Now if you bruise or pierce the hands, (and the House of Commons may well be compared to the hands, for they have been the liberal hands, and the hands feed the head) the head and all the rest of the body must quickly be sensible.

In Trewinnard's Case, Dier. 60, and 61, the privilege of the Commons upon this very account, is termed the privilege of the parliament, and the judgment given in that case by the House of Commons, is there said to be the judgment of the most high court of parliament.

The statute of 1 Jac. c. 1, says, the parliament is 'the whole body of the realm.'

By the two records that I cited before out of the office of pleas in the Exchequer, 12 E. 4, it appears in two several cases of privilege, the one concerning the Lords, and the other concerning the Commons, in both cases the privilege was laid and claimed as one entire privilege, and so allowed by the judgment of the court, by advice of all the judges of both benches.

The Speaker of the House of Commons, by the rolls of parliament, (which are the most proper proofs in a thing of this nature) is termed the Speaker of the Parliament, so it is in the roll of 1 R. 2, in sir Robert Cotton's Abr. fol. 155, it was in the reign of a king that was no favourer of parliaments.

Sir John Bussey, Speaker to the Parliament, sir Robert Cotton's Abr. 20 R. 2, num. 14 and 15.

51 E. 3, num. 37, sir Robert Cotton's Abr. fol. 151, sir Thomas Hungerford, Speaker of the Parliament.

And so is the Speaker of the Commons styled in the case of Ferrers, in Crompton's Jurisd. of Courts, fol. 8, 9, 10, (before cited.)

In the statute of 6 H. 8, c. 16, the clerk of the House of Commons is called clerk of the parliament.

In the case of Godsol and sir Christ. Heydoun, 12 Jac. in B. R. in serjeant Roll's Rep. fol. It was affirmed by sir E. C. that in ancient time all the parliament sat together, and the separation was at the desire of the Commons, notwithstanding, says he, they are but one House: and he further affirms, that he had seen a record, 30 H. 1, of their degrees and seats.

Having made it appear that the parliament is one entire body, and therefore mutually concerned in powers and privileges as to the right and title of them, though divided sometimes in the exercise; I shall proceed briefly to show what those powers are, in order to the proving that what in our case is charged to be done by the Speaker, by order and command of the parliament, (for so I may now affirm) is pursuant to their power and jurisdiction.

The parliament hath three powers: 1. A legislative, in respect of which they are called the three estates of the realm. 2. A judicial, in respect of this it is called Magna Curia, or the high court of parliament. 3. A counselling power, hence it is called, Commune Concilium Regni. For the proof of these, I shall cite some few antiquaries, but chiefly some authors of our profession of the law, and those of the best authority with us. I shall mention them without observing any exact method, because divers of them extend to more than one of these distinct powers, and some of them refer at once to all of them.

Sir Henry Spelman in his Glossary Tit. Gemotum, which was the old Saxon word for a parliament, fol. 261, 'Convenere,' says he, 'Regni Principes tam Episcopi quam Magistratus,' there are those that now make up the House of Lords, 'Liberiq; homines,' there are the Commons, what is their proper work and power? 'Consultitur de communi salute, de pace et bello.' This proves them the Commune Concilium Regni.

Learned Camden: 'Quod Saxones plim Wittena Gemot nos Parliamentum regis dicimus' as to their power, 'Summam et Sacrosanctam auctoritatem habet in legibus ferendis, interpretandis, et in omnibus que ad reipubl. salutem spectant.' This shews their legislature.

The Mirror of Justices, (this is an authority in law) c. 1, fol. 9, says, Parliaments were instituted 'Pur oyer et terminer'; this is the supreme court of Oyer and Terminer. The court of King's-bench is said to be above all courts of Eire or Itinerant; and if the King's-bench be adjourned into any county, where the Eire is sitting, the Eire ceases, 'In pre-sentia Majoris,' &c.

But this court is above the King's-bench and all courts of Oyer and Terminer. The King's-bench is the highest Eire, but this is (according to Solomon's hyperbole) higher than the highest.

But what is the proper subject of their Oyer and Terminer? Our ancient author, who wrote some part of his book before the conquest, tells us, their work is to hear and determine 'les plaintes de tort le roy, de la reign, et de leur enfans,' (the king's children) so that they make an impartial enquiry, but says our author further, 'De eux specialment de ceux torts l'un ne poit aver autrement common droit,' this flies very high to prove their judicial power. I forbear to English it.

It is the proper work of this supreme court, to deal with such delinquents, as are too high for this court of the King's-bench or other ordinary courts. Against whom, through their potency or mighty interest, common right cannot be had, it must be understood in ordinary courts. And the writing and printing of this, was never taken to be a scandal to the government or to the justice of the nation. For the author speaks in the person of the king himself, and tells us, that the high court of parliament is armed with a power, able to cope with and quell the most insolent offenders.

When the Great Judge of all the earth comes to make inquisition for blood, and to execute judgment by the hands of this high court, 'The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down and made low.' To discourse of this judgment, will make a Felix tremble.

We have often heard it confidently said from the pulpit, That our laws are like the spiders' webs, which catch the little flies, but the great ones break through them. Now it is quite contrary with this great court, this great court encounters only with great offenders. It is like the imperial eagle, 'Aquila non capit Muscas,' it leaves them to this and other inferior courts, but that takes to task the 'Ani-malia Majora.'

In that great case, Rot. Parl. 40 E. 3, num. 7, king John had resigned up the crown of England to the pope, by the hand of Pandolph his legate, and sordidly submitted to take down at his hand again, at a yearly tri-but, the pope demanded his rent and all the arrears. The prelates, dukes, counts, barons, and commons, resolved that neither the king nor any other, could put the realm nor the people thereof into subjection, 'sans l'assent de eux.' This intimates, that with their joint consent the crown may be disposed of.

This was the highest resolution in law, in one of the highest points in law, concerning the king's claim of an absolute power, and in a time when the pope was in his height. And the Commons join in the resolution, both against the pope's and king John's pretence to a despotic power.

Sir Tho. Smith, who was a secretary of state, in his Commonw. l. 2, c. 2, 401, 50, 51, 'In Comitibus Parliamentariis posita est omnis absolute potestatis vis,' (taking in the king as the head of them, as it ought to be understood) this shews where the rightful absolute power under Almighty God is. And among other Magnalia he tells us, 'Incerti Juris Controversias diimunt.' This shews their transcendent judicial power; they determine the greatest disputes and doubts in law. They would quickly decide this dispute and controversy, were it once before them, without argument.

This appears to be the proper business of a parliament, even from the writ of summons both to Lords and Commons, (for they did not anciently differ in any thing material, as I have abundantly shown already) they are 'De Arduis Regni tractitare, et Concilium impendere,' here is their counselling power. According to that equitable rule, 'Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus tractari debet.'

Their legislative power is most clearly set out by Bracton, (a judge in the time of Hen. 3, in whose latter times our innovators would have the House of Commons to begin) I cited him before; 'Legis vigorem habet,' says he, 'quicquid de Consilio et de Consensu Magnatum et Reipubl. communi Sponsione (auctoritate Regis precedente) iuste fuerit definitum et approbatum,' 5 H. 4, num. 11. The record there uses too gross a word. The Commons, says the roll, require the king, it should have been, made at their request to the king, and the lords accorded, that four special persons should be removed out of the king's house.

This in some ages, as in the reign of R. 2, would have been thought a very high presumption, and a saucy thing (to speak in the language of the pulpit, and press too from a late Canabr. Dr. and a chaplain in ordinary, if the title of the print may be credited, but said to be printed by the ——— of that university. A saucy thing with their profligate and unhallowed hands to presume to meddle in a thing so sacred. Thus says the late printed sermon.) But it was a sacred or consecrated thing indeed in this roll of parliament mentioned. One of the four required to be removed out of the king's house, where he was a domestic, was no less than the king's confessor. And it was in the reign of our noble king Edward the not in the reign of a R. 2, or H. 6, but of H. 4, one of our wisest and most active valiant kings.

But it may be thought that these four persons were in some desperate Popish plot of killing the king, as the four we have heard of, were.

No, the king himself will resolve that doubt. That noble king said in answer to it, 'He knew no cause wherefore they should be removed, but only for that they were hated of the people.' And yet that great king charged those four to depart from his house. This proves their counselling power.

I might enumerate a vast multitude of Animalia Majora, no small fishes, that have in several ages been caught in the net or web of an enquiry made by the House of Commons, who fish only for such greater fish, such as we call the pike, who by oppression live upon the smaller fish, and devour them. The Commons to that end fish with a net, that has a wide and large mesh, such as lets go the small fry, and compasses none but those of the largest size. Such as the lord Latimer in the time of E. 3, an. 50, such as Michael de la Pool, earl of Suffolk, and lord chancellor, in 10 R. 2, Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, 21 R. 2, and such like; William de la Pool, duke of Suffolk, 28 H. 6, who were all impeached by the House of Commons in several parliaments.

And I myself have seen a lord chief justice of this court, while he was lord chief justice, and a learned man, by leave from the House of Commons, pleading before that House for himself, and excusing what he had done in a trial that came before them in the west, whereof complaint was made to the House. And he did it with that great humility and reverence, and those of his own profession and others, were so far his advocates, as that the House desisted from any further prosecution.

In the late act of 13 of his now majesty, for safety of his royal person, there is a proviso for the saving of the just antient freedom, and the privilege of either of the Houses of Parliament, or any of their members, of debating any matters or business, which shall be debated or propounded in either of the said Houses; or at any conferences or committees of both, or either of the said Houses; or touching the repeal or alteration of any old, or the preparing any new laws; or the redressing of any public grievances. I observed but now out of Trewinn. Case in the Ld. Dier. that the judgment of the House of Commons in a case of the privilege of that House, in that report, is called a judgment of the most high court of parliament; which proves they are not without a judicial power.

3 H. 6. sir Rob. Cott. Abr. fol. 574. The great case between the earl of Warwick and the earl Marshal for precedence, fol. 576, was determined by the king, 'By advice and consent of the Lords and Commons;' and yet one would have thought that a case of precedence between two peers should have been peculiar of the Lords.

In the case of 1 H. 7. in the year books, fol. 4, about reversing of Attainders, it is advised by all the judges, that those knights and others of the House of Commons, should not sit in the House, till the act for reversal of their Attainders were passed. And the reason is, that it is not convenient, that such as were attaind should be judges; (and it might have been added in their own case) so that attainting by bill, or reversing attainders, though by bill, is most properly a judicial act, and the members of the House of Commons are acknowledged to be judges in that case by all the judges, and by that statute of 6 H. 8. c. 16. which I mentioued before to another purpose, the Journal of the House of Commons is called a record.

I have formerly observed, but to another purpose too, that the writs of summons anciently for electing knights, citizens and burgesses to parliament, did direct them in their duty, that they were to meet 'ad Consulendum et consilium impendere,' though of late years this has been omitted, and now advantage is taken of it.

Let us in the next place examine, whether the matters acted in this case by the House of Commons be warranted by these powers of the parliament, and have been done in pursuance of those powers.

And upon examination, we shall find they have done nothing but what they had a full power to do, and what is agreeable to the law and usage of parliament.

It is set forth in the plea, (and admitted by the demurrer, but we all know it to be true) that there was an horrid, devilish, and Popish plot. The enquiry after which, and the searching of it to the bottom, and discovering all the accomplices, was 'Negotium Arduum,' and it did 'Regem, et Statum Regni specialiter tangere,' according to the writ of summons to parliament.

For the plea tells us the design of it, viz. to kill the king. adly. To subvert the government and the laws, to suppress the true religion, and to destroy the professors of it.

The plea shows, that one great lord was convicted of it by impeachment of the Commons, and attainted before the Lords. The king's speech shows there was need of further enquiry, and that it was not as yet thoroughly done, nor himself, nor the two Houses safe; and the king charges both Houses to make an impartial enquiry. The word impartial imports, there might be some great persons concerned, that might be apt to be favoured.

And the plea shows that both Houses accordingly made a strict and impartial enquiry after the conspiracy.

All this appears plainly to be the proper work of a parliament, and his majesty himself was of that judgment, and charged them to do their duty in it.

And the enquiry is the most proper business of the House of Commons.

For this reason they are commonly styled

The Grand Inquest of the nation, though sir Robert Filmer's bold writing terms them so by way of diminution and contempt, (as if enquiry were their highest work).

This enquiry of theirs is necessary in a suberviency to all the several high powers of that high court. Namely, in order to their legislature, or to the exercise of their power of judicature.

Courts that have power of Oyer and Terminer, and to punish great and enormous crimes, are still by their commissioners armed with a power of empannelling grand inquests, to make enquiries in order to their exercise of their power of determining.

Or it may be in order to their counselling power, for removal of great officers or favorites, whereof I have given an instance, and the parliament Rolls and Journals are full of them.

But still they first make enquiry. They enquire among themselves, and every grand jurymen by his oath is to impart his knowledge in any thing material to his fellows. But the most effectual enquiry is most probably from without doors; and without such enquiry, things of great importance may lie concealed.

And the defendants plea shows some good effect of that enquiry. Divers were convicted: and one Thomas Dangerfield delivered in an Information, and that upon oath, and first to the Lords' House, so that it did not begin with the Commons; but if it were so infamous and malicious, why did not the Lords reject it, and commit the informer and punish him? No, they received it, and entered it of record in their Journal. The reason was, it was done in a course of legal proceeding, they could not reject it, being the proper court of justice for a thing of this nature. And the king had given it them in charge to enquire. Nor do they by receiving of it give it any countenance or credit. Then why should it be so heinous a thing in the House of Commons, more than in the Lords? Let us remember still they are but one body; and though they sever themselves for their better dispatch of their great affairs, and distribute the work amongst them, yet the power by which they act, is entire.

But why should any man divide and sever those that are entire? It concerns the Lords equally with the Commons.

But how comes it to concern the Speaker of the Commons so highly above the House itself, who acts merely as a minister, and by command of the House; but that I reserve for a point distinct.

But perhaps it may be allowed, that what is done by either House, in receiving Dangerfield's Information and entering of it in their Journals is parliamentary enough. But the offence and scandal arises first upon the publishing of it in print. Now a word or two to that.

Let us consider how public this information of Dangerfield's was before the printing of it. It was made very public by being delivered at the bar of the Lords, the high court of parliament; and indeed all courts of justice ought to be open and of easy resort.

The Information of Dangerfield is first made a record of that court, and to a court of record any person may resort, as sir E. C. tells us in his Preface to the 3d Rep. and that it was the ancient law of England, and is so declared by a general act of parliament, 46 E. 3, c. which though a general law is not in the printed book of Statutes, as I observed of another general and useful act of parliament before (however it comes to pass) in that act of 46 E. 3, the Commons prayed that a record of whatsoever is done in the king's court, ought in reason to remain there for perpetual evidence for all persons. And they complain that of late the court had refused to suffer the people to search and to have exemplifications for evidence against the king or to his disadvantage. Therefore they pray that search and exemplification be made to any persons of any record whatsoever, though it concern the king or any other, and make against the king or any other. And the answer is, 'Le Roy le voet.'

But then it was made more public, by being delivered in at the bar of the House of Commons, which ought to consist of about 500 members, who are supposed to come from all parts of the kingdom: so that this was made very public, before this publishing of it in print.

Let me observe by the way, that this author of the information (Thomas Dangerfield) was not sent for by the House of Commons, but for any thing that appears, applies himself to the House of Commons, as he had before done to the Lords, of his own accord, so that this is far from malice or ill design.

The Commons order it to be entered in their Journal, among other informations that had been given them. And besides, they order this and several others to be printed.

The offence and scandal is supposed by Mr. Attorney's information to begin here: what need was there of printing it? I wish we could hear the House of Commons answering for themselves to this point: they could (it may be) give a better account of it, and a sufficient reason for the printing of it. But let it be observed, they barely cause it to be printed. They do not give any attestation or credit to it, but leave all that hear of read it, to judge or believe as they think fit. They do not make it their own, by printing it without mention of the true author, they stile it the Information of Thomas Dangerfield, as indeed it was; they do not adopt it their own, as they had done, had they left out the name of the author.

Nay the author himself had delivered it in a course of justice, and in the highest court of justice, i. e. before the Lords in parliament. If it were a libel and slander, why did the Lords receive it, and cause it to be entered of record as they did? Why did they not rather reject the information and punish the author?

If it were no crime in the author to deliver it to the Lords, were it true or false, why should it be a crime to print it, as being his, and with his name?

Whether the matter of that information were true or false, yet what is done by the House of Commons and by the defendant as their Speaker, is all true, that is that Thomas Dangerfield had drawn up, and was the author of such information, and this was true. By the statutes that punish the reporters of false news, the penalty is but imprisonment, till the first author be brought forth, and that is done in this case. [See the 1st St. in such cases of reporting false news, viz. W. 1. c. 34, the reporter is only to be imprisoned till he have found out him of whom the word was moved. So is 2 R. 2, c. 5, the Stat. De Scandalis Magnatum. So is 12 R. 2, c. 11. Dier, 155. The lady Morrison's case, Crok. Jac. 162, but more fully in Marthe's actions of slander, fol. 19, 20. If an action of slander be brought for reporting what another had said slanderously, the plea in his declaration must aver that A. did never so report: the defendant may plead that in truth A. did so report, and it is a good plea, by Tanfield. Leonardi's Rep. 1, p. 287, in an indictment upon the stat. of W. 1. c. 33, and 2 R. 2, c. 5, for reporting false news, it was found bilis vera as to the defendant's reporting the false news, but as to the 'maliciose et seditiose,' 'Ignoramus,' and the defendant therefore discharged.]

The author is avouched, and his name is printed with the information, and it is upon record in the Lords' House, and he in person did present it to the Lords.

Besides, if there can be any just reason or occasion assigned for the printing of it, it shall never be ascribed to malice or ill design, and without malice alleged, this information lies not. Nor can a thing so dishonourable as malice and ill design, be decently or justly conceived or objected against so great and grave an assembly: Why? It is the body of the whole nation. And can a whole nation be in reason suspected to harbour malice, and to have a design against the common-weal, that is, against themselves?

There may most probably and justly be this in the case, to induce the printing this narrative or information of Dangerfield. The plot was very desperate and dangerous, it was not yet fully discovered and searched to the bottom. They were commanded by the king to search further into it. Besides it was the proper work of the House of Commons so to enquire, as they were the grand inquest of the nation. Here was one positive witness already that had sworn to these particulars, before the highest court of justice, where the great persons concerned in it, sate themselves as members of the Lords' House. But one witness alone, though it were sufficient to make an accusation, yet it was not enough to make a conviction; in high treason the law requires two at least. The House of Commons could not in duty and conscience to the king and kingdom, pass it by or let it sleep.

This Information, though but from one man, might possibly have given courage to another person or more than one to testify to the same particulars, if there were any more that knew them to be true, who were unwilling to be the first in the discovery, not knowing but they might stand singly in it: but finding the discovery already made and sworn to, might then think it their duty, and be encouraged to appear also in it, when it might probably be of effect and amount to a legal testimony. The difficulty, and the danger, and discouragement, lay upon the first informer.

This consideration might induce the House of Commons out of a sense of their duty, to make a further and impartial enquiry as his majesty had commanded them, to make it yet (if possible) a little more public in order to a fuller proof: and printing is but one way among many other of publishing or enquiring into any matter. And of late years enquiry by printing has been a most frequent practice, and we meet with it every week, and it is become the most ordinary way of making enquiries, which run into all parts of the nation. And the printing of public proceedings at trials, has been generally of late practised by the courts of law, or by the judges of those courts, or by the chief of them.

But what has made this Information of Dangerfield's more public, than Mr. Attorney General's preferring this Information against the defendant Mr. Williams, for causing it to be published in print? Had it not been thus awakened again, it might have slept in silence, and have been buried in oblivion. Tacitus the Roman historian, tells us in his Annals, in the life of Nero, of one Fabricius Veiento, who was accused for uttering slanderous speeches against the lords of the senate and against the priests, in certain books, which, he termed Codicellos, which in our dialect, is the same with libels or little books. Nero would have the hearing of the cause himself, and he was convicted before him, and was condemned to exile, and his books were sentenced to be burnt. Tacitus observes, that before this sentence for the burning of the books, there was little notice taken of these books, and few there were that read them: but when once it grew dangerous to read them, then they were much sought after. But the very opening of that Information of Dangerfield here in this great court, and in so great an audience, which was of necessity, and occasioned by Mr. Attorney's Information that recites it, though Mr. Attorney never intended this ill consequence, hath made the matter of it as public as possibly can be. And it must be observed, that it never yet came so far as to a trial, nor to have an ignoramus found, much less to an acquittal modo legitimo, in which case, according to the opinion of some judges, an action of conspiracy, or upon the case for a slander will not lie, as not being ripe for it till an acquittal: by the same reason it is not ready for an Information, which is but the king's suit, the reason being the same in both.

But it may perhaps be thought, that in respect of the persons concerned in it, this was too high a flight, and too bold an attempt, and that the height and eminence of some persons may exempt them from common justice, and from the power even of a parliament.

In answer to which, I would observe, that some laws are more especially levelled against the highest subjects. By the statute of W. 1, c. 5, the king forbids that 'nul haute homme,' no high or great man, upon pain of grievous forfeiture, disturb elections, but elections ought to be free. The like may be observed in the statute of W. 1, c. 35, 'Des hautes hommes,' &c. And the greater the persons are, if they are in the rank of subjects, they must be subject to the king's laws, and they are the more proper for the undertaking and encounter of this high court. It will not be 'Impar congressus.'

I cited before, the Mirror of Justices, c. 1, p. 9, where it is said, that parliaments were ordained for to hear and determine in such wrongs, and against such persons, especially against whom otherwise common right cannot be had. I will cite no historians to prove what hath been done in antient times within this very kingdom, of this nature against the highest subjects. I will keep still within my own sphere, and cite none but authorities in law. And so keep myself in the way that belongs to me, and so doing, I am under the protection of this court and of the law, and may rely upon the performance of that blessed promise, 'He will keep thee in all thy ways.' There must be no respect of persons in doing justice. The great Judge of all the world gives it as a rule, and himself gives the example, 'God is no respecter of persons.'

The king was pleased to charge both Houses, to make a strict and impartial enquiry. I shall cite two authorities in law, that come to this point. The first is in case of a brother and heir apparent too, and of a person that did after succeed in the crown. King Richard the 1st in his Magna Curia, 'petit sibi iudicium fieri de Comite Johanne fratre suo qui contra fidelitatem quam ei juraverat, Fœdus contra eum cum inimico suo Rege Franciæ inierat.' That was the offence charged.

It may possibly be objected that the king himself complained; True, but he complains to the proper judicature: This proves their power. Hunt's Arguments for Bishops, fol. 80.

But what did the high court do upon that complaint? They pronounced a very severe sentence, though it were but in the nature of a mean process to make him appear, and answer.

Seld. Tit. of Hon. fol. 707. The Lords order of iudgment, that if John earl of Moreton did not appear within 40 days after summons, 'Judicaverunt Comitem Johannem demeruisse Regnum.'

Let me remember you of a stronger and higher case, and I have it out of an author of the law too. Crompt. Jurisd. of Courts, in his Chapter of the Court of the King's-bench. In a case of 'Corpus cum Causa.' Whidden, one of the judges of the court, cited a case that did happen in the time of Gascoign, Ch. J. in the reign of King H. 4, Gascoign committed the prince of Wales (who was afterwards our king H. the 5th,) to prison for endeavouring to take away a prisoner from the bar of the King's-bench, and the prince humbly submitted and went to prison, and the king hearing of it, commended it.

If the King's-bench, being an inferior court to that high court, might soar so high, how much more the highest court of the realm, where the king sits in the exaltation of his orb, and is in his greatest splendor? The king indeed is presumed in law to be in this court, which makes the stile of its proceedings to be 'Coram Rege,' and some of our kings have been said to have sate here. But the king is in his high court of parliament, 'per eminentiam,' as H. 8, one of the highest and most resolute of our kings said in the case of Ferrers, (which I cited before to another point.) That he was informed by his judges, (who were all then present) that he in no time stood so high in his state royal, as in the time of parliament. Then if we consider the person whom the Ch. J. Gascoign committed. He was a continuing, settled fixed heir, and then prince of Wales, whose chair now stands vacant in the Lords' House in time of parliament, and afterwards this prince of Wales proved a renowned king.

'Nescit Imperare qui nescit obtemperare.' The Sacred Scriptures tell us, that the 'heir differeth nothing from a servant.' I may say also from a subject, 'until the time appointed of the Father,' Gal. 4, 1, 3.

What would the author of the Sermon preached before the University have said in these cases that I have cited? He would have called them unwarrantable proceedings, and would have affirmed that the persons thus proceeded against, were too sacred to be touched with such unhallowed hands. This hath been the bold language from the pulpit and the press, if the title of the book be true from a Cambr. Dr. 'Oblitus professionis suæ, quæ nil nisi lenè suadet et justum.'

And the author while he was guilty of gross flattery on the one hand, was not afraid to run into the other extreme, of speaking evil of dignities on the other hand, of one of the three estates of the realm, of the representative of the great body (whereof he himself makes but a small inconsiderable atom). [So called 1 Eliz. c. 3, 4 H. 8, c. 8, the House of Commons called the Honourable House in the Petition of Rich. Strode, which is part of the act.]

We know from certain and undoubted histories of our own, that in the time of king H. 8, greater persons in the account of the law than the prince of Wales, and yet but subjects of the king, have been brought to trial, and that before lords commissioners; and however, in other respects their cases might be very hard, yet it was never doubted but they were subject to the law and justice.

Now to proceed to my second point, wherein I shall be brief, viz. That however, the matters charged in the Attorney General's Information are not to be imputed to the defendant in this case: he being but the minister or mouth of the House, and acting only by their order. He is frequently in the parliament records styled the mouth of the House whose Speaker he is.

Mr. Hakewell in his Treatise of Parliaments, fol. 200, among the catalogue of Speakers, begins with Petrus de Mountf. whom he makes Speaker, 44 H. 3, of the House of Commons, and he cites the register of St. Albans for it, fol. 207, where it is said that Petrus de Mountford Vice totius communis consented to the judgment of banishment of Adomar de Valence Bishop of Winchester, and sir Robert Cotton agrees with Mr. Hakewell in this point. Mr. Pryn in his preface to sir Robert Cotton's Abr. is of an opinion by himself, that 'tota communitas' signifies the whole baronage. But it appears by the body of the letter there written, that 'communis' is distinguished from the 'maiores.' Sir Robert Cotton's Abridgement, 6 E. 3, fol. 12, in the upper part, it is said, the Lords and great men by the mouth of sir Henry Beaumont. Mr. Hakewell in his aforesaid Treatise, speaking of William Trussel, says, the Commons answered by his mouth: 13 E. 3. 2 R. 2, numb. 16, sir Robert Cotton's Abr. fol. 174. The Commons return their Answer to the king by sir James Pickering their Speaker. 17 R. 2, numb. 17, sir R. Cott. Abr. 353. The king advising with the Commons, concerning a peace with France, return their Answer by sir John Bussey their Speaker. Mr. Hakewell in his book before cited, fol. 205, 7 H. 4, says, that sir John Tiptoft, while he was Speaker, signed and sealed the deed of entailing the crown with these words, 'Nominis totius communis.'

Mr. Elsing in his Treatise of Parliaments, fol. 125, tells us, that what was spoken by the Speaker is entered in the rolls, as spoken by the Commons.

But take what is done by the defendant to be his proper acting, yet he acting only as a minister and servant to the high court of parliament, by the ordinary rules of law, in cases of officers, he is not suable, nor any way punishable for it.

This is resolved in the countess of Rutland's case, 6 Rep. 54, and the same case likewise reported in Moor's Rep. 765. That an officer or minister executing process which is erroneously awarded (as where a capias is awarded against a peer) the officer is to be excused; for he must not dispute the authority of the court, but obey. And in that case the secondaries of the Compter, and the serjeants in London were excused and held not guilty of any offence.

So in the case of the Marshalsea, 10 Rep. 76, where the distinction is, If the court have a jurisdiction, the officer is excused though the process be erroneous. 'Qui jussu judicis aliquid fecerit, non videtur dolo malo fecisse quia parere necesse est.'

Keilwey 99, a med. by Brudnel, and the lord Dier in Trewinnard's Case, fol. 60, b. Where a writ of privilege in case of a parliament-man arrested, is granted, where it ought not to be; and the sheriff by virtue of that writ discharged the person arrested. Yet the sheriff (saith that case) is not chargeable in an action for this: 'Parere necesse est.' What that necessity is we may see in that case of Trewinnard, Dier fo. 61, a med. if the sheriff refuse to execute the writ. And as a fair warning to sheriffs and other officers, not to resist or disobey the commands and orders of the House of Commons, the lord Dier mentions what punishment was inflicted upon the sheriffs of London, in the case of Geo. Ferrers. They were committed to the Tower for their contempt in not letting a parliament-man taken in execution, to go at large, when the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Commons came for him, without a writ. Nay, the lord Dier says, in the latter end of that case of Trewinnard, that if the parliament erred, (he speaks of the House of Commons) yet there is no default in the sheriff. When the late king being in person in the House of Commons, and sitting in the Speaker's chair, asked the then Speaker, Whether certain members, whom the king named, were then in the House? The Speaker answered readily and wisely, and with a good presentness of mind (which arose from the genius of that House) 'That he had neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak,' but as the House was pleased to direct him.

3. As to the last point; That for matters done in or by the parliament (as the matters in our case are) neither the King's-bench, nor any other court, but the court of parliament itself, can by law take cognizance of it. This is the great point of the case.

I shall first offer to prove it by Reasons, and then I shall back and enforce those reasons by many authorities, and those of the highest sort.

1 Reason. The parliament gives law to this court of the King's-bench, and to all other courts of the kingdom; and therefore it is absurd and preposterous that it should receive law from it, and be subject to it. The greater is not judged of the less.

2. The parliament is the immediate court for examining the judgments of the court of King's-bench, and if they be erroneous, they reverse them; and if this court should against law take upon them to proceed in this cause and give judgment, the parliament when it meets, no doubt, will set it aside as erroneous; and no man does in the least doubt but they have power to do it, and there is as little doubt but they will do it; therefore it is wholly in vain for this court to take cognizance of it; and it cannot be reversed elsewhere, it being in a matter of jurisdiction. See the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 8. The preamble reciting, that erroneous judgments given in the King's-bench are only to be reformed by the high court of parliament; which court of parliament was not in those days so often holden, as in ancient time it had been: neither yet in respect of the greater affairs of the realm could they well be considered of and determined in parliament, &c. [1 Jac. c. 1. The like words.]

There is an exception of errors that concerned the jurisdiction of the King's-bench; those remain as before; and in the errors that are referred to the judges of the Common Pleas and barons of the Exchequer, by 27 Eliz. c. 8, the jurisdiction of the parliament is to examine them, &c.

3. This court, as all the courts of common-law, judge only by the ordinary rules of the common-law. But the proceedings of parliament are by quite another rule. The matters in parliament are to be discussed and determined by the custom and usage of parliament, and the course of parliament; and neither by the civil, nor the common-law, used in other courts.

4. The judges of this, and of the other courts of common law in Westminster, are but assistants and attendants to the high court of parliament: and shall the assistants judge of their superiors?

5. The high court of parliament is the dernier resort, and this is generally affirmed and held; but it is not the last, if what they do may yet again be examined and controlled.

6. The parliament is of an absolute and unlimited power in things temporal within this nation.

I shall now proceed to Authorities that are full to this point, and do second and back those reasons that I have offered; wherein I shall not observe any method by reducing or ranking of them under these reasons that I have offered, because some of the authorities justify several of these reasons, all at once.

That the parliament hath the highest and most sacred authority of any court; that it hath an absolute power; that it is the highest court in the realm, is acknowledged by our most learned and gravest writers and historians; for I would not wholly omit them, though I do not need them; but I rely only, and put all the stress of my proofs and arguments upon my authorities in law.

Cambden in his Britannia, 'Summam et sacrosanctam Auctoritatem habet Parliamentum.' Knighton, de eventibus Angliæ, l. 1, fo. 2681, col. 1, 2. He calls it the highest court of the realm. 'So it is called in Trewinnard's case, in Dier 60, 61. Sir Thomas Smith in his Common-wealth of England, l. 2, c. 2, fo. 50, 51. 'In Comitibus Parliamentariis posita est omnis absolute potestatis vis.'

Sir R. Cotton in his Posthuma, edit. at Lond. pag. 345, cited by Mr. Pryn in his preface to Sir Robert Cotton's Abr. The parliament controls all inferior courts, and all causes of difficulty; 'cum aliqua dubitatio emergit,' refer it to the parliament.

To shew their power and jurisdiction upon erroneous proceedings in other courts, by authorities in law, which confirms one of my reasons.

In Trewinnard's case, it is said, that though the parliament err, it is not reversible in any other court: this is spoken in a case where the then occasion was upon a judgment given only by the House of Commons, in a case of privilege.

Agreeable to this is 21 E. 2, fo. 46, Br. Abr. Tit. Error, plac. 65, in the latter end of that case, and 7 H. 6, Br. Abr. Tit. Error, plac. 68, by Cotesmore, and 1 H. 7, fo. 19, Br. Error plac. 137. Error in parliament shall be reversed in parliament, 'et non aliter;' for there is not an higher court. 1 H. 7, fo. 19, 20. By all the judges in the Exchequer-chamber for a judgment in the King's-bench, error must be sued in parliament; and as the parliament shall correct the judgments; so they are to correct the judges that give corrupt and dishonest judgments. These are the words and the opinions of the lord chief justice Vaughan in his Reports, fo. 139, in Rushel's case. Such, says he, in all ages have been complained of to the king in the Star-chamber, (which is a court now dissolved by parliament) or to the parliament. He there mentions many judges; those 44 that were hanged in king Alfred's time before the conquest, for corrupt judgments; and those in the time of E. 1, E. 3, and R. 2, for their pernicious resolutions: he vouches the journals of parliament, and instances in the judgment of Ship-money in the last king's time, and the particular judges impeached*.

Sir E. Coke, in his 12 Rep. fol. 64, the words are spoken by sir E. C. but (as that Rep. says) with the clear consent of all the Judges. 'The king hath his court, that is to say, in the upper House of Parliament, in which he with his Lords is the supreme judge over all other judges. For if error be in the Common-pleas, that may be reversed in the King's-bench; and if the court of King's-bench err, what may be reversed in the upper House of Parliament, by the king with the assent of the Lords.'

Now though this is spoken of the Lords' House only, yet it must be again remembered that the parliament (as I proved before) is one entire body, and that their power in the right of it is entire, though as to the exercise of it, it is distributed into parts, and is divided: nor can the House of Lords exercise any power as an House of Parliament, or as a court for errors, without the House of Commons be in being at the same time. Both Houses must be prorogued together, and dissolved together; like the twins of Hippocrates, they live and die together, and the one cannot be in being, without the other also, at the same time be in being too.

2 Inst. 408. Matters of difficulty were heretofore usually adjourned to parliament; but (says he) it is now disused.

* See vol. 6, p. 999, of this Collection.

And 2 Inst. 599. Courts at variance, properly complain to the parliament.

4 Inst. In the Chapter of the court of the King's-bench, errors in the King's-bench in matters that concern their jurisdiction, and other cases there excepted in the act of 27 Eliz. cap. 8. cannot be reversed but in the high court of parliament.

4 Inst. fol 67. There is a court erected by the statute of 14 E. 3. cap. 5. stat. 2. For redress of delays of judgments in the king's great courts, consisting of a prelate, two earls, and two barons, to be chosen in parliament by that statute. If the case before them be so difficult, that it may not well be determined without assent of the parliament, (it does not say by the House of Lords only) then shall the tenor of the record be brought by the said prelate, earls and barons, into the next parliament, and there a final judgment shall be given.

'Si obscurum et difficile sit Judicium, ponantur judicia in respectu usq; magnam curiam.' Rot. Parl. 14 E. 3. Num. ult. Sir Jeffery Stanton's case.

25 E. 3. cap. 2. The chapter of Treason in the 2 Inst. fol. 21. The judge or court in some cases, is to forbear going to judgment till the cause be shewed before the king and his parliament, whether it ought to be judged treason or not.

That this court proceeds by the ordinary rules of the common law; but that high court of parliament proceeds not by that law, but by a law peculiar to that high court, which is called 'Lex et Consuetudo Parliamenti,' and consists in the customs, usages, and course of parliament; and therefore, this court, nor no other inferior court, can, for this very reason, judge or determine of what is done in parliament, or by the parliament.

If this court should take upon it to proceed in such cases, it would justly be said of it as a thing very irregular. 'Metiri se quemq; suo modulo, ac pede, verum est.'

Sir Rob. Cott. Abr. 20, R. 2, nu. 14, 15.

Sir Tho. Haxey delivered a bill to the Commons in Parliament, for the honour and profit of the king, and of all the realm, complaining of the outrageous expences at the king's house, and namely of bishops and ladies.

Here the Camb. Dr. I have before mentioned, would take occasion again to complain of the sauciness of this bill.

K. R. 2 was offended with the Commons for preferring this bill to the king; for it seems they had entertained this information from a particular hand, (as was done in our case from Dangerfield) and they proceeded upon it.

K. R. 2, said it was an offence against his dignity and liberty, and said he would be free therein.

And sir John Bussey, the Speaker to the parliament (as that roll of parliament calls him) is charged to declare the name of him who exhibited that bill.

By this, it appears the king could not take notice of what was done in the Commons' House, or delivered to them, but by the House itself, and that is one of the laws and customs of parliament; and yet, no doubt but it was well known to every member of that House, and yet it came not to the king's knowledge.

VOL. XII.

Nu. 16. The Commons delivered to the king the name of the exhibiter, which was sir Tho. Haxey.

Nu. 17. The Commons afterwards came and submitted themselves to the king, and craved pardon, and the king excused them.

Nu. 23. Sir Thlo. Haxey was adjudged by parliament to die as a traitor. The king was offended, the Commons forsook the exhibiter, and submitted, and the Lords adjudge him guilty of treason. This seems to be a strong case against the liberty and the privilege of the House of Commons, (but it seems strange how it should be made treason;) but it is stranger; especially, if it be supposed this sir Tho. Haxey was a member of the House, one would have thought he should have been under a protection and special privilege. But I take him to be no member, for he is afterwards called sir Tho. Haxey, clerk; and graduates in the university and those in orders, were usually dignified with the addition of sir; and it is not yet quite out of use in the university.

I find by Mr. Pryn, in his plea for the Lords, fol. 345, that in the next king's reign, H. 4. the Commons exhibited a petition on the behalf of sir Tho. Haxey, (for he was not executed, the archbishop of Canterbury took him into his protection, being a clergyman;) and the Commons in their petition affirm, that the judgment against sir Thomas Haxey, for delivering in this bill to the Commons in parliament, was against right, and the course that had been used before in parliament, in destruction of the customs of the Commons.

Here note, That the right and course of parliament, and the customs of the Commons, are mentioned as synonyms.

Upon this petition of the Commons, the judgment is adjudged to be null and void.

But this could be adjudged no where but in parliament, for it concerned the right and privilege, and the customs and course of the parliament.

1 H. 4. nu. 91, In sir Rob. Cott. Abr. the record says, sir Tho. Haxey, clerk, pardoned, and the judgment reversed, and he restored to all.

This case, in very many circumstances, suits with the case of Dangerfield, and in many, with our present case. Ours is in the case of an heir apparent or presumptive. But a greater than the heir is here, in this case of sir Tho. Haxey, namely, the then king himself.

But I cite it, principally to prove one of my reasons and arguments to the third point, namely, that there are rights and customs that are peculiar to the high court of parliament; and that there is a law called the course of parliaments, and it may be observed, that the customs of the Commons are the law and course of parliament.

Concurring with one observation that I made out of this case, that one of the laws or customs of parliament, is, that no member is to publish at the court, or elsewhere abroad, what is done in the House of Commons, but it ought to proceed from the House itself, and no other, (which is another argument, to prove that no other inferior court can enquire into, or hear or determine of their doings) for no notice can be taken of what they do, unless it come by their own relation and discovery.

That, I say, which concurs with this, is another roll of parliament of that noble king, H. 4; viz. 2 H. 4, nu. 11. The Commons require, that is, request the king, that he would not give an ear to any untrue reports of the Commons' House, until the time might try the same; and that time is when the Commons apply to the king in it, and not before. Whereunto the king granted; which allows it to be the law and course of the parliament.

4 Inst. fol. 15. Every court of justice, says sir E. C. hath rules and customs for its direction. So the high court of parliament, 'de suis propriis legibus et consuetudinibus consistit.'

Again, sir E. C. in his Select Cases, printed 1677, fol. 63,

Note, says he, the privilege, order, or customs of parliament, either of the Upper House, or of the House of Commons, belongs to the determination only of the court of parliament.

And there he cites two precedents for it.

The first that of 27 H. 6, in the Controversy between the earls of Arundel and Devonshire, for precedence: the king, by advice of the Lords, referred it to the judges to examine and to report; not finally to determine as judges of the case, but as assistants to the Lords.

The judges answered, That it was a matter of parliament, and belonged to the king and the Lords to determine.

One would think this were a strange answer of the judges, to deny their advice; were they not assistants to the Lords in matters of law?

The true reason of their declining to give their advice, is, it was a case above them, and not to be determined by the ordinary rules of law, and therefore out of their element. 'Quæ supra nos, nihil ad nos.' Therefore their answer was, That it was a matter of parliament, and belonged to the king and Lords, but not to the judges.

This is a resolution of all the judges in the very point; though this particular case concerned only the Lords, being a matter of precedence between two lords; yet, as I have proved, the parliament is one entire body, and are mutually concerned in their powers and privileges.

The other case mentioned, by sir E. C. is that of Tho. Thorp, the speaker of the Commons, 31 H. 6, taken in execution at the suit of the duke of York, during the recess of the parliament. We have it at large in the parliament roll of 31 H. 6, num. 25, 26, 27, 28.

The Commons, at the opening of the next session of parliament, request the king and Lords, to restore their Speaker to them. The judges being demanded of their counsel therein; (note, it was nothing but their advice asked.) It was after mature deliberation, they answered, 'It was not their part to judge of the parliament, which may judge of the law.' Note, the reason to judge of the law, signifies they are the supreme court to judge what is law, and what is not. And to judge of the law, likewise signifies, that they can judge whether a law be good or not; in order to approve of it, and to enact it, or to repeal a law. [Mr. Pryn, in his Plea for the Lords, calls this a famous memorable case, and says he was then chief baron.]

This is in a case that concerned the privilege of the Commons and their Speaker; and yet they say, that judging in this case were to judge of the parliament: this intimates too, that the parliament judges by other rules than those of the common law. And it is the common law is the proper element of the judges of the courts of Westminster-hall.

This is a second resolution of all the judges in the very point.

Mr. Hakewel, in his Treatise of the Manner of Enacting Laws in Parliament, fol. 125, reports this case of Thorp at large.

It is time now to come to higher authorities, that is, to resolutions of parliament in this point.

And first, the resolution of the House of Commons in maintenance of their own right, or at least a claim of their right; I have it out of an author that is very far from being a friend to the House of Commons; and it is a clergyman too. I mean Dr. Heylin, in the Life of archbishop Laud, fol. 89. He reports, that the House of Commons made a protestation in 1621, against all impeachments, other than in the House, for any thing there said or done.

Let me present you with the like claim made by the Lords, which seems to run something in the form of an old act of parliament.

In sir Rob. Cott. Abr. 12 R. 2. num. 7. In that parliament, all the Lords, as well spiritual as temporal, being present, claimed their liberties and franchises; viz. That all weighty matters in the same parliament, which should be afterwards moved, touching the peers of the land, ought to be determined, judged and discussed by the course of the parliament, and not by the civil law; nor yet by the common laws of the land, used in other more courts of the realm.

The which claim and liberties the king most willingly allowed and granted thereto in full parliament, says that roll.

Now, as I have before proved, the liberties and franchises of the parliament, in the right of them, are entire, and due to both Houses, for both make up the parliament.

Mr. Selden, in his Title of Honour, says, That a thing granted in full parliament, signifies an act of parliament.

Now for an act of parliament full in the point, and then I can go no higher.

It was in the case of Richard Strode, one of the burgesses for Plympton in Devonshire, in the parliament of 4 H. 8, for agreeing with the Commons' House, in putting out bills, as it is reported there, which seems to resemble the printing or publishing, mentioned in our case. These bills so put out were against the abuses of the tinnors, who were a great and numerous body of men; who by these bills took themselves to be scandalized and slandered. [Pryn's Plea for the Lords, fol. 401, at large.]

After the parliament was risen, this Richard Strode for what he had so done in parliament, was presented and found guilty in the Staunary court, and condemned to forfeit 40*l*. (a moderate fine.) He was for this imprisoned, in a dungeon, within a castle, and fed with bread and water.

When the parliament met again, he petitioned the parliament for remedy, and that the judgments had against him and the execucious might be made void; which was done accordingly by act of parliament. [4 H. 8, c. 8.]

And it was further enacted, That all suits, accusations, condemnations, executions, fines, amerciaments, punishments, passed or had, or thereafter to be passed or had, upon the said Strode, and to every other person, that was in that parliament; thus far it is a private and particular act, but the reason of this, and the justice of it extends to all like cases; but then it goes farther, 'or that of any parliament hereafter shall be;' for any bill, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter concerning the parliament, to be continued or treated of (these are very large and general words) he utterly void, and of none effect. And it goes farther yet, 'And that any person vexed, or troubled, or otherwise charged for any cause, as aforesaid, shall have an action of the case, against every person so vexing contrary to this ordinance, and recover treble damages and costs.'

Here now is an action given against one, for what they shall do in a course of justice. But it is because it is suing in an inferior court that has no jurisdiction in the matter. This act takes away all jurisdiction in such parliament cases, from all other courts. I know that in the case of Denzill Hollis (afterwards the lord Hollis) Mr. Selden and others, 3 Car. 1, the judges being consulted upon some questions propounded, Res. That that act of Strode's, was a particular act, and extended to Strode only; and no doubt it was a particular act in a great part of it, and in that part extended to Strode only.

But if the judges meant that no part of that act was a general law, then I must crave leave to say, 1. That their opinion was extrajudicial; it was delivered upon their being consulted with about questions propounded to them, and therefore hath not that weight. And I must take the liberty to appeal to the very words of the statute itself, and to any man of reason and honesty, to use his reason aright, that shall read them; and I must offer some reasons against their opinion, and cite some good authority in that point, and then leave it to this court to judge of it.

The words and persons, and time mentioned in the latter part of that act, are general. It speaks, indeed, first of Strode in particular; but then it hath these words 'every other person.' It mentions that parliament in particular; but then it proceeds to speak of 'any parliament that thereafter shall be.' Then the things also are general that the act extends to, not only to indemnify Strode for what he had said, or done in parliament; but then the indemnity extends to every other person, 'for any bill, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter concerning the parliament.'

The words of the royal assent to this bill, are such as are constantly used only to general acts, viz. 'Le Roy veut;' whereas to a particular act, the royal answer is, 'Soit droit fait al parties.'

And this act of 4 H. 8, is enrolled as general acts use to be. But a private or particular act is always filed, but never enrolled; for this latter distinction we shall find it in the case 33 H. 6, fol. 17, 18, for authority in this question, sir E. C. in his 4th Inst. fol. 19, holds this act of 4 H. 8, in the latter part of it to be a general act.

It is indeed commonly said 'Boni judicis est, ampliare jurisdictionem.' But I take that to be better advice which was given by the lord chancellor, (sir Francis Bacon,) to Mr. justice Hutton, upon the swearing him one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas; that he would take care to contain the jurisdiction of the court within the ancient mere-stones without removing the mark.

I find but one resolution in all our books, that I can meet with, that seems to make against us in this point, and maintains a jurisdiction in this court, for a misdemeanor, or conspiracy supposed to be done by some particular members of the House of Commons, in the House in time of parliament. It is reported by Mr. justice Croke, in his Reports of the time of king Charles, fol. 181; but it is more fully reported in a late book, entitled Memorials of the English affairs, set out by a learned lawyer, and the son of a judge; and it is the case that I lightly touched upon but now, that of Mr. Hollis, Selden, &c.

The offence charged upon Mr. Denzill Hollis (who was afterwards the lord Hollis,) Mr. Selden, sir John Elliott, sir John Hobart and divers other parliament men, was for a force used upon the then Speaker, sir John Finch (afterwards lord keeper) in keeping him in the Speaker's Chair against his will, when he would have left it; and pressing him to put a question, which the king had forbidden him to put. For this supposed offence, after the parliament was dissolved, these parliament men were first convened before the council, where they refused to answer the charge, it being for matters done in parliament.

Then the judges had questions propounded to them, to which they gave their resolutions, that for things done not in a parliamentary way, a parliament-man may be punished after the parliament is ended, if he be not punished in parliament; otherwise as just. Croke said, 'There would be a failure of justice; but, that regularly, he cannot be compelled out of parliament to answer things done in a parliament in a parliamentary course.'

This answer seems to be very oracular, for it resolves that a parliament-man shall not answer for things done in parliament in a parliamentary course. If it be done in a parliamentary course, what occasion can there be to answer for it? But who shall judge what is a parliamentary course, but a parliament? Not judges of the common law; for the parliamentary course differs from the rules of the common law.* But they refusing to answer at the council board, were committed close prisoners to the Tower.*

After this Sir Robert Heath, the king's attorney, preferred an information in the Star-chamber against them, that was not proceeded in. The lord keeper was under difficulties about it, says the author. The judges of the King's-bench were to consult with the rest of the judges in granting a Habeas Corpus for bailing the prisoners. The rest of the judges would hear arguments, so it was put off, and delayed, (as our author reports it.) At last an information was exhibited against them in the King's-bench. The defendants pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court; their plea was overruled, and they refusing to plead over, judgment was entered by 'nihil dicit,' and they fined and imprisoned.

Mr. just. Croke, at the latter end of those Reports, gives this further account of that case, that afterwards in the parliament 17 Car. 1, It was resolved by the House of Commons, that those parliament-men should have a recompense for their damages sustained for the services to the commonwealth in the parliament, 3 Car. 1. If a judge hath thought fit to report this, it may be as fit for me to mention it. I take that to be the first precedent of resolution given in any case for what was done in parliament, and it stands alone; I have heard of none since that, neither. It seems to be directly against the provision made by it; it is clearly within the equity and reason of it, Strode's act. I wish I could not say that even those times of 3 Car. 1, were not full of trouble. It appears much by the difficulty the judges seemed to be at in the proceedings of that case; this detracts much from that veneration, that otherwise is justly due to a resolution so solemn as that of all the judges. [The Resolution of the Commons in Trewinnard's Case is called the judgment of the most high court of parliament. If it had been clear that the King's-bench could have punished it, they would have begun with it there, but they tried the council and the Star-chamber first.]

The lord chancellor Bacon in his profound book of the advancement of learning, dislikes all precedents that taste of the times; and advises that precedents should be derived from good and moderate times.

The only reason that I find given for that proceeding in the case of Denzill Hollis, is that given by Mr. just. Croke, viz. That otherwise there would be a failure of justice.

This reason must be grounded either upon the infrequency of parliaments, or upon an opinion that parliaments will be partial in cases of their own members.

As to the first of these (the long intervals between parliaments,) this under favour ought to be, no reason, especially to come from a judge's mouth, (I have a great honour for the memory of that reverend judge) who must needs know, and ought to assert it, that by the law parliaments ought to be very frequent, and judges ought to take part with the law, and to maintain it.

Before the conquest (as it is untruly called) by the law, parliaments were to be held twice a year, as appears by king Edgar's laws, c. 5, in Lamb. de priscis, &c.

And the Mirror of Justice, c. 1, sect. 3, tells us, That king Alfred ordained for a perpetual usage, that twice in the year, (and if need were) oftener, the seniors or earls should assemble themselves at London to speak their minds.

And it is reckoned among the abuses (as they are there termed) of the common law; That whereas parliaments ought to be twice in the year for the salvation of the souls of trespassers (and at London too) that they are there but very seldom, and at the pleasure of the king, for subsidies and collections of treasure.

And by the statute of 4 E. 3, c. 14, parliaments ought to be once a year, and oftener (if need be). I have heard a civilian in the House of Commons give this construction to that short act, that the words (if need be) should refer to the parliaments being (once a year) as well as to the words (and oftener) and I never heard that any man was of that opinion but himself; but I remember he himself laughed when he spoke it, but he was more laughed at for that ridiculous exposition. And should that sense be put upon it, it would make the law a very ridiculous thing indeed, for then the short of it would be this: That we should have a parliament when there is need.

But to refute that fancy, there is another statute of the same king's time, namely, 36 E. 3, c. 10, which says, That for redress of divers mischiefs and grievances, which daily happen, it is accorded that a parliament shall be holden every year, without any such restriction (if need be.)

And by the act of 16 Car. 2, c. 1, these acts are declared to be in force. And farther, it is declared and enacted, That the holding of parliaments shall not be discontinued above three years at the most.

* See Vol. 2, p. 234, of this Collection.

Now how can any man say in defiance of these laws, That there can be any long discontinuance of parliaments? His now majesty has been pleased graciously to declare his resolution often to meet his people in parliaments, and in the word of a king there is power. Nay, we have the king's oath for it, for he is sworn to observe the law; and 'eadem præsumitur esse mens regis quæ legis;' and it is an high presumption for any man to think, or say otherwise.

For that other ground of that reason given by Mr. justice Croke, viz. That there would be a failure of justice, if offences committed in parliament were not punishable in the King's bench; namely, because parliaments will be partial in cases of their own members. This carries with it a very high reflection upon that great and solemn assembly, to entertain a thought so mean, and so dishonourable of the supreme court of the nation, that the court which is to correct the errors of all other courts, and is the last resort of the nation, that they should be guilty of injustice and partiality. No man that is a lover of his country, or a friend to his own true and honest interest, will harbour a dishonourable thought of that great assembly.

I am apter to think, that the reporter of that case did mistake, when he charged that worthy and reverend judge, Mr. just. Croke, with the offering of that for a reason. I find the most reverend of our judges speaking with the greatest reverence of that supreme court. Besides, the learned lord chief justice sir Edw. Coke, who often expresses his great veneration for them, hear what the chief just. Brook, and just. Saunders say of that assembly, in Plowd. Comment. in the case of Hill and Grange, fol. 175, a. towards the lower end of that folio, 'Injustice' (say they) 'may not be presumed of a parliament.' And in the earl of Leicester's case, in the same comment, fol. 398, towards the end of the folio, 'The parliament is a court of very high honour and justice, of which no man ought to imagine a thing dishonourable.'

I do agree, that an offence committed in parliament, is a very high offence; but the higher it is, the more proper it is for their judicature; and that court is armed with a power to punish the highest offences, and the highest offenders. But to take it out of their hands, and to make it determinable in any other court, is a disparagement to that grave and supreme court. We easily agree that a parliament may err, for they are not infallible; but the law hath provided a remedy against those errors, and a way to reform them. A subsequent parliament may reform the errors of a preceding parliament, as I have proved by several authorities. But to say they will be partial or unjust, or corrupt, or do any thing out of malice, is to raise a scandal upon the whole nation, whose representative they are.

I will make no difficulty to affirm, That if, any offence whatever be committed in the parliament by any particular members, (as this was accounted a force or riot in the case of Denzill Hollis and Selden, and others committed upon the Speaker) it is an high infringement of the right and privilege of parliament, for any person or court to take the least notice of it, till the House itself either has punished the offender, or referred them to a due or proper course of punishment. To do otherwise, would be to make the highest court an offender, and to charge them with injustice.

Nay, their right and privilege so far extends, that not only what is done in the very House sitting the parliament, but whatever is done relating to them, or in pursuance of their order, during the parliament, and sitting the parliament, is no where else to be punished, but by themselves or a succeeding parliament, although done out of the House, as in the case of Ferrers.

If any shall imagine, as Mr. Pryn does, and others, that of later times the parliament have encroached more power than anciently belonged to them, I have already answered this objection, by shewing how large a power they exercised of old: And see what is further mentioned in Lamb. Archion 57, viz. That king H. 3, was told by his Lords spiritual and temporal, that of ancient time the creating and deposing of all the judges and great officers belonged to the parliament.

I do not deny, but some sort of orders by them made, are no longer in force than while the parliament sits; but then, what is done after the parliament is risen, is not to be said to be done by their order, for then it ceases to be their order: This must be understood of matters executory, not as to things executed by their order during parliament.

However, this case of Denzill Hollis comes not home to the present case, but it is wonderfully short of it: This was an offence charged only upon some particular members; and it cannot be denied, but particular persons, even in the parliament, may misdeemean themselves, and they are to be punished by the parliament, but no where else.

But in our case, that which makes the offence, and for which the information is brought by the king's attorney, is what is done by the whole House of Commons, and by virtue of their express order. Although, as I have already observed, the information itself does not expressly own it, yet the demurrer to the defendant's plea, (which sets it all forth) does most plainly avow it. And this I am sure is without any colour of precedent, and never was attempted till this time.

* If any man will extenuate or justify this way of proceeding, by saying, that this was not for any thing done in the House, but a matter done out of the House; viz. the printing and publishing was abroad in the printing-house, and in the streets, and spreading them abroad throughout the kingdom: yet this will not save it, for the defendant did what he did as Speaker, and not in his private capacity. And it was done by order of the whole House and sitting the parliament; so that this information does directly question the parliament itself, and arraigns their power and actings; for I have fully proved, that what the defendant has done is not his act, but indeed the acting of the whole House of Commons. And I have also proved, that the two Houses, as to the right of the power that they claim and use, is but one, and they are entire, though they may divide in the exercise of that power. So that it is a matter of the highest concernment to the nation that possibly can be.

Sir E. Coke in his fourth Inst. in his Chapter of the High Court of Parliament, mentions two cases only, and some other beginnings of a prosecution against such as absented themselves from parliament, and departed from it without licence; but they had no effect, as he affirms, but only against six junior burgesses, (where thirty-nine members were informed against) who ad redimendam vexationem, submitted to fines; but he could not find that ever they paid any.

The first of the two cases, is that of the bishop of Winchester, it is in the Year Book of 3 E. 3, fol. 18 and 19, Fitz. H. Abr. tit. Coron. plac. 161. And he affirms that those are all the cases that he can find concerning this matter. The suit against the bishop was by original writ in the King's-bench, and it charges him with a trespass and contempt in departing from the parliament without the king's licence.

The bishop there pleads (as the defendant does in this case) to the jurisdiction of the court. 'Et dicit quod si quis eorum' (speaking of the Lords of parliament,) 'deliquerit erga Dominum Regem in Parlamento aliquo, in parlamento debet corrigi et emendari, et non alibi in minori curia quam in Parlamento. Unde non intendit quod Dominus Rex velit in curia hic de hujusmodi transgressione et contemptu factis in Parlamento responderi.'

Note the plea, as to the offence, is very general, not only restrained to the offence of absenting from the parliament, but to any trespass or offence in parliament. Si quis deliquerit.

And it would be a little improper to call absence from parliament, offence committed in parliament, for it looks like the quite contrary: but in a just sense, any offence committed by a member relating to the parliament, though done out of the House, is termed an offence in parliament. No printing any thing by order of parliament, though it be done and executed in another place, yet it may be said to be done by the parliament, and in parliament, if it be by their order, and in time of parliament.

We may note further, that this is a prosecution only against one particular person, for a particular offence and contempt charged upon him. But in our case, the prosecution is against the very Speaker of the parliament, and is in effect a prosecution against the parliament; for it is against him, for what he did by command and order of parliament, and sitting the parliament.

And though the Attorney-General replied to the bishop's plea, that the king might sue in what court he would, yet the bishop rejoins upon him and maintains his former plea, and there it rests; so that as Sir E. Coke observes, That the bishop's plea did stand and was never over-ruled, agreeable to the resolutions of former times. So this J. may claim as an authority on our side.

And though Mr. Plowden the lawyer [4 Inst. fol. 177] to the like information put in against him and others, 1 and 2 Philip and Mary, pleaded that he remained continually from the beginning to the end of the parliament, and traversed the absence, whereby he passes by the advantage of the plea to the jurisdiction, yet this is no authority against us; for he might think fit, 'Renunciare juri pro se introducto', having so true an occasion of clearing himself from that scandalous imputation of being absent from doing his duty in parliament, which certainly is a very high breach of trust; and he might be impatient of lying under it, and therefore thought it best to traverse it to clear his reputation in that point; yet I must confess I should never have advised it, nor was there any further prosecution against him.

I will mention but one most excellent record more, and it is a record out of the Parliament Rolls, 27 E. 3, num. 9, Sir Robert Cotton's Abridgment, and with that I will conclude. I take it to be very pertinent, and I am sure it is very seasonable.

Among the petitions of the Commons, one is, They pray the king, that he will require the archbishop and all other of the clergy, to pray for the peace and good government of the land,

And for the king's good will towards the Commons.

The king's answer, is,

The same prayeth the king.

And I wish with all my heart, it were the Common-Prayer.

I have but one prayer more to make, and that is, that this court will allow the defendant's plea.

This Case is reported in 2 Shower, 471. Comberbach, 18. The following is Shower's report of it:

THE KING v. WILLIAMS.

"Information for publishing an infamous libel, called 'Dangerfield's Narrative.'

"The defendant pleads, that by the law and customs of England, the Speakers of the House of Commons have signed and published the acts of the House, &c.

"Mr. Attorney General demurs.

"Mr. Jones was beginning to argue, and took some exceptions, as that he does not aver the libel in the information and that in the plea to be the same.

"L. C. J. We will not, in such a case, debate the formality of such an idle insiguificant plea: let us hear what they have to say for it.

"Mr. Pollexfen began, 'The court of parliament, &c.'

"L. C. J. Court do you call it? Can the order of the House of Commons justify the scandalous, infamous, flagitious libel.

"Mr. Pollexfen then said, 'I have no more to say, &c.'

"L. C. J. Let judgment be entered for the kin Ar. Williams was fined 10,000*l*., and upon payment of 8,000*l*. of it, satisfaction was acknowledged upon record."

He also gives the following note of the Case of lord Peterborough against Williams:

LORD PETERBOROUGH v. WILLIAMS.

"Scandalum Magnatum on the statute of 2 Rich. 2, c. 5, for publishing 'Dangerfield's Narrative;' the defendant pleads the same plea as he did to the information in the king's name; but a demurrer being thereto.

"It was argued, that the declaration was ill, and that there was nothing of slander in it upon the plaintiff, for they had averred none, but only set forth the whole pamphlet with an 'in quo quidem libello diversa falsa et scandalosa continentur,' and mention none in particular, which Mr. Pollexfen urged to be naught.

"And the Court doubted it.

"But the general opinion of the Bar was, that such their doubt was not on the point, but in favour to the defendant, to gain him time for a compromise; (it being thought that he had paid sufficient before for that offence) for the manner of declaring seems good, and if upon the whole it appear to the court there was any matter scandalous, the action lies, if otherwise not.

"And it was afterwards agreed, as I was informed.

"Note, In Scandalum Magnatum no costs are to be given the plaintiff, though a verdict be for him."

As to sir Robert Sawyer, see the Case of sir Thomas Armstrong, vol. 10, p. 105, of this Collection, and particularly the passage cited from Mr. Hargrave, p. 117.

Under Mr. Williams Wynn's permission, I insert from the Appendix to his "Argument upon the Jurisdiction of the House of Commons," the following passage:

"The Demurrer being allowed by the court, a plea in bar was pleaded by Mr. Williams, nearly similar to the plea to the jurisdiction, thus over-ruled; but this last plea was afterwards withdrawn, and judgment went by default. A fine of 10,000*l*. was imposed by the court of King's-bench; but James 2, afterwards remitted 2,000*l*. of it, annexing this singular condition, that nothing should be given to any of the courtiers who had been employed to solicit this abatement.

"Upon examining the notes and papers of sir William Williams, I find that the above was not the only prosecution that he was exposed to, for the discharge of his duty as Speaker.

"The same information of Dangerfield, which accused the duke of York, also contained charges against the earl of Peterborough, and that nobleman commenced an action for Scandalum Magnatum against Mr. Williams, for licensing the publication of the information; and also seven others against the printers and booksellers who had printed and sold it."

"To this action, Mr. Williams put in a plea, similar to that in the former case; but the disposition of the court of King's-bench had already been found so hostile to the allowance of any privilege of parliament, that it was thought most advisable to compromise the matter, and James 2, who had been gratified by the early payment of Mr. Williams's fine of 8,000*l*., interferred to induce lord Peterborough to accept 150*l*., which was paid to him in satisfaction, and a non. pros. was entered on the roll.

"Much surprise has been expressed at the failure of three different bills, which were brought into parliament in 1689, 1690, and 1695, to reverse the judgment given in the King's-bench against Mr. Williams. It has been seen, that the Bill of Rights refers to this case, as one of the offences by which James 2 had forfeited the crown, and the House of Commons had expressly declared the judgment to be 'illegal, and subversive of the freedom of parliament.' (July 12, 1689.) It does, therefore appear inconsistent, that this very judgment should have been suffered to continue unversed, and the illegal fine which had been imposed on the Speaker, unrepaid.

"To account for this, it is necessary to look at the circumstances of the times, and the conduct then adopted by parliament, in similar instances.

"Among the difficulties which pressed upon the new government, after the Revolution, that of raising money was the principal, and parliament, disgusted with the profusion of king William's grants to his favorites, was led into the opposite extreme of parsimony; even in instances where the national justice called for a more liberal proceeding.

"We shall find, in consequence, that there was no disposition to make pecuniary compensation to any of those who had suffered illegally during former reigns, unless a fund, independent of the public purse, could be found for that purpose.

"With a view to supply this, a bill for the attainder and confiscation of the estates of the deceased chancellor, lord Jefferies, was brought in, and an intention was entertained of fining,

"It appears, that in these different actions, lord Peterborough actually recovered and received above 6,700*l*. besides costs."

in different proportions, all those who were excepted from the act of indemnity.

The natural effect of this was, to unite, not only the persons excepted; but all their connections, in opposition to every bill for the reversal of proceedings, which were likely to entail pecuniary compensation to the party aggrieved; and this combination was strong enough (particularly in the House of Lords) to throw out every bill of this nature. The attainders of Russell and Sydney were indeed reversed, because no application could, in those instances, be made for compensation; but the bill for reversing the equally illegal outlawry of sir Thomas Armstrong, contained a clause, directing that the sum of 5,000*l.* of which his family had been deprived, should be repaid to them out of the estates of his judges and prosecutors, and was lost. A bill passed the House of Commons, for charging the heirs of lord Jefferies with the repayment of 14,760*l.* which he had extorted from Mr. Prideaux, as the condition of pardon for a charge of treason, and laid out in the purchase of an estate, yet even this was thrown out by the Lords.

Upon the same grounds of objection, it is probable that the bills for the reversal of the judgment against sir Wm. Williams were lost.

It was originally proposed by these bills, that the fine of 8,000*l.* should be repaid to sir W. Williams by the Exchequer, and afterwards to the Exchequer by sir Robert Sawyer, who had filed the information against him. Sir Robert was, in consequence, heard against the bill, both in person and by counsel, and though passed by the House of Commons, in 1695, it failed in the House of Lords.

On this occasion, sir William Williams made a speech in vindication of himself, the notes of which still remain among his papers.

I trust that I am not misled by the partiality of a descendant, in thinking the historical matter, which this defence contains, sufficiently curious to justify me in giving an extract from it.

After stating proofs of the different facts in his case, viz. The order of the House, 9th November 1680, that the Informations of Dangerfield and others should be perused and signed by the Speaker, and printed by such printers as he should nominate, and that Dangerfield should have the benefit resulting therefrom; the printing of the Information during the sitting of parliament; Dangerfield's acknowledgment of his having received the emolument; the prosecution commenced by sir Robert Sawyer, and the pleadings therein already mentioned. The notes proceed thus:

Aspersions—That I was in confederacy with king Charles the second, to discover the secrets of the Com'ons, when, in the chaire, I was approved by him upon such terms, consented by sir Richard Mason.

1. Mr. Francis Charlton will prove how I was first thought upon to be Speaker, two days before the meeting of the parliament, 31st October 1680.

"I was a stranger to it: he brought me the first notice of it, and my answer to him.

"Then proposed by my lord Russell, and unanimously elected by the House.

"And next day approved by the king.

"2. Earl of Macclesfield will testify, that I refused the chiefe justiceship of Chester, because I would not be thought to do any thing that might seem to incline against the interest of the Com'ons in that trust.

"3. I never had any place in king Charles II's time. I never sought any. I did not seek this. I do appeal to all the members, if ever I mentioned this to any person.

"4. I was but twice with k'g Charles ye second: the 3d time I refused to go to him.

"5. My reward is my prosecution, fine, and two years defence of the Com'ons.

"It is my glory I have left a record for the rights and freedom of parli'm'ts. In this proceeding posterity will justify me.

"I look upon this as the glory and honour of my selfe and family,

"And submit it to the wisdom of this House, to dispose of it as they shall thinke fitt.

"I have pleaded a plea, which will defend itselfe to posterity.

"I have been condemned illegally. I have paid 8,000*l.* to ye crown, unjustly ag't law.

"I have paid it for the Com'ons of England.

"If I had betrayed all, or some of ye Com'ons;

"If I had submitted to the information;

"If I had tamely yielded and confessed;

"It had been better with my estate,

"But worse with my reputation.

"I value much more your rights and my own honor, than I do my estate.

"The money I may recover againe, or not want;

"The dishonor had been irrecoverable.

"It is part of my honor,

"That I am thus exposed by my prosecutors, with the same violence, with the same tookes, with the same assurance:

"And if they had the same judges, I must expect the same judgm't * * * *

"It is not my business now to recriminate. I will not imitate sir Rob't Sawyer, in his method of defending himselfe by recrimin'on.

"Consider, if ye 2 things objected to me were true:

"1. That ye information was printed by my order, after ye rising of ye parliamt:

"2. If Dangerfield has not had the benefit of this inform'n:

"How (does) this avails sir Rob't Sawyer upon this record of the inform'n? my plea demurr on his p't, and defend the judgm't given ag't ye privilege and rights and freedom of proceeding in parliamt.

"Let me be the vilest of men that sate in that chaire, doeth that mend sir Rob't Sawyer's case upon this judgm't?

"This is to justifye ye proceeding and judgment of ye court of King's-bench ag't ye Com'ons by a side-wind.

"This is to say, ye Com'ons could not order printing, and the speaker ought not to obey them or their order.

"This is to bring the privilege of ye Com'ons into question in West'r-hall.

"And to make those courts judge of the privileges of parli'mt, and consequently of parli'mt, and to sett bounds to their proceedings and debates, and to make West'r-hall superior to parli'mts."

Proceedings for the reversal of the judgment against sir William Williams were had so early after the Revolution as July 10, 1689. See Commons' Journals of that date. After that period, farther proceedings were had at intervals until the 21st of February 1695-6, on which day the House of Lords read the second time a bill which had been sent up from the Commons, intituled, "An Act for reversing a Judgment given against sir William Williams for what he did as Speaker of the House of Commons, and for asserting the Rights and Freedom of Parliament." And Die Veneris, 21 Februarii.

Ordered, That the said bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House, on Thursday the 27th day of this instant February, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

After which I do not find any farther entry respecting it.

THE said day anent the criminall actione and cause intended, and depending befor the saids lords, at the instance of his majestie's advocat, against Kenneth earle of Scaforth, makeand mentione, that where by all laws divine and humane, and by the laws and acts of parlia't of this kingdome and constant practice therof, the crymes of treasons, rebellions and lese majesty are most strictly and severely prohibit, and particularly by the act of parliament, James first, parl. first cap. 3. It is statyte and ordained, that noe man notoriously or openly rebell ag't the king's personne, under the paine of forfeiting of life, lands, and goods, and by the act James 2d, parl. 6th, cap. 13. It is ordained that none rebell against the king's personne or authority, and who soe makes sick rebellions, to be punished after the quality and quantity of sick rebellions, by the advice of the three estates; and if it happens any within the realme openly or notoriously to rebell against the king, or to make their against the king's leidges, ag't his forbidding, in that case they are to be punished after the quantity of the trespass; and by the act James 2, par. 6th, cap. 24. It is statnte, that if any man committ or doe treasons against the king's personne, or his majesty, or ryses in fear of warr against him, or resettis any that hes committed treasons, or that supplies them in help, red or counsell, or that stuffs the houses of them that are convicted of treasons, and holds them against the king, or that stuffs houses of their own in furthering of the kings rebells, shall be punished as traytors; and by the fifth act parl. first, Cha. 2d, it is declaired, that it is and shall be high treasons to the subjects of this kingdome, or any number of them more or less upon any ground or pretext whatsoever, to ryse or continew in armes, to maintain any forts, strengths or garrisons, to make peace or warr, or to make any treaties or leagues with foreign princes or states, or among themselves, without his majesties speciall authority and approbatione first interponed thereto, and all their majesties subjects are discharged to offer upon any pretext whatsoever to attempt the doeing of any of these things hereafter, under the paine of treasons; and by the 2nd act of the second session of the same parliament, it is statute and ordained, That if any persone or persones shall heirafter plott, contrive death and destruction to the kings majestie, or to deprieve, depose, or suspect him from the style, honour and kingly name of the imperiall croune of this realme, or any other of his dominiones, or to levy warr or take up armes against his majestie, or any commissionat by him, or shall intyse any strangers or others to invade any of his majesties dominiones, every such persone being legally convicted, shall be decerned, declaired and adjudged a traytor, and suffer forfeiture of life, lands and goods, as in cases of high treasons; and lastly by the 2nd act of the first session of this current parliament, it is declared to be high treasons in any of the subjects of this kingdome by wryteing, speaking, or any other manner of way to disowne quarrell or impugne their majesties royall power and authority, or right and title to the crown: Nevertheless, it is of verity that the said Kenneth, earle of Seaforth, shakeing off all fear of God and regard to their ma'ties and their lawes, being suspected as disaffected to the late happy revolutione, and therupon put under arrest at London, in the year 1689, untill generall major M'Kay became bail for him, did upon one or other of the dayes or moneths of the said year breake your bail, and run awdy and repaired to the late king James then in Ireland, wadging warr against their majesties, and continued there dureitg that rebellion untill that in the end of the year 1689, the said earle landed in the Leves, and from thence came to the fort of island Donald, belonging to himself, where he continued for severall moneths, keeping intelligence with generall major Buchan, who was then in armes in open rebellion ag'tt their majesties in this kingdome, commanding a party of about fyve hundred horse, with whom he purposed to have joyned, at least have assisted, or at least have appeared in armes with him in the foresaid rebellion, for accomplishing whereof soe soon as the said earle gott intelligence of the said generall majors march, then he did convocat or cause convocat, or were otherwayes assisting to the convocating, in armes of the sensible men in the countreys of Kintail, Lochcarron, Lochelsh, and other places pertaining to or depending on him and his other vassalls, followers or dependers, within the shyre of Ross or elsewhere, lykeas the sds persones and others disaffected to the government, did assemble and repaire in armes to the said earle as their head and chieftain, at least they being 1,500 less or more, and in a sort of a camp he was therre present with them in armes, commanding, assisting, or otherwayes abaiting them, against or at least without their majesties speciall authority and approbatione first thereto interponed; and particularly upon one or other of the dayes of the moneths of March, Apryle, May, June, July, August, September or October, in the year 1690, and at or about a place called Acheltre near to Brand, and in other places near to the laird of Coulls house in the shyre of Ross, the said earle was there in armes with the saids rebellious company, who had collours displayed, and he went under the title of marquess of Seaforth, &c. major generall to king James forces, or was otherwayes with them threatning destruction to all that owned their majesties government, at least he was in armes in manner forsaid, without their majesties authority and approbation, and when by reason of major generall M'Kays sudden march, Buchan was necessitat to retire with his horse to the highlands, the said earle not having gott his men together to joyne with Buchan, yet continued his camp with the forsaid rebells, daylie convocating and increasing their number during some dayes that generall major M'Kay continued at Inverness, waiting upon the coming up of their majesties forces from the south, wherby the generall major discovering the said earles obstinat rebellione, and apprehending that he might withdraw with those in armes with him to the inaccessible highlands, and joyne with the other rebells there in armes, he upon the 30th day of August, 1690 years, or therabout, gave commissions to the laird of Balnagowan, and major George Wishart and others, to attack with the forces appointed to them, the saids earles countreys of Assin-Lochglun and others, and to destroy the same by fire and sword, which persones travling marched to those parts in obedience to the saids commissions, the inhabitants of these countreys being then in armes with the said earle, did leave and desert him, which occasioned the dissolving of his camp, and the forces that were with him forced him to send some of his friends partly to the generall major and partly to those commisionat, as said is, to stope their hostility; wherewith the said earle was threatened, and being thus deserted and brought to extremities, and not till then, he delyvered himselfe when he could doe noe better, to the said generall major, by all which the said earle wicked and evil practices he was guilty of the cryme of treason, lese majesty, sedition, and rising in armes against their majesties government, at least sirt and pairt therof, and thereby he hes incurred the paines of treason and rebellione yiz. the forfeiture of life, lands, and estate, and ought and should be punished therwith, to the example and terror of others to doe the lyke in tyme coming.

Which criminall actione and cause being oft and diverse tymes called, was continued from day to day till this day, and the samyne being this day called, compeired sir James Stewart, his majesties advocat, as pursuer on the one part, and on the other part compeired Mr. David Forbes advocat, and gave in ane act of counsell for deserting the dyet, wherof the tenor followes :

At Edinburch the 18th day of March 1697. The lords of his majesties privy counsell, having considered his majesties letter direct to them of date the first day of March instant, authorizing and requyering them to sett the earle of Seaforth at liberty, who as he is informed hes rendered himselfe prisoner to the garrison at Inverness, and cast himselfe upon his majesties mercy, upon sufficient hale to live peaceably and appear when called for, and recommends to the lord advocat not to insist in the criminall process against the said earle, during his majesties pleasure, they doe hereby give order and warrant to the governour of the garrison of fort William, and in his absence to the next commanding officer there, to sett the said Kenneth earle of Seaforth at liberty furth therof, in respect he hes given bond and found sufficient cautione acted in the books of his majesties privy counsell, that he shall live peaceably under and with all submissione to the present government of his majestie king William, and that he shall not act, consult, or contrive any thing in prejudice thereof, nor shall not converse, nor correspond with any rebells, and that he shall appear before the saids lords of his majesties privie counsell, whensoever he shall be called or requyred thereto, under the penalty of two thousand pounds sterling in caso he shall transgress in any pairt of the premisses, and recommends to sir James Stewart his majesties advocat, to desert the dyet in the process of treason presently depending at his lordships' instance against the said earle, before the lord justice generall, lord justice clerk, and lords commissioners of his majesties justiciary, and not to intent nor insist in any new process of treason against the said earle, untill his majesties pleasure be furder known therein, the said earle having given bond, and found cautione in manner forsaid, extracted by me.

Mr. Alexander Pitcairn, minister at Southronalshay, now prisoner in the Tolbuith of Edinburgh.

YOU are Indyted and accused, at the instance of sir James Stewart, his majesties advocat for his highnes interest, and by special warrant of the lords of his majesties privy counsell, that where by the second act of the first session of this current parliament, intituled Act Recognosning his Majesties royall authority; * it is declared, to be high treason in

* Act recognizing their Majesty's Royal Authority.

“The Estates of Parliament considering that the king and queen's majesties have accepted of the crown of this realm, tendered to them by the meeting of the Estates in their Claim of Right, dated the 11th day of April last, and accordig thereto have sworn the oath appointed by law to be taken by all kings and queens of this realm, before they exerce their regal power: therefore the Estates of Parlia-any of the subjects of this kingdome by wryting, speaking, or any other manner, way, to disowne, quarrell, or impugne his majesties royall power, or authority, or right and title to the crowne: Nevertheless, it is of verie that you shaking off all fear of God, and regained ment for themselves, and in name and behalf of the whole subjects of this kingdom represented by them, do hereby assert, recognize, and acknowledge their majesties royal power and authority over the said kingdom, and their undoubted right and title to the imperial crown thereof: like as their majesties, with advice and consent of the said Estates of Parliament, do declare, that it is high treason in any of the subjects of this kingdom, by wryting, speaking, or any other manner of way to disown, quarrel, or impugn their majesties royal power and authority, or right and title to the crown. And further, their majesties, with advice and consent foresaid, do statute and ordain, That the Oath of Allegiance hereunto subjoined, shall be sworn and subscribed by all the members and clerks of parliament, and by all other persons presently in public trust, civil or military, or who shall be hereafter called to any public trust within the kingdom; and do hereby retract and rescind all preceding laws and acts of parliament, in so far as they impose any other oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, Declarations and Tests, excepting the oath de Fidei."

As to this statute, Mr. Laing, vol. 1, p. 227, observes:

"The oath to government merely professed, as in England, to be faithful, and to bear true allegiance to William and Mary; without an acknowledgment of their lawful title, or right to the crown. To relieve the scruples of the conscientious, a distinction between a king de facto and a king de jure, was thus humanely introduced; but there were few Jacobites, who hesitated, by the grossest equivocation, to accept the oaths to the government, which they meant to overturn, and to swear allegiance to William, whom they had conspired to dethrone."

By chap. 6, of the fourth session of the first parliament of king William and queen Mary, (April 18, 1693) intitled, 'Act for taking the Oath of Allegiance and Assurance.'

"Forasmuch as the imposing and taking the Oath of Allegiance, and the Assurance, enacted in this current parliament, as hereto subjoined, will be a further security to the Protestant religion and their majesties government, in this present exigence: therefore the king and queen's majesties, with advice and consent of the Estates of Parliament, statute and ordain, that the said oath of allegiance be sworn, and the same with the foresaid assurance be subscribed by all noblemen and their eldest sons being past twenty-one years of age, and by all persons in offices and places of public trust, civil, ecclesiastical and military." And the act to the laws of this kingdome, did in one or other of the dayes of the moneths of the years 1693 or 1696, preaching in your South kirk of Southronaldshay, or some other kirk in these bounds, openly and traitterously say and avert, That king William was a villianous, and a tyr-contains several clauses for enforcing such swearing, and subscriptions by persons in general. Among those clauses are the following that "they" (the persons enumerated in the act) "And all other persons, whether above ranked or not, who shall not swear the said oath, and subscribe the same, and the Assurance, shall not be allowed to keep any horses above an hundred marks price, nor any sort of arms, more than a walking sword, certifying such a shall be found to have horses and arms contrary to this provision either in their own or in the keeping of others; that both the owner and the keeper shall incur the penalty of one thousand marks, the one part to the reformer, and the other to their majesties; and their majesties with consent foresaid, authorises and impowers the lords of privy council, to take such further effectual methods for determining these persons, and seizing of their horses above the foresaid value as they shall judge necessary: as, likewise, they empower the council to call before them, all or any heritors, or other persons, whom they shall think fit, whether above ranked or not, and to put the said oath and assurance to them, and in case of their refusal to proceed against them by fining, confining, imprisonment or banishment, as they shall see cause; the fine, if they be heritors, to be the double of their cess or supply; and further, (if the council shall think fit) not exceeding a year's valued rent, and for others not heritors, the third part of their escheatable goods, by and attour the other penalties contained in the thirty-eight act of the second session of this current parliament."

The Oath of Allegiance, ('I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to their majesties king William and queen Mary') had been enacted by the 'Act recognizing their Majesty's Royal Authority,' first parliament William and Mary, sess. 1, (June 5, 1689) chap. 2.

The Assurance had been enacted by the 'Act for Security of their Majesties Government,' first parliament William and Mary, sess. 2, (April 25, 1690) chap. 24. In the act before us, (sess. 4, chap. 6) it is given, with some slight variations from the original formulary, as follows:

"I, A. B., do, in the sincerity of my heart, assert, acknowledge, and declare, that their majesties king William and queen Mary, are the only lawful and undoubted sovereigns of this realm, as well de jure, that is, of right, king and queen, as de facto, that is, in the possession and exercise of the government: and therefore I do sincerely and faithfully promise and engage, that I will, with heart and hand, life and goods, maintain and defend their majesties raucous traytor, who had put away the righteous king; or words to this effect or purpose; which being a manifest disowning, quarrelling, and impugning of his majesties royall power and authority, and right and title to the crowne, you are therefore guilty, airt and pairt of high treason, which being found by the knowledge of ane inquest, you ought to be punished by loss of life, lauds, and goods to the example and terror of others to committ the lyke in tyme comeing.

I believe that this is not strictly correct. I do not find that the swearing to the assurance was required by either the 38th act of the 2nd sess. or the sixth act of the fourth sess. of king William and queen Mary's first parliament.
